

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

JULY TERM, 1863.

REPORTS OF CASES

DETERMINED IN

THE SUPREME COURT

JULY TERM, 1863.

KELLY et al. v. TAYLOR et al.

WHEREAS the location of a mining claim is made both by posting notices and by designating fixed objects such as trees, shafts, and ditches on or near its exterior boundaries, in an action between two companies involving the title to a portion of the ground witnesses are not confined in their testimony to a statement of the contents of the notices but may also state whether the location made included the ground in dispute.

The same rules of law relating to estoppel in pais apply to mining ground as any other real estate claimed under a similar kind of title.

APPEAL from the District Court of the Fourteenth Judicial District, County of Nevada.

Plaintiffs and defendants owned mining claims adjoining each other upon which they had been at work for several years. A dispute arose as to the precise location of the boundary line between them.

On the trial it appeared from the evidence that plaintiffs had at various times performed labor on the disputed ground by running drifts into it and performing other work upon it, and that the fact that plaintiffs were performing such labor was probably known to defendants, and that defendants had not notified plaintiffs to cease such work.

Plaintiffs had judgment in the Court below and defendants appealed.

Searls & Niles, for Appellants.

The doctrine of estoppel by the act or silence of an owner of real estate has been fully and clearly settled by this Court in a series of decided cases. We need only refer to the principles laid down in those cases to see the error of the instructions given by the Court.

In the first place it was manifestly erroneous to say that in this regard a different rule applied to mining claims from that applicable to other species of real estate.

But the chief objection to the instruction is, not to that part of it which asserts that a different rule exists, but to that part which announces what the rule is.

1st. The instruction does not presuppose that the party so entering is anything more than a mere naked trespasser. We have supposed and this Court has held that the fraud which creates an estoppel "only exists where the owner knows that the other person is making the expenditures under the bona fide reasonable belief that he is the owner of the property." (McGarrity v. Byington, 12 Cal. 431.) This element the instruction entirely omitted.

2d. Again, for aught appearing in the instruction, the trespasser may have as perfect and thorough a knowledge of the nature and extent of the owner's claim as the owner himself.

3d. Again, although the boundaries of the claim are not visibly marked (as the instruction supposes), yet the trespasser may have ample means otherwise to ascertain the true title and ownership of the property. There may be a deed recorded, describing the land by courses and distances, or some local mining rule or custom may provide for a local record of description to take the place of stakes and landmarks.

4th. In the case of Boggs v. The Merced Mining Co., where the doctrine of estoppel in pais was fully discussed, it was said that by the application of the principle it must appear:

Kelly v. Taylor.

1. That the party making the admission by his declarations or conduct was apprised of the true state of his own title.

2. That he made the admission with the express intention to deceive or with such careless and culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud.

3. That the other party was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of the title, but of the means of acquiring such knowledge.

4. That he relied directly upon such admission and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved.

Of these requisite elements to constitute an estoppel the instruction we are considering does not contain one; unless, perhaps, the first, if the word "knowingly" may be construed to mean in its connection a knowledge of his own title on the part of the owner. (Boggs v. Merced M. Co., 14 Cal. 367.)

Henry K. Mitchell, for Respondents.

The first part of this instruction is explained by that which immediately follows, and could not therefore mislead the jury, or prejudice any of the rights of defendants, unless the matter in explanation is erroneous.

The explanatory part of this instruction contains all that is requisite to create a complete estoppel. The expenditure of money in running the tunnels, the knowledge of defendants of the claim of title of plaintiffs, the fraud of defendants in permitting plaintiffs to make such expenditure of money under the bona fide, reasonable belief that they were the owners, are all included in the instructions given, when taken together. Neither does such instruction necessarily give to the opposite party the character of trespasser. The same was given under the circumstances of the case as established by the evidence, and the jury in considering the instruction also took into consideration the evidence.

The rule is not applicable to trespassers upon lands, for the reason that they can ascertain the rights of any person by examination at the Recorder's Office. But in mining claims, in the years 1852-1856, and even later, no recordation was required. For aught this Court or the Court below can determine from the evidence, the ground in dispute was not within any mining district; neither were there any laws or regulations of miners requiring a recordation. We presume that such was the meaning of the Court in saying that a different rule prevailed as to mining claims. .

But again, we contend that the instruction comes within the decision in the case of Boggs v. Merced Mining Co.: 1st. The defendants, by their conduct, were apprised of the true state of their title. The evidence of defendants and their sworn answer show the fact. 2d. The acts of defendants, if they permitted plaintiffs to proceed, and at great expense run tunnels in the disputed ground, well knowing plaintiffs' claim of title, is sufficient evidence to amount to a constructive fraud.

This is an action to recover possession of certain mining ground, and damages for injuries thereto. The plaintiffs and defendants were each the owners of adjoining claims, and there was a dispute between them respecting the location of the division line, by which a portion of the mining ground was claimed by both parties. The plaintiffs had previously run their tunnel into and mined out a portion of the disputed ground, which was known to the defendants.

On the trial one Clark testified, as a witness for the plaintiffs, as to the acts of those who originally located the ground claimed by the plaintiffs, showing the posting of notices and the location of certain trees which marked the boundary lines, and of certain ditches and a shaft, and the location of the lines in relation thereto. He was then asked: "Did the location you made include the ground in dispute?" To which the defendants objected on the ground that the testimony showed that the location had been made by notices, and that they were the best evidence of the extent of the location. The objection was overruled, and the defendants excepted. The question was a proper one. The location does not seem to have been made by notices alone, and it was clearly proper for the witness, after stating the location of the lines of the claim, to state whether those lines included the ground in controversy.

After the evidence was closed the Court instructed the jury as follows: "That in the matter of estoppel a different rule applies to mining claims from that applicable to other species of real estate; that an owner of a mining claim, the boundaries of which are not visibly marked, should notify strangers entering upon it of the nature and extent of his claim, and if he knowingly permits persons to enter upon his claim and expend money in working and improving it, without notifying such persons of his title, he is thereby estopped from setting up such title as against them."

The first branch of this instruction is erroneous. The rules of law relating to estoppel in pais apply to mining ground the same as any other real estate claimed under a similar kind of title. The rest of the instruction is also erroneous, as it omits entirely several important and essential qualifications of the rule upon this subject. Thus it should state that the party entering did so under a claim of right or title, and that the true owner remained silent under such circumstances that his silence operated as a fraud upon the other party, and that the latter was induced thereby to make valuable and permanent improvements, and would therefore be injured by allowing the true title to be set up against him. As was stated by this Court in the case of Boggs v. The Merced Mining Company (14 Cal. 368): "There must be some degree of turpitude in the conduct of a party, before a Court of Equity will estop him from the assertion of his title; the effect of the estoppel being to forfeit his property and transfer its enjoyment to another."

The respondents insist there was sufficient evidence to sustain the plaintiff's case, independent of these instructions, and that he did not rely upon the doctrine of estoppel in the Court below. The case was tried by a jury, and it is impossible for us to tell upon what particular portion of the evidence they founded their verdict, or what instructions controlled them. They may have found for the plaintiff entirely upon these erroneous instructions, or they may have disregarded them entirely. It is sufficient, however, if it appears that they might have been influenced thereby, to make it our duty to send the case back for a new trial, that the error may be corrected.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Grattan v. Wiggins.

GRATTAN et al. v. WIGGINS et al.

THE defense of the Statute of Limitations is a personal privilege of the debtor which he may assert or waive at his option, but it must be set up in some form either by demurrer or answer, or it will be deemed to have been waived. In an action to recover judgment for the amount of a debt secured by mortgage on real estate, and also to foreclose the mortgage, the grantees of the mortgagor, purchasers subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, have a right to plead the Statute of Limitations as to that part of the claim of plaintiff which asks for a decree foreclosing the mortgage and a sale of the mortgaged premises.

Sec. 260 of the Practice Act of 1851 which provides that "a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance whatever its terms" etc., applies to all mortgages, as well those executed before as after its passage.

When a debt, secured by mortgage, is payable in installments, the mortgagee or his assignee has a right to bring an action to foreclose the mortgage when the first installment falls due and is not paid.

A debt due to the intestate is a personality, and does not descend to the heir like realty, but vests in the administrator, who has the sole right to maintain actions to collect the same, and it is error to join the heir as plaintiff with the administrator in an action to enforce its collection.

Where several notes have been given which are secured by one mortgage, and the notes are assigned to different persons, the assignor has a right, by agreement with the assignees, to fix the rights of the purchasers of the several notes to the mortgage security.

Where in such case the assignee of one note having the first right to the benefit of the mortgage security forecloses when the debt falls due, and obtains a decree under which all the mortgaged property is sold, such foreclosure and sale operate as an extinguishment of the mortgage.

The holders of the other notes secured by the mortgage, have a right to redeem from the sale made under such foreclosure, but when not made parties to the action must assert this right to redeem within four years, or it is barred by the Statute of Limitations.

The right to foreclose and the right to redeem are reciprocal, and the Statute of Limitations as to the right of redemption begins to run at the time the right of action accrues on the mortgage.

APPEAL from the Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the Court.

John B. Hall, for Appellants, Grattan et al.

The mortgage was a common law conveyance, and vested the legal title in the mortgagee.

Grattan v. Wiggins.

Immediately upon the delivery of the deed, Cook was entitled to the possession, and could maintain ejectment for the same; and Wiggins became, and was thereafter, the mere tenant at sufferance of his grantee, and not entitled to notice to quit before suit for possession. (4 Kent's Com. 155 et seq.; Goodwin v. Richardson, Adm'r, 11 Mass. 469; Perkins et al. v. Petts et al., 11 Id. 125; Adams on Eject. 60 et seq. and notes; Id. 33, 520, 521; Smith's Leading Cases, 666; 10 Mo. 229, 230; 2 Parsons on Contracts, 379.)

And once in possession the rule was that the mortgagee could not be evicted until the debt was paid. (Waring v. Long, 2 Barb. Ch. 135.)

No statutes have been, or indeed could constitutionally, have passed, which would have altered that relation of Cook to the premises.

The common law was the rule of decision when this conveyance was executed and delivered (Act of 1850, Ch. 90), and from that law the instrument derived its character, and the parties became invested with their several rights. (Van Maren et al. v. Johnson et al., 15 Cal. 308.)

If a change has been wrought in the legal effect of deeds of mortgage, it has been brought about solely in virtue of Sec. 260 of the Civil Practice Act, passed April, 1851, and which can by no principle of law, right, or justice, be held to take from Cook and his representatives, that which was firmly fixed long before, as his and their rights and estate. (People v. Hays, 4 Cal. 127; Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Id. 589.)

At the common law, and treating the deed of July, 1850, as conveying to the grantee, Cook, the substantial title and ownership, there is no bar by lapse of time to the relief sought, or any part of that relief. The period of twenty years, by analogy to the rule at law, was adopted in equity as the time after which a presumption of payment and of a reconveyance of the title was allowed. But that length of time has not elapsed, and so no impediment arises from that cause. (4 Kent's Com. 189, note a, and the authorities there cited.)

But it may be claimed, that by analogy to the statute of our

Grattan v. Wiggins.

State, the period should be reduced to five years. (Wood's Digest, Arts. 6, 7.) If adopted, however, it would still leave open and operative the rule everywhere recognized, that as the lapse of time only raises a presumption, that presumption may be rebutted by direct proof or by circumstantial evidence showing the fact to be otherwise. (4 Kent's Com. 190; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489.) There was no person in esse, when all the payments after that of January, 1853, became due, to whom the right of action accrued. There was no personal representative of Cook from May 26th, 1853, to December 4th, 1856. Therefore the limitation of the statute never commenced to run as to the five payments maturing at different dates within this space of time. (Smith v. Hall, 19 Cal. 85; Quivey v. Hall, Id. 97.)

If the legal estate passed by virtue of the mortgage, and the mortgagee became the owner, this relation of the parties to the property will be considered by the Court as continuing, and their rights will be determined according to this relation, and will not suffer any impairment by reason of our act prescribing a specific judgment in every case of this class. This bill prays for a decree of strict foreclosure; and yet if this be not grantable, the Court will render a decree in the designated form.

Wallace, for Appellants Laurencel and Eldredge.

There is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff in the complaint. Rebecca Grattan was the widow and heir at law of Grove C. Cook, but she was not an administratrix of the estate; the administrators alone (Hall & Huggins) had the right to maintain a suit respecting the matters set forth in the complaint. If the plaintiff Rebecca could jointly with the plaintiffs Hall & Huggins maintain this suit, then a payment made to her would satisfy the demand, and the estate would be deprived of its assets. She is not entitled to anything or to receive anything, except her distributive share of the estate after it passes through the hands of the administrator in the Probate Court; in other words, the whole complaint may be true, and yet she be entitled to receive nothing, because non constat that the whole of the money sued for may not be applied in the Probate Court to the payment of the debts of the estate. (Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 627.)

Grattan v. Wiggins.

By the terms of the mortgage, Cook was authorized, as the holder of these notes, to foreclose the mortgage if "any one" of the notes should not be "duly and punctually paid." On the first day of December, 1851, when Foster commenced the foreclosure suit against Wiggins, Foster was the holder of the only one of these notes which was not at that time "duly and punctually paid." One note falling due before that time had been paid; none of the other notes, except Foster's note, was due at that time. No right, then, existed to foreclose the mortgage for any note but the Foster note. Now, in order to determine the right which Foster had as assignee of Cook, let us inquire how it would have been if Cook had never assigned the Foster note at all, but had filed his complaint in December, 1851, to foreclose the mortgage as holder of the note and mortgagee. In such a case, is it not clear that Cook might have maintained his suit properly against Wiggins, the mortgagor, upon the allegation that one of the notes was due and unpaid? Would he have been called on in such a bill of complaint to account for the other notes which were not due, and in respect to which no relief was or could be asked? Certainly not. He had a right to sell the whole of the mortgaged premises to pay the note that was due. The terms of the mortgage in this case are precisely similar to the provisions of the Statute of Indiana in relation to the foreclosure of mortgages. (Andrews v. Jones, 3 Blackford, 440; State Bank v. Tweedy, 8 Id. 449.) And it is held in those cases that the whole of the mortgaged property may be sold, and the sale money applied to the payment of the note or installment then due. (See also the dissenting opinion of Ch. J. Gibson, in Donly v. Hayes, 17 S. & R. 400; and the case of Cullum v. Erwin, 4 Alabama, 452.) The dissenting opinion of Ch. J. Gibson, in the case of Donly v. Hayes, supra, is a clear and able exposition of the law in the case at bar. He says: "My position is that the assignee is a purchaser for a valuable consideration of all the securities of the assignor and of all the remedies, and may use them in any way he may think proper as freely and as beneficially as could the assignor himself, to whom it was indisputably competent at the time of the assignment to order the mortgage to stand as a security in the first place for the installment due on the particular bond."

Grattan, v. Wiggins.

In the case of Slee v. Manhattan Company (1 Paige's Ch.), it is held in a case similar to this at bar, that the assignee (who was proven in that case to be a new mortgagee) had power to foreclose and sell the mortgaged property, and that such a sale was binding upon the assignor, though he was not made a party to the proceeding. In that case, as the assignee was in fact a mortgagee of the assigned note and mortgage, and became at the sale a purchaser of the mortgaged premises, he was decreed to be a trustee of the assignor; but it was declared that if a stranger had purchased at such a foreclosure, he would have taken the title free from any question; and that in that event the right of the assignor (which sprung from the fact of his assignment being only to secure a debt that he owed to his assignee, and therefore being only a mortgage) would have rested solely upon the money which was raised by the sale of the land. Here a stranger (Fossatt) did purchase, and has since sold. Cook, therefore, had no interest upon which he ought to have been made a party, except an interest in the surplus of the payment of the Foster note; and until it was ascertained that there was a surplus, he had no business in Court. (The Union Insurance Co. v. Van Rensselaer, 4 Paige, 85.) The right of Cook to redeem (if he had any such right) from the sale in the suit of Foster v. Wiggins, was barred of limitation. The cause of action accrued to Cook during his lifetime, and could not have existed beyond four years of its accrual. (Wood's Dig. Art. 17, p. 47.) The statute having commenced to run during Cook's lifetime, did not stop running on account of his death, and, as a consequence, was barred in the year 1856.

It is admitted in the pleadings, that Laurencel and Eldredge (these appellants) necessarily expended $200,000 in obtaining a confirmation of this claim. Except for this expenditure and effort of theirs, the title to this land was forfeited under the Act of 1851. Will the principles of equity permit these representatives of Cook, who have lain by and quietly witnessed these efforts and expenditures of the appellants, to step forward now and appropriate the results and fruits of that protracted and expensive litigation without any provision or condition for the repayment of that $200,000 claimed and admitted in the face of the Court to have been neces-early expended in good faith by Laurencel and Eldredge! The law of the land having clothed them with the superior legal title to this land, is there a superior equity on the part of the plaintiffs to subject the land to the payment of their stale claim?

William Barber, also, for Respondents Laurencel and Eldredge.

Giving the plaintiffs the benefit of the common law doctrine respecting mortgages, their right of entry would in this case be barred by lapse of time. Our Statute of Limitations was passed April 22d, 1850, and was consequently in operation prior to and at the time of the execution of the mortgage in question. The present suit was commenced January 22d, 1859. The mortgage was executed July 22d, 1850, eight years and a half before this suit was commenced. The right of entry accrued on the execution of the mortgage (McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 407), and the statute began to run from that time. (Doe v. Lightfoot, 8 Mees. & Wels. 553.) As the statute began to run during Cook's lifetime, his decease, February 15th, 1852, did not stop it. (Quivey v. Hall, 19 Cal. 100; Angell on Limitations, 57; Jackson v. Moore, 13 Johns. 513.) This Court decided, in the case of Lord v. Morris (18 Cal. 486), that "in this State the statute applies equally to actions at law and suits in equity."

So far as concerns the remedy of the plaintiffs on the notes of Wiggins, Laurencel and Eldredge have no control over it. But when the plaintiffs seek to obtain satisfaction of their demands against Wiggins personally, by foreclosing a mortgage on which the cause of action accrued more than eight years before they commenced their suit, the present holders and owners of the mortgaged property certainly have a right to insist that this part of the remedy is barred by the statute. The case of Lord v. Morris (18 Cal. 482) decides the principle of this branch of the case.

At the time when the installment of July 21st, 1851, became due, and the right of foreclosure accrued, our statute regulating the foreclosure of mortgages was in operation. (Practice Act of April 29th, 1851, Secs. 246-248; Wood's Digest, 260, Secs. 980-982.) The practice to be pursued where only part of the debt is due is pointed out in the last section of this act: "So soon as sufficient of the property has been sold to pay the amount due, with costs, the sale shall cease; and afterwards as often as more becomes due for principal or interest, the Court may, on motion, order more to be sold. But if the property cannot be sold in portions without injury to the parties, the whole may be ordered to be sold in the first instance, and the entire debt and costs paid, there being a rebate of interest where such rebate is proper."

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. and COPE, C. J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage upon the undivided one-half of the "Rancho de los Capitancillos," in Santa Clara County, executed by Wiggins to one Cook, dated July 22d, 1850, to secure the payment of the sum of $50,000, payable in ten equal installments of $5,000 each, due every six months from the date of the mortgage, with power to the mortgagee to foreclose the mortgage if any one of the payments should not be duly paid. Notes were given at the same date for the several installments. The suit was commenced on the twenty-second day of January, 1859, and the Court held that the action as to all the notes, except the two last, which fell due the twenty-second of January and July, 1855, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and rendered a judgment, which, after reciting that there was due on these notes for principal and interest the sum of $17,097.24, ordered the mortgaged premises to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of this debt and the costs of suit, and if the same should be insufficient to pay the debt, then a judgment should be docketed in favor of the plaintiff Hall, administrator of Cook's estate, against the defendant Wiggins, for such deficiency, and foreclosing the equity of redemption as to the defendants Wiggins, Foster, Laurencel, and Eldredge, and all persons claiming under them, after the twenty-second day of January, 1859, the date of the filing of notice of the pendency of the suit. From this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed, on the ground that the Statute of Limitations was no bar to any of the unpaid notes. The defendants Laurencel and Eldredge, who claim to be the owners of the mortgaged premises, also appeal from the judgment and the order refusing a new trial, on various grounds.

Grattan v. Wiggins.

The record shows that the first of the notes executed by Wiggins to Cook, and which fell due January 22d, 1851, was paid. The second note, which fell due July 22d, 1851, was, on the fifteenth day of May, 1851, assigned by Cook to Foster, one of the defendants, together with the mortgage, which was also delivered, to secure Foster in the payment of the $5,000 called for by the note. The third, fifth, sixth, ninth, and tenth notes have been lost or destroyed. The fourth note, which fell due July 22d, 1852, was, on the twenty-seventh day of June, 1851, assigned by Cook to the defendant Smith, to secure a note for seven hundred and seventy-one dollars and thirty cents, bearing interest at ten per cent. per month, executed by Cook and one McKinney; and Cook also assigned by deed the $50,000 mortgage as further security. The seventh and eighth notes, due January and July 22d, 1854, are in the possession of the defendant Laurencel; but the Court found that he had no interest in or title to them. Cook died February 15th, 1852, and at that time he had all the notes in his possession, except the first, second, and fourth, the two last having been assigned to Foster and Smith. On the ninth day of August, 1858, the defendant Smith assigned the fourth note and the mortgage to Laurencel. The original mortgage was lost by Foster some time about November, 1851.

On the twenty-fifth day of April, 1851, Wiggins conveyed by deed, duly executed, acknowledged, and recorded, all his interest in the mortgaged premises to one Berrian, who, on the thirtieth day of October, 1858, conveyed the same to Laurencel and Eldredge, two of the defendants. On the first day of December, 1851, Foster commenced an action in the proper Court against Wiggins, who was the sole defendant, to recover judgment on the second note, which had been assigned to him, and to foreclose the mortgage; and on the eighteenth day of December, 1851, he recovered a personal judgment therein against Wiggins, and a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises to pay that judgment and foreclosing the equity of redemption. Under this judgment the mortgaged premises were duly sold by the Sheriff to the defendant Fossatt, and on the twenty-sixth day of January, 1852, he executed to Fossatt a deed therefor. Fossatt paid $5,500 for this purchase, which was applied to the payment of the judgment against Wiggins, and the small balance remaining was applied upon an execution in favor of Fossatt against Wiggins; and Fossatt afterward conveyed the premises to Laurencel and Eldredge.

Cook died on the fifteenth day of February, 1852, leaving his wife Rebecca surviving him, and one infant child, who died in June, 1854—and Rebecca intermarried with C. Grattan, August 17th, 1854. The Public Administrator of Santa Clara County was appointed administrator of Cook's estate, June 17th, 1852, and resigned the trust May 26th, 1853, and letters of administration were issued to Hall & Huggins, December 4th, 1856. Huggins died November 19th, 1861. This action was commenced January 22d, 1859, by Rebecca Grattan, as heir at law, and Hall & Huggins as administrators of the estate of Cook.

Fossatt, at the date of the Sheriff's deed, January 26th, 1852, took possession of the mortgaged premises under his deed, and he and Laurencel and Eldredge, his grantees, have been in possession ever since, claiming to be the owners of the premises under the Sheriff's sale and deed. The title of the premises mortgaged by Wiggins was under a Mexican grant, and Fossatt, after his purchase, filed a claim as the owner of this undivided half of the rancho, before the Board of United States Land Commissioners, and prosecuted the same at great expense, and procured a final confirmation of the same to himself on the 18th day of October, 1858. This claim, which also included another undivided one-fourth interest in the rancho, was prosecuted at the request of Laurencel and Eldredge, and at a cost of $200,000.

We will first examine the questions raised by the appeal taken by the plaintiffs. They complain of the judgment, because it was not rendered for the amount of the principal and interest due on all the unpaid notes, to wit: all but the first and second; the first they admit having been paid Wiggins, and the second by the sale under the decree of foreclosure. They claim that none of these unpaid notes are barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that the Court below erred in holding the contrary.

The complaint in this case prays for a personal judgment against Wiggins for the amount of these unpaid notes. Wiggins appeared and demurred to the complaint upon several grounds, but the Statute of Limitations is not one of them. The demurrer was overruled, and no answer appears to have been filed by him, nor does it appear that any default for failing to answer was ever entered against him. The defense of the Statute of Limitations is a personal privilege of the debtor, which he may assert or waive at his option, but it must be set up in some form, either by demurrer or answer, or it will be deemed to have been waived. Under the pleadings in this case, the plaintiffs were entitled to a personal judgment against Wiggins for the whole amount of the unpaid notes, and the Court erred in not rendering judgment accordingly.

The defendants Laurencel and Eldredge, however, set up the Statute of Limitations both by demurrer and answer, but the plaintiffs insist that the right to plead the statute is personal to the debtor, and that therefore they have no right to set it up. It is true, that so far as relates to the personal liability of Wiggins to pay the debt, they cannot plead the statute so as to affect that right. But the plaintiffs ask for other relief; that is, the sale of the mortgaged premises to pay the debt. The defendants Laurencel and Eldredge, claiming the title to these premises as grantees of the estate of the mortgagor, as well as under the decree of foreclosure in the suit of Foster, have a direct interest in defeating the claim of the plaintiffs to a decree of foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises, and have a clear right to plead the statute against that part of the claim of the plaintiffs. (Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; McCarthy v. White, 21 Id. 425.) The waiver of this defense by Wiggins could not operate as a waiver by the other defendants, or affect their rights in any way.

But the plaintiffs insist that as the mortgage was executed on the twenty-second of July, 1850, before the two hundred and sixtieth section of the Practice Act of 1851 was in force, therefore they have the same rights and remedies as are provided at common law for the enforcement of the mortgage, among which is the right of the mortgagee to the possession of the premises. Sec. 260 provides that "a mortgage of real property shall not be deemed a conveyance, whatever its terms, so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover the possession of the real property, without a foreclosure and sale." It clearly applies to all mortgages, as well those executed before as after its passage. It relates substantially to the remedy for the enforcement of the rights of the mortgagee; for although by the strict rules of the common law a mortgage was deemed to vest a conditional estate in the realty in the mortgagee, which became absolute upon a failure to perform the conditions, yet equity always treated it substantially as a security for a debt; and if the mortgagee took possession under his common law right, equity compelled him to account for the rents and profits which were applied in liquidation of the mortgage debt. So that this section of the Act of 1851 cannot, so far as it applies to mortgages passed prior to its passage, be held as divesting a vested right of property, but as merely taking away, or rather, changing the form of the remedy, to enforce a right. Indeed, the provisions of the Practice Act of 1850, which were in force at the making of this mortgage, have substantially the same effect. Secs. 309, 310, and 311 of that act provide that in proceeding to enforce a mortgage it shall not be necessary to make other incumbrancers parties, but the action may be against the mortgagor alone, alleging in the complaint the existence of the debt and of the mortgage, and praying a sale of the property; that the judgment by which a mortgage is enforced shall be for the sale of the property for the satisfaction of the debt, and if the proceeds be insufficient to pay it, execution shall be issued for the residue; and that upon this judgment an order of sale shall issue, and the property be sold thereon in the same manner as under executions. Under this statute, if a mortgagee should bring an action to enforce his mortgage by a recovery of the possession of the mortgaged property under this common law right, the Court would be compelled in rendering judgment to follow the provisions of Sec. 310, which says that "the judgment by which a mortgage is enforced shall be," etc. In considering this question Chief Justice Field, in his opinion in the case of Dutton v. Warschauer (21 Cal. 623), after a full examination of the authorities, says: "Mortgages, therefore, executed before the statute (of 1851) can only be treated as conveyances when that character is essential to protect the just rights of the mortgagee; mortgages since the statute are regarded at all times as mere securities, creating only a lien or incumbrance, and not passing any estate in the premises." And he accordingly ruled that a mortgagee, although in possession after condition broken, could not convey the legal title. The other Judges specially concurred in the judgment, and the opinion can therefore have no weight as an authoritative decision of the law.

Grattan v. Wiggins.

Whatever may be the construction of these sections of the Practice Act of 1850, or of Sec. 260 of the Act of 1851, it is a sufficient answer to this position of the plaintiffs that this is not an action to enforce any asserted right of possession in the mortgagee, but an action founded entirely upon and seeking to enforce the remedies provided by the present statute for the foreclosure of mortgages, and must, of course, be governed by the same rules of law as all other actions of like character. By those rules, as repeatedly held by this Court, the mortgage is barred by the same lapse of time as other contracts in writing. The same result follows when it is considered that the Statute of Limitations, which bars actions upon contracts or liabilities, founded upon instruments in writing after the lapse of four years, was in force prior to the execution of these notes and mortgages; though we would not wish to be understood by this as holding that, if it had not been adopted until afterwards, it would not equally operate as a bar.

The plaintiffs, however, claim that although the action is for a foreclosure of the mortgage, yet the Court could treat it as an action for the possession of the land, under the common law right of possession vested in the mortgagee. Although we consider that form of remedy as no longer existing, and that it is doubtful whether the Court can thus radically change the character of the action, yet there are conclusive answers to this claim. 1st. As an action for the possession, the date of the right of action is the date of the mortgage, and more than five years elapsed from that time before the commencement of the suit. In answer to this, the plaintiffs say that the possession of the mortgagor and those claiming under him was as tenants at sufferance of the mortgagee; that their possession was not, therefore, adverse, and so the statute did not apply. Even if this were so, their possession was clearly adverse when they took possession under the Sheriff's deed, for then they claimed a right of possession superior to and adverse to the claim of the mortgagee, and more than five years had elapsed since the date of that deed. 2d. The assignment of the mortgage to Foster and the deed from Cook to Smith would operate at common law as a transfer of this right of possession in the mortgagee to those parties, and thus defeat the right of the present plaintiffs to recover the possession under this asserted common law right.

There was no administrator on Cook's estate from May 26th, 1853, to December 4th, 1856, during which time the last five notes fell due, and it is now insisted that as there was no person authorized to bring actions on these notes when they fell due, therefore the Statute of Limitations did not commence running until December 4th, 1856, and so the time had not expired when this suit was commenced, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on all these five notes, instead of the two last, which alone were allowed by the Court. Upon this point we are referred to the cases of Smith v. Hall (19 Cal. 85) and Quivey v. Hall (Id. 97). But in those cases the administrator was defendant, and not the plaintiff as in the present, and the rule of law is entirely different in the two classes of cases. Sec. 24 of the statute regulates both, and there is nothing in that section which relieves the plaintiffs in this case from the bar of the statute. Besides, there were administrators of the estate before any of these five last notes had been barred who could have commenced actions thereon.

The mortgagee and those claiming under him had a clear right to bring an action to foreclose the mortgage when any one installment fell due and was unpaid, both by the terms of the mortgage and the provisions of Sec. 248 of the Practice Act, the latter of which regulates fully the proceedings in cases where the mortgage debt is payable in installments. It is urged that the heir at law was ignorant of the law which rendered the proceedings of Foster to foreclose the mortgage invalid, and this is a good excuse for not bringing this action sooner, and a good reason why the Court should hold the statute no bar; but we do not deem that a valid ground for setting aside a plain provision of the law. As to the hardship of the case, arising from ignorance of the law relating to necessary parties to foreclosure suits, it can be plead with much greater force and reason by the defendants than the plaintiffs. We have carefully examined the points made by the plaintiffs in their appeal from the judgment, and have come to the conclusion that the Court below did not err in holding the statute, as plead by the defendants Laurencel and Eldridge, a bar to all the notes falling due prior to the two last so far as relates to the mortgage.

II. The next questions to examine are those raised by the defendants Laurencel and Eldredge by their appeal. The first point is, that the Court below erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint filed by those defendants. One of the grounds of the demurrer was, that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, in this, that Rebecca Grattan should not have been joined with the administrators in the suit. She is the heir at law of her deceased husband and child. This ground of demurrer was well taken, and the Court erred in not sustaining it. The action is to recover a debt alleged to be due to the estate, and relates entirely to the personality, which does not descend to the heir like realty, but vests in the administrator, who has the sole right to maintain actions, to collect debts due the deceased. (Wood's Dig. 400, 411.) And until the estate is finally settled he has the right to maintain all suits for the possession of the real property of the estate. (Meeks v. Hahn, 20 Cal. 620.)

The appellants also insist that under the pleadings and the findings of the Court the plaintiffs were not entitled to any judgment whatever against Laurencel and Eldredge; and this necessarily requires an investigation of the merits of the whole case. The first question we propose to examine is the effect of the foreclosure of the mortgage by Foster upon the rights of the parties. The plaintiffs insist that those proceedings were utterly null and void, and did not affect the rights of the parties in any way (except, perhaps, to operate as a satisfaction of the second note), because Smith, the holder of the fourth note, and Cook, the mortgagee and the holder of all the other notes, and Berrian, the grantee of the mortgagor, were not made parties to the action. On the contrary, the defendants claim that the three hundred and ninth section of the Practice Act of 1850, which provided that "in proceedings to enforce a mortgage it shall not be necessary to make other incum-brancers parties, but the creditor may maintain his action against the mortgagor alone," etc., governed the action, and therefore it was not necessary to make them parties.

In this the defendants are mistaken. The action was commenced December 1st, 1851, after the Practice Act of 1851, which repealed the Act of 1850, had taken effect; and the proceedings were, therefore, governed by the Act of 1851, which contained no provision of a like character.

The action to foreclose the mortgage was brought by Foster upon the second note, the first having been paid; and it is an important question what his rights were relative to the holders of the other notes. Where several notes have been given which are secured by one mortgage, and they are assigned to different persons, it has been a question whether each holder of a note is entitled to a pro rata interest in the mortgage, or whether the holder of the note first falling due, or of the note first assigned, has priority over the others and can apply the proceeds of the mortgaged property to the full payment of his note, to the exclusion of the others when the same is insufficient to pay all. In the absence of any special agreement with the mortgagee, it would seem to be but just and equitable that each should be entitled to a pro rata share, upon the principle that equity delights in equality. (Phelans v. Olney, 6 Cal. 480; Donly v. Hays, 17 S. & R. 400; Henderson v. Herrod, 10 S. & M. 681; McVay v. Bloodgood, 9 Porter, 547.)

Yet there are several authorities which hold that the rule of priority prevails. (State Bank v. Towdy, 8 Blackford, 447; Colburn v. Irwin, 4 Ala. 452; Bank of U. S. v. Covert, 18 Ohio, 240; Hunt v. Stiles, 10 N. H. 466.)

But it is clear that the mortgagee has the right by agreement to fix the rights of the holders of the several notes to the mortgage security, and such an agreement may be implied from the circumstances of the transfer. (Sherwood v. Dunbar, 6 Cal. 53; Keyes v. Wood, 21 Vermont, 339; Langdon v. Keith, 9 Id. 299; Wright v. Parker, 2 Aikins, 212; Pattison v. Hull, 9 Cowen, 752; McVay v. Bloodgood, 9 Porter, 547; Banks v. Tarleton, 23 Miss. 173.)

Sec. 248 of the Practice Act provides that a mortgage given to secure installments due at different times may be foreclosed

when any one or more installments are due, and if the property cannot be sold in portions without injury to the parties, the whole may be sold. A foreclosure and sale in such case would clearly operate as an extinguishment of the mortgage, whether the proceeds were sufficient to pay the whole debt or not. (Kimmel v. Willard, 1 Doug. Mich. 217; McGrew v. Lanahan, 1 Penn. 44; Salmon v. Clagett, 3 Bland. Oh. 180; Brinkerhoff v. Thallheimer, 2 J. C. 485; Campbell v. Macomb, 4 Id. 534; Banks v. Chester, 1 Jones, 290.)

In this case, the Court found "that at the time of the transfer and delivery of the note to Foster, Cook also assigned and delivered the mortgage to Foster to secure him in the payment of the $5,000 called for by the note." This shows a special agreement between Cook, who then held all the notes, and Foster, by which the latter was to hold the mortgage as security for the payment of the note then assigned to him, thereby giving him a right to full payment from the proceeds of the mortgage. This agreement, as we have shown, the parties had a right to make, and the Courts will enforce it.

It follows, therefore, that Foster had the right to foreclose the mortgage and sell the whole of the mortgaged property, or so much thereof as might be necessary for the payment of that part of the mortgage debt held by him; that the holders of the other notes had no right to require him to pay them a pro rata portion of the proceeds of the sale, and if it required a sale of the whole of the mortgaged property to pay his debt, it would leave nothing upon which they could claim any lien or incumbrance. The interest of the holders of the other notes was not that of subsequent incumbrancers to Foster, but simply as parties having an interest in the same incumbrance upon such portion of the mortgaged premises as might remain after the satisfaction of that portion of the debt held by Foster. They could not properly be designated as the holders of a junior incumbrance, because they claim under the same mortgage, and not by a junior one. They had an interest in a portion of the mortgaged debt; that is, that portion of it held by them, but not in that portion held by Foster. They would have been proper parties as co-plaintiffs with Foster, in the suit to foreclose, so that they could receive any overplus of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property which might remain after the payment of Foster's debt, but they were not necessary parties in the sense that no decree of foreclosure could be made without bringing them in. They could not insist upon having their claim to this surplus litigated until it was ascertained that there would be a surplus. (Union Ins. Co. v. Van Rensselaer, 4 Paige, 83.) It is true that their interest in the mortgaged debt and lien could not be affected by a decree rendered in a suit to which they were not made parties; still, if, as we have shown, that interest only extended to a right to have the surplus proceeds of the sale applied to their debt, it would have made very little difference in this case whether they were made parties or not, for the surplus remaining amounted to only about five hundred dollars. That surplus Smith, as the assignee of the fourth note and of the mortgage, had a right to have applied on his note, and upon a proper application to the Court would have ordered that surplus to be paid to him. But neither Cook nor the present plaintiffs have any claim upon this surplus, and have no just right to complain that they were not made parties to the foreclosure suit, for the result has shown that they would have received no benefit from it, as the proceeds of the sale were entirely insufficient to reach the notes held by Cook. Whatever claim or interest Smith may have had in the mortgage or the mortgage debt he transferred to the defendants Laurencel and Eldredge, which would at least transfer the right to this surplus.

But even if they ought properly to have been treated as the holders of incumbrances subsequent to that of Foster, we do not see that the plaintiffs would be in any better position. The law seems to be pretty well settled, that junior incumbrancers are not necessary, though proper parties to an action to foreclose a mortgage. (Kirkham v. Dupont, 14 Cal. 559; Story's Eq. Pl. Sec. 193, note; Calvert Parties in Equity, 132-137.) They have a right to redeem the prior mortgage, and if they are not made parties to the action to foreclose the mortgage, that right of redemption still remains unaffected by the decree and sale under it. By the transfer of the fourth note and the mortgage to Smith, he stood next to Foster, as the holder of that part of the incumbrance to be first paid after Foster, and his rights, whatever they were, were afterwards transferred to Laurencel and Eldredge. The present plaintiffs have no right to object to the proceedings in the foreclosure suit, that Smith was not made a party, for they are not in any way injured by it. (Whiting v. Bank of the United States, 13 Peters, 14.) Then as to Cook and his legal representatives, he had a right, as such subsequent incumbrancer, to commence his action to redeem the prior mortgage of Foster, and this right of action accrued at the date of the assignment of the note and mortgage by him to Foster, May 15th, 1851. This right of redemption accrued at that date, and as he was not made a party to the foreclosure suit it continued unaffected by those proceedings. But this right of action was liable to be barred by the lapse of time, if not prosecuted within the time fixed by the Statute of Limitations. This action was not commenced until the twenty-second day of January, 1859, nearly seven years after the date of the deed to Fossatt, and the possession of the mortgaged premises by him under it. Fossatt and those holding under him had thus held the undisturbed and undisputed possession of the premises, claiming title thereto exclusive of all others, founded upon a written instrument purporting to be a conveyance of the premises in question, from the twenty-sixth day of January, 1852, to the commencement of this action. Treating this right of redemption, asserted by the plaintiffs in their complaint, as founded upon an instrument of writing, or as included among actions for relief not specially provided for, and therefore as included under Secs. 17-19 of the statute, in either case the action, so far as it is founded upon this right of redemption, is barred, not having been commenced within four years.

In England it was held that Courts of Equity were not within the statute, because its words applied only to particular legal forms of action; but they still applied the statute to suits in equity, in obedience to the law. Thus, as an action for the recovery of real estate was barred by twenty years' adverse possession, it was held that where the mortgagee had for twenty years held possession of the mortgaged premises, without acknowledging the existence of the mortgage, equity would presume that the mortgage had been foreclosed, and that he held by an absolute title, and these facts were a positive bar to relief. (Angell on Limit. 24, 25; 2 Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 1520.) In Slee v. Manhattan Co. (1 Paige, 48), Slee had assigned a mortgage to secure a debt to the defendants, which they had foreclosed as to the mortgagors, and bid in the property, and then refused to let him redeem; it was held that as the defendants had purchased the property he had a right to redeem the land, but if it had been purchased by a stranger he could only have redeemed the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the defendants; and that this right of redemption was liable to be barred by the lapse of time. (Moore v. Cable, 1 J. C. 385; Cook v. Arnham, 3 P. Wm. 283; 3 Atk. 313.) Even if our statute had not included equitable actions, it is clear, under the English rule, that as it has fixed five years for the limitation of actions for the recovery of real estate, the adverse possession by a mortgagee for that period would operate as a bar. So too, Courts of Equity always proceeded, upon general principles of their own, even where there was no analogous statutable bar, and refused relief to stale demands, where a party had slept upon his right and acquiesced for a great length of time. And in thus refusing relief equity often allowed a much shorter time than that fixed by the Statute of Limitations to operate as a bar. (2 Story's Eq. Juris. Sec. 1520, and note.) And the same principle has been fully recognized by this Court. (Dominguez v. Dominguez, 7 Cal. 424; Green v. Covillaud, 10 Id. 329.)

But our Statute of Limitations applies to suits in equity as well as actions of law. While the English statute applied only to particular forms of action, such as assumpsit, trespass, and the like, the law of this State applies to the subject matter of the suit, regardless of the form or name of the action, or the forum in which it is brought. This Court has, therefore, held that it applies to suits in equity equally with actions in law. (Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; McCarthy v. White, 21 Id. 496; Pearis v. Covillaud, 6 Id. 617.)

In the first two of the above cases the action was by the mortgagee to foreclose the mortgage, and it was held that the action must be brought within four years from the time the right of action accrued. It is held that "the right to foreclose and the right to redeem are reciprocal and commensurable," and if one cannot be enforced, that is regarded as sufficient to preclude a claim for the other. Thus if the right to foreclose is barred by the lapse of time, the right to redeem is equally barred. (2 Hilliard on Mortgages, 2, 3, 14, 15.) We therefore hold that the right to redeem, asserted by the plaintiffs in this case, was barred by the Statute of Limitations, as well as by the staleness of the claim and the acquiescence of the parties.

The decree of foreclosure was not absolutely void. It was valid as against the mortgagor, who was the sole defendant. He was a necessary party to the suit to foreclose, for although he had previously conveyed the mortgaged premises yet it does not appear that his vendee had assumed to pay the mortgage debts. (Shaw v. Hoadley, 8 B. & C. 165; Swift v. Edson, 5 Conn. 551; Brown v. Stead, 5 Simons, 535; Story's Eq. Pl. Sec. 196.) "The decree concluded the rights of the parties to the action, and the sale under it, consummated by the Sheriff's deed, passed, as against them, the entire estate held by the mortgagor at the date of the mortgage." (Montgomery v. Middlemiss, 21 Cal. 106.) Where a party in possession was made a party to the foreclosure suit, his rights, whatever they may have been, are cut off by the decree. (Shores v. Scott River Co., 21 Cal. 139.)

But while the decree was valid and effectual as against the mortgagor, and bound all the right, title, and interest he may have had in the premises, if any, and also barred his right and equity of redemption, yet it did not affect the rights of his vendee, Berrian. The latter still held the equity of redemption, which, as against him, was not foreclosed by the decree, he not having been made a party. He still retained the right, notwithstanding the decree of sale, to pay the amount of the mortgage debt held by Foster, and thus clear the premises from the incumbrance to that extent. The title acquired by Fossatt, the purchaser at the Sheriff's sale, was subject to this right of redemption, and thus open to the contingency of being entirely defeated by such redemption. (Story's Eq. Pl. Sec. 75.) But this right of redemption should, as we have already shown, have been asserted by action brought within the time fixed by the Statute of Limitations. No action of the kind appears ever to have been brought. The present action is brought by the legal representatives of the original mortgagee, and the plaintiffs do not pretend to claim any rights derived from the mortgagor or his grantees. The latter is the only person who has the right to disturb the title acquired by Fossatt and those claiming under him, on the ground of this unforeclosed right of redemption. The present plaintiffs have no right to make the objection or to attack the purchaser's title on that ground. If Berrian saw fit to waive or sleep on his rights and allow them to be barred, he alone is injured, and no other person can assert rights thus lost. The Statute of Limitations has been well said to be a statute of repose, putting an end to strife and litigation and bringing peace and security to the community. This applies especially to titles to real estate. Nothing so much retards the growth and prosperity of a country as insecurity of titles to real estate. During litigation respecting them the land becomes waste and unproductive, for parties will not improve while their title is doubtful. Consequently, no legislation has been more generally approved than that relating to the quieting of land titles and the limitation of actions respecting them. (Angell on Lim. 7, 8.) It is in this view that the Legislature of this State has prescribed the short period of five years as the most extended period of limitation of actions relating to real estate, and it is the plain duty of the Court to strictly enforce it for the good of society and as conservators of the law.

Lapse of time not only applies as a defense to an action, but it forms the basis of a new title acquired by prescription which is founded upon the statute. The term "limitation" is held to mean "the time which is prescribed by the authority of the law, during which a title may be acquired to property by virtue of a simple adverse possession and enjoyment; or, the time at the end of which no action at law or suit in equity can be maintained." (Angell on Lim. 1.) "As a general doctrine it has too long been established to be now in the least degree controverted, that what the law deems a perfect possession, if continued without interruption during the whole period which is prescribed by the statute for the enforcement of the right of entry, is evidence of a fee." (Id. 396.) "It is also unquestionable, that where land has been sold under a claim to the fee for the time prescribed by the statute, and an entry is made by the party who has the written title, such party may be dispossessed by an ejectment brought by him who so held and claimed." (Id. 398.) "A fortiori, will the doctrine as above laid down be acted upon by Courts of Equity." (Id. 399.)

In the present case Fossatt entered into possession in good faith, in the belief that he had a good right and title to the property, with the intention to hold it against all the world. This possession was taken under and in pursuance of a deed which purported to convey the title under a claim of title in fee, and this possession was adverse not only to Cook and those claiming under him, but to all other persons, at its commencement, and so continued in Fossatt and those claiming under him for more than five years. We think it clear that these facts constitute a full defense to the claim sought to be enforced by the present plaintiffs, under the Statute of Limitations, though all of them may not be essential to constitute an adverse possession.

It is urged by Laurencel and Eldredge, that as Fossatt, under whom they claim, was the confinee in the Courts of the United States, under the proceedings instituted by him therein, and as Cook never filed any claim in the National Courts, the title thus acquired by Fossatt cannot be affected by any claim of Cook or his legal representatives, referring us to the case of Estrada v. Murphy (19 Cal. 248.) Under the view we have taken we deem it unnecessary to determine this question. But the fact that Cook and his legal representatives stood by for years and permitted Fossatt, under his purchase, to prosecute this claim, and expend a large sum of money in perfecting the title, without giving notice of his claim, or offering to bear the expense, or incur the risk and uncertainty of the litigation, is such fraudulent conduct and concealment as would induce a Court of Equity to refuse them all aid, at least, until they had fully indemnified Fossatt and those claiming under him for all these expenditures. (1 Story's Equity, 385, 388; Bryan v. Ramirez, 8 Cal. 467; Farley v. Vaughn, 11 Id. 237.) And it was clearly error in the decree, that this right of the defendants to be reimbursed these expenditures was not provided for.

The respondents insist that as the mortgage was executed prior to the passage of the Practice Act of 1851, the mortgagee was vested with all the rights of a mortgagee at common law, including the right to a decree of strict foreclosure—that is, a decree foreclosing all the equities of redemption, and declaring the absolute title vested in them, without any sale of the mortgaged premises. It is clear, however, that in no view of the case are they entitled to such a decree. The mortgage was executed after the passage of the Practice Act of 1850, and is therefore governed by it. The three hundred and ninth, three hundred and tenth, and three hundred and eleventh sections of that act, provide how a mortgage shall be enforced, and that the judgment “shall be, that the property mortgaged be sold for the satisfaction of the debt,” which clearly takes away the right to a judgment of strict foreclosure under the common law.

They also claim that Cook was not affected with the notice of the suit of Foster v. Wiggins, because no notice of lis pendens was filed in the Recorder's office, in accordance with Sec. 27 of the Practice Act. Cook was not a purchaser or incumbrancer of the property, pending the action, and it is doubtful, therefore, whether this section applies to him. In Richardson v. White (18 Cal. 106) it was held to apply to those purchasing or taking incumbrances upon the property during the pendency of the action. (Ault v. Gassaway, 18 Cal. 205.) But this section applies only to actions pending, and not to judgments and decrees rendered, which at common law, it would seem, were notice to all persons. (Sorrell v. Carpenter, 2 P. Wm. 482; Searle v. Lane, 2 Vernon, 37, 88; Monell v. Lawrence, 12 Johns. 534; Wattington v. Howley, 1 Dessausurre, 170.) In the present case, the attorney of Foster, who foreclosed the mortgage, testified that before he brought the suit he informed Cook that he was about to do so, to which Cook replied that he did not care, or something to that effect. Whether this was notice or not, it was sufficient to put him upon inquiry. The recording of the Sheriff's deed to Fossatt and the possession taken by Fossatt under it, were at least notice of his claim, but it was nearly seven years afterwards that this action was commenced. The Statute of Limitations, in its effects upon the rights of the parties in this case, does not depend upon any question of notice to Cook of the pendency of the foreclosure suit.

On the twenty-third day of April, 1851, Wiggins, the mortgagor, conveyed all his right, title, and interest in the property to Berrian, who, on the thirtieth day of October, 1858, conveyed the same to Laurencel and Eldredge, and the respondents insist that by taking this conveyance the title of the latter became subject to the mortgage, and that they are estopped from contesting it. The record does not disclose whether the deed to Laurencel and Eldredge was a warranty or a mere quitclaim. In the absence of proof we could not presume that it contained any covenants of warranty. There is, however, no evidence that the latter ever agreed with Berrian, or any else, to pay the mortgage, or in any way recognized it as a lien upon the property. At the date of this deed to them, Foster and they had been in the undisturbed possession of the premises, claiming the same as owners against all the world, for nearly seven years; a sufficient length of time, as we have shown, to bar all equities of redemption. They did not acquire the possession with or under this deed, and are not estopped from denying that they acquired any title under it. By taking the deed they neither parted with nor lost any rights they had acquired under Fossatt, and by lapse of time either as against Berrian or the representatives of Cook; nor did they thereby subject themselves to any obligations or burdens that did not exist against them before. A similar principle was established by this Court in San Francisco v. Lawton (18 Cal. 466).

It follows that the Court below erred in rendering the decree against the defendants who appeal. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the Court below is directed to enter a judgment dismissing the action as against all the defendants, except Wiggins, and in favor of said defendants for their costs, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings against the defendant Wiggins.

Donner v. Palmer.

DONNER v. PALMER—BRADLEY, INTERVENOR.

UPON filing a certified copy of a judgment with a County Recorder it becomes a lien upon the debtor's real property in that county for two years from the date of the filing, notwithstanding a lien by virtue of the same judgment has previously existed and expired by lapse of time in another county. The amendment of 1862 to Sec. 193 of the Practice Act, allowing the affidavits of jurors to be received to impeach their own verdict, relates merely to the remedy and governs in all applications for new trial made after its passage, although the verdict and judgment sought to be set aside were rendered previously.

A verdict to which the assent of any of the jurors was obtained by a resort to chance will be set aside.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

S. O. Houghton, for Plaintiff.

Sec. 207 should not be construed alone nor according to its strict letter, but must be construed together with the other provisions of the statute relating to the same subject.

Sec. 209 provides "that execution may issue at any time within five years after the entry of judgment. After that time the judgment has no vitality and has ceased to exist.

If the position of respondent is correct, and the effect of Sec. 207 is to permit the lien of a judgment to be revived in any county other than that in which it is docketed, after the lapse of more than two years from the time of the docketing thereof, it may be done at any time within five years after the entry of judgment, and a judgment lien can be created and made to continue a considerable period of time beyond the life of the judgment itself. For to accomplish that result, it would only be necessary to file the transcript in another county a few days, even one day, before the expiration of five years, and create a lien to run two years from the date of such filing, thus producing the extraordinary result of having a judgment lien where no judgment exists to be enforced. This would be utterly absurd, yet such must be the case if that section must be construed according to its very letter.

Donner a. Palmer.

Or the transcript might be filed in another county a day before the judgment expired, and an execution issued and levied the same day, and a sale had by virtue thereof after the judgment had ceased to have any force. This would be equally absurd, and demonstrates clearly the incorrectness of the view taken of the law by our opponents.

It is a familiar rule of interpretation of statutes, that the intent of the lawmaker must be carried out, when it can be ascertained, and that intent allowed to prevail over the literal sense of the terms employed, and control the strict letter of the law, where the letter would lead to possible absurdity. Smith on stat. and constit. law, 662, Sec. 515.

This rule has been applied by this Court to Sec. 207 under consideration, in the case of Bowman v. Hovious (17 Cal. 471).

In that case effect was not given to the strict letter, for the reason that it would have led to the absurdity of reviving and extending a lien two years upon the same property, after it had been already subjected to the lien of the same judgment for one term of two years.

It was evidently the intent of the Legislature, that, where a judgment debtor had property in other counties than that in which the judgment was entered, the creditor would immediately after the entry of judgment cause a transcript thereof to be filed in such other counties, and create liens thereon. And it was evidently intended that these liens should not be continued for any great period; that the creditor should within a reasonable time subject the property of his debtor to the satisfaction of his demand, and not tie it up from other creditors. And with that object the continuance of the lien was limited to two years in the county where the judgment should be entered.

E. A. Lawrence, for Respondent Bradley.

The only point is, whether the taking out of the transcript of the judgment in the case of Cobb v. Yontz, in Santa Clara County, after the two years had expired, and filing it in San Francisco, created any lien upon the premises. If it did, then the charge of the Court was clearly erroneous, and intervenor is entitled to a new trial.

Donner v. Palmer.

I find no authorities on the point. The nearest approach to an authority is Bowman v. Hovious (17 Cal. 471). But although this point was alluded to in the briefs of counsel, that case passed off on other grounds. In New York the lien only runs ten years from the date of docketing of the judgment in the county where rendered. (Voorhies' N. Y. Code, Sec. 282.) With us the lien runs two years from filing the transcript. (Pr. Act, Sec. 207.)

If a judgment is rendered to-day in San Francisco, it at once becomes a lien; but if a transcript is sent to San Bernardino, to be filed, it may be two months before it is filed there, and yet the lien will hold in that county two months after it has expired in this county. It does not become a lien in any other county until filed there. It is not required to be filed there forthwith, or within two years, and it is plain the statute intended to give the party the benefit of a two years' lien, wherever he might file the transcript, so that he did within the life of the judgment. If it were otherwise, the Legislature would have adopted the language of Sec. 282 of the N. Y. Code, from which our Practice Act is taken, which would have the view contended for by the learned counsel. But the Legislature, in this section, have studiously avoided reenacting the N. Y. Code.

The statute imposes no limit upon the time in which the transcript shall be filed, and the Court can impose none. The only penalty for not filing it is, that the lien will not attach until it is filed, and the law has wisely left it to the convenience and the discretion of the party to determine when he shall secure the lien.

When the lien has once attached it can only run for two years. It is not in the power of the Court or of the parties to extend it beyond that time, and for the Court to declare that the lien shall not attach, where the transcript has been filed after two years from the date of the judgment, is virtually to repeal the statute.

I do not perceive the absurdity of having a lien, after the five years' limitation has run upon a judgment. That was a mere limitation of right to bring suit upon the judgment — non constat that the judgment was dead. On the contrary until Sec. 214 was repealed, execution might issue after five years and during the whole time of limitation at common law, by an order of the Court.

Donner v. Palmer.

But that point has no bearing in this case, because the last clause of Sec. 207 is a complete answer to appellant's objection: "The lien shall continue for two years, unless the judgment be previously satisfied."

If, then, as appellant contends, the judgment is satisfied by the five years' limitation, the lien falls with it. If he files his transcript in another county four years after the date of the judgment, he has a lien for only one year. At any time within three years from date of the judgment he can have a lien for two years, "unless the judgment be previously satisfied."

Neither can this section be impaired or defeated by construing it with other sections of the statute, but gains additional plausibility from such construction.

If, as it is contended, it was the intention of the Legislature that the transcript should be filed in another county forthwith, or at any rate within two years, it would have been very natural for them to have put it into the statute. If, however, they intended to let the party who held the judgment, suit his own time and convenience for filing the same, as we contend, they would undoubtedly have used the very language of the act. The absurdity of respondent's proposition is apparent when you apply it to a Justice's judgment, which may become a lien by complying with Sec. 599 of the Practice Act. The statute prescribes no limitation of time within which to file the transcript of the Justice's judgment, and yet upon the theory of respondents, it could not be filed after two years.

At common law there was no lien. It is purely the creature of statute. (Ackley et al. v. Chamberlin, 16 Cal. 181.) And where that statute in plain and simple terms prescribes how the lien may be acquired, it would be unwise and unjust for the Court to involve it in any mysticism. A large number of titles in this State depend upon the construction for which we contend. Until the decision of Judge Campbell in this case, the searchers of titles always passed them upon the hypothesis, that filing the transcript in another county, even after the lien had expired in the first county, created a lien for two years thereafter.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

Donner v. Palmer.

This is an action to recover the possession of a one hundred vara lot in the City of San Francisco, the plaintiff claiming to be the owner of the entire estate. During the pendency of the action Bradley intervened, claiming, as against both plaintiff and defendant, that he was the owner of the undivided one-fourth of the lot, and entitled to the possession to that extent. The issue between plaintiff and the intervenor was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts. The issues between the plaintiff and the defendants were tried by a jury, except those relating to certain tax titles, which were submitted to the Court. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants and the intervenor; the Court found in favor of the plaintiff upon the questions relating to the tax titles, and on the first day of March, 1862, judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants and the intervenor, dismissing the complaint of the intervenor, and for the recovery of the possession of the premises and costs. On the sixth day of March, 1862, the defendants and the intervenor each served and filed notices of motions for a new trial, and on the twentieth day of December, 1862, the Court made an order denying defendants' motion, and granting the motion of the intervenor, adding, "or that the judgment be modified as to him." On the sixteenth day of January, 1863, the Court, on motion of the plaintiff's attorney, made an order setting aside and vacating the order of December 20th, and entered a new order, as of the last date, which, after reciting that the defendants' motion for a new trial was made upon a certain statement and certain affidavits describing them, and that it was opposed with certain affidavits on the part of the plaintiff, and that the intervenor had also moved for a new trial, upon a statement filed, ordered that the motion of the defendants be denied, and that of the intervenor be granted. From this judgment and these orders, the defendants appeal; and from the order granting the intervenor a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. Each of these appeals are prosecuted separately, but we have preferred to consider them together.

The claim of the intervenor is founded upon this state of facts: On the tenth day of April, 1858, Donner conveyed the undivided one-third of the premises to John Yontz; on the fifteenth day of

Donner v. Palmer.

August, 1856, one Cobb recovered a judgment in the District Court for Santa Clara County, for seven hundred and ninety-six dollars, against Yontz, a transcript of which was duly recorded in the County Recorder's office of San Francisco, on the tenth day of December, 1858; an execution duly issued on said judgment on the fifteenth day of November, 1859, directed to the Sheriff of the County of San Francisco, which was levied on the interest of said Yontz on the premises, and the same was sold under the same execution on the twenty-eighth day of March, 1860, to one Eastland, and a Sheriff's deed was executed to him at the expiration of the time of redemption, and afterwards Eastland conveyed the same to Bradley, the intervenor. Mary Williams instituted a suit against said Yontz in the District Court of Santa Clara County, in which an attachment was issued and levied upon the premises upon the eighth day of January, 1859; a judgment was recovered in said action, on which an execution was issued under which all the interest of said Yontz in the premises was, on the ninth day of March, 1861, sold to the plaintiff and a deed therefor made in pursuance of said sale, after the expiration of the time for redemption. Under this state of facts the simple question is, which of these two parties, the intervenor or the plaintiff, has the better right and title to this interest of Yontz. The plaintiff contends that as the judgment of Cobb was not filed in the Recorder's office of San Francisco until more than two years after it was rendered and docketed in Santa Clara County, and after the lien there had expired by limitation, the judgment was no lien upon any property in San Francisco. In this he is mistaken. The lien in such cases is clearly defined by the provisions of Sec. 207 of the Practice Act, which reads as follows: "A transcript of the original docket, certified by the Clerk, may be filed with the Recorder of any other county; and from the time of the filing, the judgment shall be a lien upon all the real property of the judgment debtor, not exempt from execution, in such county, owned by him at the time, or which he may afterwards acquire, until the said lien expires. The lien shall continue for two years, unless the judgment be previously satisfied." The statute is plain that the lien commences at the time of the filing of the transcript in the Recorder's office, and continues for two years from that time, unless the judgment be satisfied before that time expires. No language could more clearly express that to be the meaning and intention of the Legislature, and we can perceive no injustice or hardship in it. The fact that a lien under the judgment has existed and expired in another county, can make no difference. The intention is to give a judgment creditor the right to acquire a lien in any county when and where he pleases, and then it gives him two years thereafter in which to enforce that lien. If he fails or neglects, or can find no property in one county on which to enforce it, that is no just cause why he should not exercise his right of enforcing it in another county where he may be able to find property of the judgment debtor.

But Sec. 209 provides than an execution to enforce this lien can only issue within five years after the date of the judgment, and if the judgment creditor suffers that time to elapse without having enforced his lien, he cannot procure an execution, since the repeal of Sec. 214, with which to enforce it. So, too, all right of action upon the judgment is barred by the seventeenth section of the Statute of Limitations, unless commenced within five years of the date of its rendition. Whether a lien can exist in any county after the expiration of five years from the date of the judgment by filing a transcript in the Recorder's office just within the two years, is a question not properly before us in this case; but it is clear that if a lien could exist in such case, it would be merely nominal, unless an execution is issued within the five years with which to enforce it.

It follows from these views that the interest of Yontz was vested in the intervenor, and there was therefore no error in granting him a new trial. The order granting him such new trial is therefore affirmed.

One ground of the motion for a new trial made by the defendants was misconduct of the jury, the sole evidence of which was the affidavits of a portion of the jurors. The respondents contend that at common law, jurors could not give evidence impeaching their own verdict, and that the amendment of Sec. 193, allowing affidavits of jurors to be used for that purpose, does not apply to this case, because it was not passed until after the rendition of the judgment. It is unnecessary to examine what the rule upon this subject may have been at common law, as we consider that the statute governs this case. The judgment was rendered March 1st, 1862; the law amending Sec. 193 so as to allow misconduct on the part of the jury to be proved by the affidavits or any one or more of the jurors, was passed March 5th, and took effect immediately; and the motion for a new trial was not heard and submitted until some time in August, 1862. The statute related merely to the remedy, declaring the rule of evidence to govern the Courts in hearing and determining motions for new trials, founded upon alleged misconduct of the jury, and it clearly applies to all motions for new trials heard after it took effect. In no sense can it be said to affect any vested interest plaintiff had in his judgment. If that judgment was entered upon a verdict rendered under circumstances showing misconduct on the part of the jury, the law in existence at the time of the trial, verdict, and judgment, gave the defendants a right to have the judgment vacated and a new trial granted, and the Legislature had an undoubted right to prescribe the rule of evidence in motions for that purpose, whether the judgment was rendered before or after the passage of the law. The law relates to and affects the motion for a new trial, and not the judgment.

The affidavit of one of the jurors, Day, after stating generally what occurred in the jury room, in the way of discussions and votes, states that after a time a vote unanimous for the plaintiff was taken, but immediately thereafter Heller and Fortune, who are charged with the misconduct, recanted, and said their vote was not according to their convictions; and soon after the affiant saw Fortune approach Heller, and heard him propose to the latter that he would place a piece of money, and the latter should guess, heads or tails, and if he guessed right then their verdict should be for the plaintiff, or they would go with the others for the plaintiff; that Heller assented; that Fortune then placed a piece of money and covered it so that the former could not see it; he guessed, and they announced that he had guessed right, and they thereupon agreed to a verdict for the plaintiff, but both said it was still contrary to their convictions. The affidavit of Oalkin, another juror, is substantially to the same effect. The plaintiff introduced the affidavits of several other jurors, in rebuttal, who corroborate the general statements of the occurrences in the jury room, but they state that they heard or saw nothing of this particular transaction between Fortune and Heller. The circumstances detailed by Day and Calkin show that it might well have occurred, and the other jurors have neither seen nor heard it, and we think the affidavits show with sufficient certainty that the transaction occurred substantially as stated by Day and Calkin. It is insisted, however, that the defendants should have procured the affidavits of the jurors guilty of the misconduct. It seems that one of the defendants applied to them for that purpose, and they refused. We know of no rule of law which requires these facts to be proved by the affidavits of the jurors charged with the misconduct.

That the conduct of these jurors was such as to vitiate the verdict there can be no doubt. The rule of law upon this subject is well settled. (1 Graham & Waterman on New Trials, 103; Wilson v. Berryman, 5 Cal. 44.) The Court therefore erred in denying the defendants' motion for a new trial. Several other questions are raised by the parties, but as they do not relate to the merits of the case, and as their determination is not important to guide the future action of the Court below on the new trial, we do not deem it necessary to pass upon them.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered as to the defendants and the intervenor.

CHAPMAN v. THORNBURG.

Prior to the passage of the Act of May 18th, 1861, Judges of Courts had no power to issue writs of assistance to place the purchaser of property sold under a decree of foreclosure in possession of the same.

APPEAL from the Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

Chapman, the plaintiff, on the twenty-fourth day of January, 1857, obtained a judgment and decree in the District Court of Yuba County against Clark and wife, for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon certain real estate in Marysville, and directing the sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy the judgment. The property was sold by the Sheriff on the twenty-third of February, 1857, and Chapman became the purchaser, and on the first of August, 1857, received the Sheriff's deed.

On the fourth of September, 1857, plaintiff obtained an order from the Judge at chambers for a writ of assistance, which was issued by the Clerk of the fifth, and placed in the hands of the Sheriff, defendant Thornburg.

Henry K. Mitchell, for Appellant.

By Sec. 22, District Courts have the power to render a judgment and decree, because it is conferred upon them. District Courts and District Judges have power to issue all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the power conferred upon District Courts and District Judges. District Judges have the power to transact such business at their chambers as may be done out of Court, etc.

The mere fact that the statute defines certain duties that may be done by them out of Court, does not render void an act of a Judge at chambers not particularly mentioned, but which is necessary and proper to the complete exercise of the power conferred upon him as a Judge, that is, to enforce the judgment and decrees of the Court.

Mesick & Van Voorhies, for Respondent.

NORTON, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORN, C. J. concurring. CROCKER, J. delivered the dissenting opinion.

This action is brought to recover damages for the injury done to certain real estate during the time that the defendant, as Sheriff, delayed to execute a writ of assistance which had been placed in his hands.

It appeared on the trial that the application for the writ was made to the Judge, and granted by him at chambers during vacation, and thereupon a motion for nonsuit was made and granted, "upon the ground that the Judge at chambers could not hear the application for a writ of assistance or issue the order thereon, nor could the writ issue upon such order."

Chapman v. Thornburg.

From this decision the plaintiff appeals, and claims that by virtue of Sec. 22 of "An Act concerning the Courts of Justice of this State and Judicial Officers," passed May 19th, 1853, a Judge at chambers is authorized to issue any writ which may be issued by a Court. The language of this section is as follows: "These Courts, and the Judges thereof, shall have power to issue all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the power conferred upon them by the Constitution, and by this and other statutes." We do not think it was the intention, nor is the effect of this section to confer upon Judges, merely as Judges, the power to issue writs which had theretofore only been issued by Courts, but that it merely gives direct statutory authority to Courts to issue writs to carry into effect the powers conferred upon Courts, and to Judges to issue writs to carry into effect the powers conferred upon Judges. It says the power conferred upon "them." Literally, this would only refer to some power conferred upon them jointly—but, of course, this is not the rational meaning, nor, on the other hand, is it the meaning that each shall have the right to issue writs to carry into effect the powers conferred upon either. The practical importance of the point raised in this case has been removed, by the Legislature having expressly conferred the power to hear applications for writs of assistance upon Judges at chambers by an amendment to Sec. 25, enacted in 1861. (Laws of 1861, 512.)

The judgment is affirmed.

I am compelled to dissent from the opinion of my associates. Sec. 22 relates to the power of Courts and Judges over remedial writs, and should, therefore, be liberally construed to extend the remedy. Under this rule the proper construction of the section, in my opinion, is that the Judges as well as the Courts have full power to issue all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of the power conferred by the Constitution or the statutes, upon either the Court or the Judge. And the writ of assistance is one properly included within the provisions of this section.

People v. Gassaway.

THE PEOPLE v. GASSAWAY.

In the absence of evidence of good character, the recent possession of stolen property, unexplained, is not prima facie evidence that the possessor is guilty of larceny.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions of El Dorado County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. G. McCallum, for Appellant.

The instruction as to the recent possession of stolen property, is contrary to the rule of law as settled by this Court. (The People v. Chambers, 18 Cal. 383; The People v. Ah Ki, 20 Id. 177.)

Frank M. Pixley, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. and COPE, C. J. concurring.

This is an appeal from a judgment convicting the defendant of the crime of robbery. On the trial the Court charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "In the absence of evidence of good character, the recent possession of stolen property, unexplained, is prima facie evidence that the possessor is guilty of larceny." The defendant excepted to this charge, and it is now assigned for error on this appeal. The charge is directly in conflict with the rule upon this question laid down by this Court in the cases of The People v. Chambers (18 Cal. 383); The People v. Ah Ki (20 Id. 177.)

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

McCUE v. GALLAGHER et al.

WHEREAS A purchases land with his own funds, but before the execution of the deed enters into a verbal contract with B by which the deed from the grantor is executed directly to B, and B is at some future time to pay A the purchase money: Held, that a resulting trust is not created in favor of A.

McCue v. Gallagher.

APPEAL from the Sixteenth Judicial District, Amador County.

The complaint avers that about the second day of April, 1861, plaintiff, Francis McCue, purchased of one Flesham a lot of land, for which he paid said Flesham three hundred and fifty dollars, and that after the purchase Michael McCue, since deceased, requested of plaintiff that his name might be inserted in the deed as the grantee, and stated that he would, at some future time, purchase the property of plaintiff and pay him therefor said sum of three hundred and fifty dollars, and that plaintiff then directed the deed from Flesham to be made to said Michael, and that there was an express understanding at the time that plaintiff should be the owner of the property until it was paid for. Complaint further avers, that about the first of August, 1861, plaintiff demanded of said Michael the money or a deed of the property, and that he failed to pay the money and refused to execute a deed, and that Michael has since died, and defendant Gallagher is the administrator of his estate, and the other defendant was the wife of Michael at the time of his death, and claims the property as his heir.

Defendant demurred to the complaint, and the Court sustained the demurrer, and plaintiff appeals.

John W. Armstrong, for Appellant.

The statute for the prevention of frauds, provides: "No estate or interest in lands, other than for leases for a term not exceeding one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning lands, or in any manner relating thereto, shall hereafter be created, granted, assigned, surrendered, or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by deed or conveyance in writing." (Wood's Dig. 106, Sec. 6.)

This section of the law has received an authoritative construction in the case of Osborn v. Endicot (6 Cal. 154), where it is said: "Before the passage of the English statute, trusts were created (except, probably, in a few cases) and proved by parol; and after the statute resulting trusts, or trusts by operation of law, were held to be exceptions from the operation of the rule. Our statute does not change the common law on this subject, and trusts of this nature may be proved as they could before its passage." I refer the Court to the case of Russ v. Mebius (16 Cal. 355), which is directly in point.

Parol evidence is admissible to prove the facts from which a trust arises by the operation of law, vide: Greenl. Ev. 266; 1 John. Ch. 586; 2 Id. 409. Ch. Kent, in his Commentaries, says: "The payment of the money, at the time, is indispensable to the creation of the trust;" and this fact may be established, or the resulting trust rebutted by parol proof. (4 Kent, 338.)

S. B. Atzell, for Respondent.

It clearly appears that the land was intended for Michael, and that all Francis wanted was his money, and that all he wanted of the land was a lien upon it for three hundred and fifty dollars. If I am trusted by operation of law, I cannot, by my own volition, change myself into a grantee. I cannot, by the payment of money, defeat the estate of my cestui que trust. Appellant agreed that respondent should own the land absolutely, upon the payment of three hundred and fifty dollars. This shows that he considered the money loaned to his brother. (Sanderson's Uses, 227.)

Had Francis been the actual owner, and conveyed to Michael, his brother, saying: "Take this land, and pay me when you are able," and Michael replied: "I will consider it yours till it is paid for," he is evidently a trusted man, but not a trustee one.

CORN, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

We think the facts stated in the complaint in this case do not establish a resulting trust. The property was purchased by the plaintiff, but before the conveyance was executed he transferred to his brother the benefit of the purchase, the latter agreeing to pay the purchase money. The conveyance was made directly to the brother, and the only inference from the facts stated is that it was intended for his use. The facts of the case are incompatible with the idea of a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiff. Such trusts are created by implication of law, and not upon the presumption that he who pays the purchase money intends the purchase for his own benefit. The presumption may be rebutted, however, and a contrary intention shown; and the intention at the time of the conveyance must necessarily control. The trust must exist then, or not at all.

It is possible that the plaintiff may enforce his claim as a lien upon the property; but this question is not before us, and it is unnecessary to decide it.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. PRESBURG v. McEWEN.

UNDER the Revenue Law of 1860 lands owned by several persons as tenants in common may be assessed to them jointly.

Where lands are thus assessed to several persons jointly by the Revenue Law of 1860, the owner of an undivided portion may pay his proportion of the tax and thus release his portion of the land from the lien of the tax; but unless he makes this payment before a sale is made of the land under a judgment recovered for the tax this right is gone, and a redemption can only be effected by a payment of the entire judgment and all charges.

After a sale of lands under a judgment recovered for taxes a redemption cannot be made by paying a portion of the bid equal to the interest of the redemption in the parcel sold.

If the land is sold in separate parcels by the officer a redemption of distinct parcels can only be made by paying the whole sum bid on any distinct piece sold separately.

APPEAL from the Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. Mills, for Appellant.

This being a proceeding growing out of collection of revenue, in order to rightly decide upon the question at issue, it becomes necessary to inquire into the liabilities of owners of property under the revenue laws of this State.

This liability is simply to pay a just proportion of the expenses of Government, and in order to determine that proportion an assessment is directed to be made. This assessment law directs that each individual's property shall be assessed separately. There is no law in existence which recognizes the idea of a joint assessment. (See Revenue Laws of various years under head of "Assessors and their Duties.") From this we argue that it never was the intention of the Legislature to make parties jointly liable for payment of taxes; it is not the person who shall pay the taxes, but the property of each person in its due proportion shall be held liable to pay, etc.

By the various revenue laws the right is given to pay taxes on undivided real estate by paying on any interest the owner may claim therein. (See Law 1861, 430, Sec. 33; Law 1857; Wood's Dig. 622, Sec. 31.)

Can you by the recovery of a judgment for the tax and selling interests (owned separately) jointly compel A to pay the taxes due upon lands of B, or in default of such payment forfeit his own estate? Can the rights of property under our laws be divested in this manner? (Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 3-16; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill.)

The Statute of April 8th, 1861, Sec. 6, provides, "that when the property belongs to minors or persons under legal disability, they shall have until six months after said disability is removed to redeem said property, by paying the whole bid and all subsequent taxes and interest."

In this part of the act provision seems to be made where minors own the entire property and "they" seek to redeem it all, not a part. Otherwise, if there be a number of children arriving at age at different periods, the first redeems the whole and keeps it until the next junior arrives at age and redeems the whole, and so on, each being bound to pay to the other the whole bid, etc., until the youngest had arrived at age, and within six months thereafter it must take another start to go round. Clearly, as heretofore argued, such was never the object of the Legislature by this provision, but they, the Legislature, took it for granted that each person's interest in lands should and would be assessed separately, sold separately, and redeemed separately.

H. W. Carpentier, for Respondent.

The right to redeem is given by a proviso to the fifth section of the act in the following words: "And provided, further, that where the property sold belongs to minors or persons under legal disability, they shall have until six months after said disability is removed to redeem said property, by paying the whole bid and all subsequent taxes and interest." (Laws of 1861, 120.)

The language of the act does not admit of construction. It is perfectly clear and unequivocal, and any attempt to elucidate the matter by argument would be as vain a thing as to demonstrate that twice two make four.

NORRIS, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CROCKER, J. and COPE, C. J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order directing a mandamus to issue to the defendant, commanding him to execute a deed to the relator under the following circumstances: An undivided half of a tract of land in Contra Costa County, comprising something more than 6,000 acres, was assessed for the taxes of the year 1860 to three persons. By an Act of the Legislature of 1861 the assessment of taxes for the years 1860 and 1861 for that county were legalized and confirmed, and the District Attorney directed to bring actions to recover the unpaid taxes. (Law of 1861, 119.) Under this law an action was brought against the three persons to whom the said premises were assessed, and a judgment recovered, and the premises sold to the relator by the defendant as Tax Collector. Within six months after the sale one of the defendants, Reyes Vasques, paid to the Tax Collector one-eighth part of the taxes, with costs and per centage allowed by law, for the purpose of redeeming one undivided eighth part of said premises, of which undivided eighth part she claimed to be the owner. At the time of the said sale she was a minor and a married woman. After the expiration of six months from the day of sale the relator demanded a deed of the whole premises, which the Tax Collector declined to give, but offered a deed of seven-eighths. Thereupon the present application was made to the District Court for a mandamus, which was granted, requiring the Collector to execute a deed for the whole premises sold. From this order Reyes Vasques appeals.

The argument on the part of the appellant is, that the law under which the assessment was made does not authorize or contemplate an assessment jointly to tenants in common, but, on the contrary, each owner is to be assessed for his share, and may, consequently, redeem his share, and that a part owner is expressly authorized to pay his proportion of a tax, and that the obtaining a judgment and effecting a sale under the special Act of 1861 does not change this right to pay a portion of the tax and redeem an undivided share.

The Revenue Act of 1860, under which the assessment in question was made, does not directly authorize a joint assessment, unless the property is owned by a firm or association, but under the designation "person" it would doubtless be competent to assess land to several persons, and it seems to be contemplated that such assessments would be made, since it is provided that the owner of an undivided portion may pay his portion of the tax.

But if there was any irregularity or illegality in the assessment in this respect it was remedied by the special confirmatory Act of 1861. Whatever may have been the right of an owner of an undivided share to pay his portion of a joint tax it was a right which could only be exercised before a sale by the law under which an assessment was made, or before a judgment under the special Law of 1861. The Revenue Law of 1860, which allows an owner of an undivided portion of a tract of land to pay his portion of the tax, nevertheless only allows a redemption after sale by a payment of the whole tax and charges, and provides no mode of redeeming an undivided portion. And the special Law of 1861 in like manner requires a payment of the whole judgment in order to effect a redemption, and provides no mode of redeeming a portion. The provisions of the Civil Practice Act are made applicable to judgments under this special act, but if a redemption can be made under those provisions it can only be done by paying the whole sum bid on any distinct piece sold separately. A redemption cannot be made by paying a portion of the bid equal to the interest of the redemptioner in the parcel sold.

The appellant urges that it will work injustice and hardship to allow undivided interests to be assessed jointly, and require a part owner to pay the whole tax in order to save his own portion of the property, however small that may be; and he also points out some embarrassments that will attend the right of minors to redeem as they successively arrive at their majority. The answer is, that such is the law. In the effort to enact effective laws to compel property owners to pay their taxes full provision may not have been made for all contingencies, but the law as it stands is plain in its terms and must be enforced, if there is no valid objection to the power of the Legislature to pass it. The power to pass laws of this character was considered and upheld in the case of The People v. Seymour (16 Cal. 332). The force of the argument on the ground of the hardship of this case is diminished by the fact that under the Revenue Act of 1860 the appellant might have paid her portion of the tax before the time fixed for a sale.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

THE Supreme Court will not disturb the findings of fact of the Court below when the testimony is conflicting.

When parol testimony to vary the terms of a written agreement is offered and received in the Court below without objection, the objection cannot be raised in the Supreme Court that the testimony was inadmissible.

APPEAL from the Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

The complaint avers that the defendants were indebted to one James E. Wolfe, and that Wolfe, on the 9th of April 1858, drew the following order on defendants in favor of Fiske & Diehl:

“Messrs. J. M. B. WEATHERWAX & Co.—Gents:

“Please pay to Messrs. Fiske & Diehl the sum of twelve hundred dollars, being the amount due me for a certain note signed by Fiske & Diehl dated March 23d, 1858, and which note was given in consideration of services at Empire Mill, and which said note I transferred to you on said 23d day of March aforesaid, and for which attachments were issued on the property of said Fiske & Diehl, and oblige yours,

That on the 10th day of April, 1858, Fiske & Diehl presented the order to defendants, who indorsed on it the following acceptance:

“Accepted, April 10th, 1858.

“J. M. B. WEATHERWAX & Co.”

That on the 28th of June, 1858, Fiske & Diehl indorsed the order to plaintiff, Tebbs, in the following words and figures:

“EL DORADO, June 28, 1858.

‘For a reasonable consideration, we transfer the within order (accepted) to Moses Tebbs. FISCHE & DIEHL, by Fiske.”

The answer sets up that in the spring of 1858, Fiske & Diehl had given Wolfe their promissory note for twelve hundred dollars for labor, and that at the same time Fiske & Diehl were indebted to defendant for goods, and that defendants agreed to bring an action against Fiske & Diehl for their own demand, as well as Wolfe's note, and to enable them to do so, Wolfe indorsed his note to defendants with the understanding that the defendants should commence suit on both demands in one action, and if any money was collected by the suit, it should be divided between Wolfe and defendants, pro rata, according to the amount each owned in the judgment recovered, and that nothing had been realized from the suit, and that Fiske & Diehl obtained the order on defendants with the understanding that it was only to be paid out of any moneys collected in said suit, and defendants accepted it with that agreement and understanding, and that plaintiff knew all of these facts before it was indorsed to him.

Defendants had judgment and plaintiff appealed.

Charles Meredith, for Appellant.

The acceptance in writing is unconditional, and we hold that no parol evidence can be received to show a contemporaneous parol agreement different.

Hersford & Williams, also, for Appellant.

Taking the facts as stated in the answer and found by the Court as true, the defense is good in law. (Aud v. McGruder, 10 Cal. 282; Conner v. Clark, 12 Id. 168.)

Tebbs v. Weatherwax.

Objections to the competency of evidence, or of a witness, must be taken at the trial; but objections to the sufficiency of testimony may be taken at any time.

John Hume, for Respondents.

Plaintiff having failed in the Court below to object to the parol testimony upon which the Court founded its findings and judgments, cannot in the Appellate Court take advantage of the error, which was his own, and not the error of the Court. (McCloud v. O'Neill, 16 Cal. 392; Hobart v. Dumerits, 3 Ind. 346-348.)

NORTON, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and CROCKER, J. concurring.

The Court by whom this action was tried without a jury finds as one of the facts that the order was accepted with the understanding at the time that it was to be paid out of any money that might be collected on the note of twelve hundred dollars. The testimony as to this fact is conflicting, and in such cases the finding is conclusive. The objection that the evidence to prove this fact was parol and inadmissible to vary the terms of the written acceptance cannot be raised here for the first time, after the evidence had been given in the Court below without objection. (Hobart v. Dumerits, 3 Ind. 346; McCloud v. O'Neill, 16 Cal. 392.)

It is also found as one of the facts that no part of the money out of which the order was to be paid had been collected by the defendants. The fact that the defendants had at one time assigned all their right, title, and interest in the judgment of which this money formed a part, as collateral security for a debt, without designating which part was held by them for the account of Wolfe, and the fact that one of the firm in his schedule in insolvency mentioned this judgment as assets of the firm, without any reservation of the portion for which they were accountable to Wolfe, do not prove that any money was in fact collected on the Judgment by the defendants, nor are they facts of a character which estop them from showing the truth in that respect. Nor is the fact that the defendants at the time of the transfer of the order to the plaintiff claimed an offset of six hundred dollars inconsistent with the fact that they were only to be liable on their acceptance for so much as they should collect on the note. The offset would be applicable whenever their indebtedness should become fixed by a collection of the amount of the note, and the claim of the offset then made was proper as a notice to the plaintiff that any liability that might arise against the defendants would be subject to that deduction.

The judgment is affirmed.

MALSON v. VAUGHN et al.

UNDER the Constitution before the amendments which went into effect January 1st, 1864, an appeal could be taken to the Supreme Court from a judgment of the County Court, when the judgment appealed from, including principal and interest exceeded two hundred dollars.

IN an action in a Justice's Court upon a money demand, the defendant cannot set up in his answer, as a counter claim of set-off, a demand, amounting, exclusive of interest, to more than two hundred dollars.

A Justice of the Peace has no jurisdiction to pass upon a counter claim or set-off unless it be for such a sum as the defendant might have maintained an action on against the plaintiff, in a Justice's Court.

APPEAL from the County Court of Butte County.

The note sued on was dated March 28th, 1857; due thirty days after date; bearing interest at three per cent. per month, and was payable to Vaughn or order. May 22d, 1860, Vaughn indorsed it to the plaintiff. May 28th, 1860, the suit was commenced. Bristol answered pleading as a set-off the five hundred and ninety-three dollars and forty cents referred to in the opinion of the Court. This set-off was for money received by Vaughn for the use of Bristol after the execution of the note and before Vaughn indorsed it to Malson. The County Court allowed the set-off, and rendered judgment in favor of defendant Bristol. From this judgment Malson, the plaintiff, appealed.

Jos. G. N. Lewis, for Appellant.

The Court exceeded its jurisdiction in entertaining the defendant Bristol's plea of counter claim or set-off. Bristol could not have brought an action against plaintiff in a Justice's Court on the counter claim. (Pr. Act, Sec. 574.)

H. O. Beatty, for Respondent.

The Court has no jurisdiction of the appeal. The principal of the note is only one hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-four cents, but the interest swells the amount due to more than two hundred dollars. The old Constitution, Art. 6, Sec. 4, provides: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases where the matter in dispute exceeds two hundred dollars." What is the matter in dispute? The one hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-four cents, or the one hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-four cents with interest added. (Dumphy & Hildrith v. Guindon, 13 Cal. 30; Simmons v. Brainard, 14 Id. 278.)

No affirmative relief was asked for by defendant Bristol for any portion of the set-off, but merely a defense made against the claim of plaintiff.

СВОСКЕР, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—СОРН, C. J. concurring.

This is an action brought upon a promissory note against Bristol, as maker, and Vaughn, as indorser, before a Justice of the Peace. The defendant Bristol plead in defense a set-off against Vaughn, the payee of the note, amounting to five hundred dollars. The plaintiff recovered judgment before the Justice of the Peace, from which the defendants appealed to the County Court, where the Court found for the defendants and rendered a judgment dismissing the suit, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The note sued on was for the sum of one hundred and forty-five dollars and sixty-four cents, but the amount due thereon at the date of the judgment, including interest, greatly exceeded two hundred dollars. The respondent objects that this Court has no jurisdiction of the appeal, and contends that the interest due on the note cannot be added to the principal in estimating the "matter in dispute." In this he is mistaken. The interest should properly be included in the estimate.

The set-off or counter claim set up by the defendant Bristol, in his answer, amounted to the sum of five hundred and ninety-three dollars and forty cents, and it is insisted that the amount being beyond the jurisdiction of the Justice of the Peace, the objection of the plaintiff to the filing of the answer on that ground should have been sustained by the Justice, and by the County Court when it was renewed. Sec. 574 of the Practice Act provides that in proceedings before Justices of the Peace "the answer may contain a denial of any of the material facts stated in the complaint, which the defendant believes to be untrue, and also a statement, in a plain and direct manner, of any other facts constituting a defense or counter claim, upon which an action may be brought by the defendant against the plaintiff in a Justice's Court." It is clear that the defendant could not have brought an action against the plaintiff in a Justice's Court, upon the demand set forth in his answer by way of counter claim, and the Justice and County Court therefore erred in not sustaining the objection of the plaintiff. (Lamonn v. Caryl, 4 Denio, 370.)

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

SMITH v. JOHNSON.

When A executes a promissory note to B bearing interest at three per cent. per month, and C, D, and E sign the note as sureties for A, and B afterwards recovers judgment on the note against A, the maker and the sureties, and the sureties pay the judgment, in an action by the sureties against the maker for the money thus paid, they can only recover judgment for the amount of money paid, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from the time of payment.

Where there is no agreement or contract in writing, fixing a different rate of interest, parties are limited in their recovery to ten per cent. per annum.

The rate of interest fixed in a promissory note is not a contract or agreement in writing between the maker of and sureties on the note.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Mendocino County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Smith v. Johnson.

R. McGarvey, for Appellant.

Holden & Lamar, for Respondent.

[No briefs on file.]

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover a sum of money paid by James M. Ellis and Bennett Ellis (under whom the plaintiff claims by assignment), as sureties for the defendant, on a judgment rendered against the defendant, one Latimer, and the said Ellis. The defendant demurred to the complaint, on the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that several causes of action had been improperly united. The Court overruled the demurrer, and rendered judgment against the defendant, from which he appeals.

The complaint alleges that one Myers recovered a judgment against the defendant, Latimer, and the said J. M. and B. Ellis, for three hundred and ninety-two dollars and fifty cents, with interest at three per cent. per month, and costs; that the judgment was rendered upon a promissory note executed by the defendant, as maker, and by Latimer and the Ellis's as sureties for the defendant; that the sureties paid the judgment on the twenty-seventh day of April, 1861, the Ellis's paying thereon the sum of two hundred and thirty-one dollars and thirteen cents; that they assigned their claim against the defendant for repayment to one Caldwell, who assigned to the plaintiff, and that he is entitled to a judgment against the defendant for two hundred and thirty-one dollars and thirteen cents, with interest thereon at the rate of three per cent. per month, and the judgment rendered includes interest at that rate.

The statute regulating the interest of money provides that parties may agree in writing for the payment of any rate of interest whatever on money due or to become due on any contract, and when there is no express contract fixing a different rate of interest, interest shall be allowed at the rate of ten per cent. per annum. There does not appear to have been any contract or agreement in writing between the defendant and the sureties as to the repayment of the money they might be compelled to pay as such sureties, or fixing any rate of interest to which they should be entitled upon the money they might thus be compelled to pay, and in the absence of any agreement in writing they would not be entitled to recover interest at a rate greater than ten per cent. per annum. The rate of interest in the note does not affect the question, because the note, or the judgment rendered on it, is not the contract sued on, but it is the implied contract, that the defendant shall pay to his sureties the amount paid by them for his use, that forms the basis of the action.

It follows that the Court erred in rendering judgment for a sum including interest at a rate exceeding ten per cent. per annum. The excess amounts to one hundred and six dollars and fifty cents, and it should have been for two hundred and seventy-four dollars and seventy-eight cents instead of three hundred and eighty-one dollars and twenty-eight cents.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

Afterwards, on motion of the respondent, and upon his remitting the excess of the judgment, the same was amended and reduced to the sum of two hundred and seventy-four dollars and seventy-eight cents, and affirmed as thus amended, with a judgment in favor of the appellant for the costs of the appeal.—REPORTER.

MARSHALL v. FERGUSON.

A SALE of growing crops, the product of periodical planting and cultivation, does not come within the provisions of the Statute of Frauds, relating to sales of an interest in real estate, and therefore, though not in writing, is valid. Where A purchases personal property worth more than two hundred dollars of B, but B does not deliver him possession of the same, and A then sells the goods to C, a third party, and receives his pay for the same, the sale by A to C is a sufficient delivery by B, and A cannot avoid the payment of the purchase money for want of delivery, or a note or memorandum in writing. An agreement to pay a fixed sum in grain, at the market price on a day specified, if not fulfilled by the delivery of the grain at the time fixed, becomes a debt payable in money.

Marshall v. Ferguson.

Where such an agreement exists, no demand of the grain is necessary, but a failure to deliver, makes the sum fixed, a money debt.

When the case made by plaintiff's proof differs from the averments of the complaint, and defendant makes no objection to the introduction of the evidence on this ground, the Supreme Court will not reverse the judgment on account of the variance.

APPEAL from the Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

Comstock died, leaving lands in San Joaquin County, and Hestres was appointed his administrator. A crop of grain was growing on the lands, but it was in the possession of other parties, the administrator not having reduced it to possession. The administrator gave Marshall, the plaintiff, a written lease of the land, and Marshall, about three weeks before the grain ripened, sold the growing crop to Ferguson, the defendant; Ferguson agreeing to pay him therefor six hundred and fifty dollars in grain. No note or memorandum in writing was made of the agreement. There was no delivery of possession either by the administrator to Marshall, or by Marshall to Ferguson. Ferguson, after his purchase, sold the growing crop to the parties who were in possession of the land, and received his pay therefor. The complaint averred the sale of barley and wheat to defendant at his request, and his promise to pay therefor. The answer was a specific denial of each allegation.

Cobb and Tyler, for Appellant.

No delivery alleged, and nothing alleged to show waiver of delivery. (Wood's Dig. Art. 404.)

If plaintiff's case came within either of the exceptions mentioned, the complaint should allege it. (Thurman v. Stevens, 2 Duer, 610; LeRoy v. Shaw, Id. 626.)

The contract upon which plaintiff seeks to recover should have been in writing in order to be actionable, and should have been so set forth in the complaint. (See cases above cited.)

Plaintiff's case as proved is not the case alleged, and as proved does not constitute a cause of action. Case alleged is for sale of barley and wheat for six hundred and fifty dollars. Case proved is a sale of growing crop. A growing crop is an interest in lands. (Wood's Dig. Arts. 394, 396.)

Marshall v. Ferguson.

Again, the case alleged is a promise to pay six hundred and fifty dollars in money, on the first of October, 1862. The case proved is a promise to pay six hundred and fifty dollars in grain at the market price on the first of October, 1862. (Sugden on Vendors, 162; Robertson v. Robertson, 9 Watts, 62; Jervis v. Smith, 1 Hoff. Ch. Cases, 470.)

“Formerly a delivery of goods by the seller was held sufficient to take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds. But it is now clearly settled that in order to satisfy the statute there must be a delivery of the goods by the vendor, with an intention of vesting the right of possession in the vendee, and there must be an actual receiving and acceptance by the latter, with the intention of taking possession as owner. It lies upon the plaintiff to make out there was such delivery and acceptance. And it must be an ultimate acceptance, such as completely affirms the contract.” (Hilliard on Sales, 161; Redington v. Roberts, 25 Vt. 693.)

IV. Plaintiff should have demanded delivery of grain of defendant. Where no particular place of delivery is named, the demand and delivery must be at the debtor's residence, or where the property was at the time of contract. (2 Kent's Com. 691, marg. 508.)

A contract payable in portable specific articles at a day certain, not at any specific place, is payable at the creditor's residence. In the case of a merchant or a mechanic who gives an engagement to pay in merchandise, or in his manufactures, the shop of the debtor is the place of payment. (Chip. on Contracts, 28-30.) And there must be a demand at his place of residence. (Id. 49.)

Tod Robinson, for Respondent.

The first point made in support of the motion for a nonsuit was, the sale of growing crops was the sale of an interest in lands, and to be effective must be in writing. This proposition is denied, I believe, by all the authorities, and certainly by the two here quoted. (Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 554; Bank of — v. Crary, 1 Barb., S. C., 544.)

The second ground for nonsuit was, that there was no delivery, no memorandum in writing, nor any part of the purchase money paid, and so the sale was void under the statute. The fact that defendant sold the growing crops to others, and received the money therefor, is fatal to this objection. The rule of law is, where payment is to be made in a specific article at a certain time, it is the duty of the debtor to seek the creditor and make the tender in whatsoever manner it is susceptible of being made at the time stipulated, and failing this, the amount fixed becomes due and payable in money. (2 Kent, 690, marg. 507.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover six hundred and fifty dollars, for barley and wheat alleged in the complaint to have been sold by the plaintiff to the defendant. The case was tried by the Court, and after the plaintiff had closed his evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was refused. The Court, after hearing all the evidence, ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

The first error assigned is that the Court erred in refusing the nonsuit. The evidence showed that the sale to the defendant was of growing crops of barley and wheat, and not of grain of those kinds, as alleged in the complaint; that these crops were growing on lands in the possession of various persons, and that after his purchase the defendant had resold the same to the parties in possession of the land, and had received his pay therefor, from all except one of them. It further appeared that the defendant's agreement was to pay the six hundred and fifty dollars in grain at the market price, on the first day of October, 1862, but he had failed to deliver the grain at that date.

The grounds of the motion for the nonsuit were that the sale of growing crops was of an interest in land, and therefore it must be in writing, under the Statute of Frauds; that as a sale of goods and chattels it was void, being for a sum exceeding two hundred dollars, and not in writing, and no delivery having been made; that the plaintiff had failed to prove any title to the property, and that there was no proof that the grain the defendant had agreed to pay for had ever been demanded of him.

Marshall c. Ferguson.

The crops contracted for in this case are the product of periodical planting and cultivation, and the law appears to be well settled, both in the English and American Courts, that sales of growing crops of that character do not come within the provision of the Statute of Frauds relating to sales of an interest in real estate, and therefore such sales, though not in writing, are valid. (Browne on Stat. of Frauds, Secs. 250-258; Green v. Armstrong, 1 Denio, 550; Smith v. Bryan, 5 Maryland, 141; Safford v. Annis, 7 Maine, 168; Bostwick v. Leach, 3 Day, 476.) The objection that the sale was of an interest in real estate, and must be in writing, is therefore untenable.

The next point is, that as a sale of goods and chattels it was void for want of delivery and a written memorandum of the sale. The fact that defendant sold the crops to other parties was a sufficient delivery within the statute. (Browne on Stat. of Frauds, Sec. 322; Chaplin v. Rogers, 1 East. 192.)

There was sufficient evidence of plaintiff's title to the crops, and his right to sell them. Even if there had been a defect of proof on this point, the defendant could not avail himself of it after he had sold the property and received the pay therefor.

The next question is, was it necessary for the plaintiff to demand of the defendant the grain he agreed to deliver for the growing crops before commencing suit? The defendant agreed to pay the six hundred and fifty dollars in grain at the market price, on the first day of October, 1862. It was not an agreement to deliver any specific parcel or quantity of grain, but he was to deliver a sufficient quantity which at the market price would amount to the sum of six hundred and fifty dollars. It is to be observed, too, that the time of delivery was fixed. The grain was not to be delivered on demand, but on a certain day that was named. Under these circumstances it was the duty of the defendant to deliver the grain, on or before the day named, to the plaintiff, and his failure to do so made him liable to pay the sum named in money. After the day named, the plaintiff was under no obligation to receive payment in grain, and no demand of the grain by him was necessary. (Goodwin v. Holbrook, 4 Wend. 377; Peck v. Hubbard, 11 Vermont, 612; Townsend v. Wells, 3 Day, 327; 2 Parsons on Contracts, 163.)

Riley v. Pehl.

It is further objected that the proof varied from the allegations of the complaint. This objection would have been good had the defendant made it at the proper time, which was when the evidence was introduced. The case made by the proof differs from the averments of the complaint in almost every essential particular; and if the defendant had objected to its introduction it would have been the duty of the Court to have excluded it until the pleadings had been made to conform to the real facts of the case. But the defendant made no objection on this ground, either at the time of the introduction of the evidence or at any other time, in the Court below, nor is it included in his grounds of appeal or assignments of error filed in this Court. Under these circumstances we cannot entertain this question. It is too late to present it here for the first time; for if it had been suggested in the Court below at the proper time, the Court might have allowed the plaintiff to amend his complaint, so as to make it conform to the proof.

The last point raised is, that the action was tried by the Court, who filed no findings in the case. Sec. 2 of the Statute of 1861, page 589, provides that, "In cases tried by the Court, without a jury, no judgment shall be reversed for the want of a finding, or for a defective finding of the facts, unless exceptions be made in the Court below to the finding, or to the want of a finding." No exception was taken by the defendant for want of a finding, nor did he ask or require the Court to file any findings in the case. It comes clearly within the provisions of this statute, and this Court cannot, therefore, reverse the judgment on that ground.

We have examined all the questions presented by the appellant, and find no valid ground for reversing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

RILEY v. PEHL. AND WIFE.

WHEREAS a homestead right had been acquired prior to the passage of the amendment to the Homestead Law in 1860, a declaration of homestead could be made and recorded at any time prior to June 1st, 1862, and no right of homestead was lost by a failure to make the declaration before that time.

Riley v. Pehl.

Where property is conveyed to a wife and the deed shows upon its face a consideration paid, it becomes the common property of both husband and wife, and not the separate property of the wife.

Query — Can the separate property of the wife become the homestead?

Where a homestead is sold by the Sheriff on an execution against the husband, or husband and wife, and a deed given to the purchaser therefor, it is a cloud upon the title, and a Court of Equity will remove it.

APPEAL from the Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. S. Chase, for Appellants.

The deed to the wife expresses a money consideration. The demanded premises then, whether considered as conveyed directly to the husband as the prior grantee or as conveyed to the wife, were by the statute and uniform adjudications upon the subject common property. (See Husband and Wife, Dig. Art. 2606; Tryson v. Sutton, 13 Cal. 493; Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Id. 127; Mott v. Smith, 16 Id. 557; Myer v. Keizer, 12 Id. 253.)

As common property it was susceptible of homestead dedication. (Homestead Act 1851, Sec. 1; Taylor v. Hargués, 4 Cal. 273.)

It is contended on the part of the respondent that the homestead claim is waived by the acts of the defendant's wife, and that the husband is "estopped" from any assertion of the claim by reason of the wife having filed her declaration of intention to do business as a sole trader, and having filed also an inventory in which she sets forth as part of her separate property the demanded premises.

1st. As to the wife's rights as affected by these acts, under the Sole Trader Act (Wood's Dig. 490, Sec. 3) it is provided that such sole trader "shall be allowed all the privileges and be liable to all legal processes now or hereafter provided by law against debtors and creditors."

Now were the husband a trader, doing business on the credit of his ownership of this very property (the demanded premises), could it be contended that he could not claim the same as a homestead, and as exempt from a judgment debt contracted, it may be, on the faith of such ownership? If so, surely the wife as a trader on her own account cannot stand in a more unfavorable position as to her claim of homestead. There was no estoppel as to husband or wife. (See doctrine of estoppel in Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 367; affirmed in Green v. Prettyman, 17 Id. 401; see, also, Feris v. Coover, 10 Id. 631.)

The Sheriff's deed to plaintiff was a cloud upon defendant's title to homestead in the demanded premises, for it required evidence, aliunde, the record to defeat recovery based on the deed. (Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Cal. 127; Dunn v. Tozer, 10 Id. 172; Dorsey v. McFarland, 7 Id. 346.)

Thomas A. Brown, for Respondent.

The homestead declaration made by Mrs. Pehl on the sixteenth of February, after the Sheriff's sale, cannot defeat the plaintiff. Defendants' title to the homestead, if any they had at the time of the sale, they held under the Homestead Act of 1851. (Cohen v. Davis, 20 Cal. 194; Farmer v. Sampson, 6 Texas, 310.) The defendants are by their acts and declarations estopped from denying that the lots of land in controversy at the time of the levy and sale by the Sheriff, were the separate property of the defendant Sarah Pehl, and as such, liable for debts contracted by her as sole trader.

The third section of the act defining the rights of Husband and Wife (Wood's Dig. 487), provides, that: "A full and complete inventory of the separate property of the wife shall be made out and signed by the wife and acknowledged or proved, in the manner required by the law for the acknowledgment of proof of conveyances of land, and recorded in the office of the Recorder of the county in which the parties reside;" and section five of the same act provides, that the filing of the inventory in the Recorder's office shall be notice of title of the wife, and all property belonging to her included in the inventory shall be exempt from seizure on execution for the debts of her husband.

The inventory of her separate property, filed and recorded by the defendant Sarah Pehl, was intended to and did impart notice to all persons, that the property described therein was her separate property, and was not liable for her husband's debts. The law will hold her responsible for the truth of the statements made and contained in her inventory, in respect to her title to the property in controversy, whether those statements be true or false. She will not be permitted to record her statement for her own protection, and when convenient, deny its truth. (Cowen & Hill's Notes to 3 Philips' Ev., Part 1, 369; 1 Greenl. Ev. 22, 207, 208; Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 206; Hostetter v. Haas, 3 Id. 307; Cravens v. Booth, 8 Texas, 249; Bien et al. v. Heath, 6 How. 247; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 385.)

The defendant William Pehl, is in no better condition. His wife was doing business as sole trader with his consent. She had assumed to act in his place with his permission, and the presumption is, from his relation towards her, that he knew better than any other person what she was doing.

Thomas A. Brown, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORA, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of two village lots, claimed by the defendants as a homestead. The wife filed her declaration as a sole trader on the fifth day of December, 1859, and on the second day of August, 1860, the plaintiff commenced an action against her, as such sole trader, and her husband, in which the property claimed as a homestead was attached. He afterward obtained judgment in the action, on which an execution duly issued, under which the property was sold and purchased by the plaintiff on the nineteenth day of January, 1861, and in due time he received a deed from the Sheriff therefor. Notice of the homestead claim appears to have been served on the Sheriff after the levy under the execution, and before the sale of the property. On the sixteenth day of February, and after the Sheriff's sale, the wife filed a declaration of homestead in the Recorder's office. The defendants had occupied the premises as a homestead for some time prior to any of these dates, and have so continued to occupy them ever since. The Court found for the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the defendants appeal.

The homestead right in this case was acquired by the defendants prior to the passage of the amended Homestead Law of 1860, by which act the time fixed for filing the declaration of homestead was one year, to wit: April 28th, 1861. This time was extended by the Act of 1861, to April 28th, 1862, and by the Act of 1862 it was still further extended to June 1st, 1862. The declaration of homestead in this case was filed on the sixteenth day of February, 1861, fully within the time fixed by the statute, and they are therefore entitled to its full benefits, having lost no rights whatever by a neglect to file it before. The fact that it was not filed until after the Sheriff's sale can make no difference. If any notice had been necessary, that served on the Sheriff, as well as the occupancy of the premises by the defendants, was sufficient for that purpose.

The respondent insists that the premises are the separate property of the wife, and therefore liable to be sold on execution for her debts, and no homestead claim can be established thereon. It appears that after the marriage these lots were conveyed to the husband by two separate deeds made at different times; but the same grantors, on the sixteenth day of July, 1859, the date of the last deed, also made a quitclaim deed to the wife for the same lots for the consideration of fifty dollars. She also filed in the Recorder's office an inventory of her separate property, dated December 5th, 1859, including the premises in controversy. The conveyance to her, being a deed of purchase and not of gift, did not constitute it separate property, but it was the common property of both. It is not, therefore, necessary for us to determine the question whether the separate estate of the wife can become the homestead, respecting which some doubts have been heretofore expressed by this Court. (8 Cal. 71; 14 Id. 474; 16 Id. 217.) The fact that she included it in her inventory of her separate estate does not operate as an estoppel upon her, even if the doctrine of estoppel applies to a married woman. The plaintiff was not thereby defrauded or injured in any way.

The pleadings and evidence sufficiently established the occupancy of the premises by the defendants as their home, but upon this point the findings of the Court are entirely silent. It seems that on a portion of the premises is a building used as a billiard saloon, bar-room, and theater, and it may be questionable whether that portion can be properly held as a homestead; but the remaining portion of the lots are clearly exempt from the execution, and the Court therefore erred in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of all the premises. The case will therefore have to be retried by the Court below, and this question can be duly investigated and determined.

The defendants, in their answer, set up that the Sheriff's deed to the plaintiff was a cloud upon their title, which they asked to have removed by the decree of the Court. This relief they will be entitled to when it is established what portion of the premises can be and what cannot be claimed by them as exempt under the Homestead Law. As to that portion found to be exempt, the decree should declare the Sheriff's deed invalid.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

In order to set aside a judgment or conveyance on the ground of fraud, it is not sufficient to aver in general terms that such judgment or conveyance was fraudulent, but the facts and circumstances constituting the alleged fraud must be set forth.

Where a creditor files a bill to cancel and set aside a judgment, rendered against his debtor, on the ground that it is fraudulent, and to reach the property of the debtor and have it applied in satisfaction of his demand, the complaint must aver, either that the plaintiff has acquired a lien on the property he seeks to reach, or that he has recovered a judgment upon which an execution has been issued and returned no property found.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. M. Burt, for Appellants.

The complaint admits the judgment of John Bader against Charles Bader, and avers no fact or circumstance to establish its invalidity. The complaint does not charge that the attachment or execution in plaintiffs' respective cases had been levied upon the property that had been attached in the case of Bader v. Bader. Without a levy they, nor either of them, could have any lien on the property, and without a lien on the property, they could not attack the judgment, or the lien, or the execution in Bader's case.

H. O. Beatty, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORP, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, creditors of the defendant Charles Bader, to set aside and cancel a judgment rendered in favor of the defendant John Bader, against Charles Bader, and to apply certain property, levied upon by the Sheriff under the latter judgment, in payment of the plaintiffs' claims. The action was tried by the Court, who found for the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which, and from an order overruling a motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

One error assigned by the appellants is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It avers that the plaintiffs, Castle & Freeborn, commenced suit against Charles Bader, January 16th, 1862, and caused an attachment to issue, which was placed in the hands of the Sheriff, and on the twenty-eighth day of January, 1862, they recovered judgment therein; that on the sixth day of February, 1862, the other plaintiffs, Tandler & Co., commenced a suit against Charles Bader, in which an attachment was also issued and placed in the hands of the Sheriff; that on the sixteenth day of January, 1862, John Bader, conspiring with Charles Bader to defraud the creditors of the latter, commenced a suit against him, caused an attachment to issue therein by which the Sheriff attached all the property, real and personal, of the defendant therein, and on the thirty-first day of January the clerk entered judgment therein by default for $1,306.64 and eighty-four dollars costs, and they aver that they are informed and believe that Charles Bader is not indebted to John Bader in said sum of $1,306.64, or any other sum whatever, and that the judgment was obtained to hinder, delay, and defraud the plaintiffs. They also aver that the Sheriff threatens to sell the property and pay the proceeds on the judgment of John Bader, and that Charles Bader has no other property.

In order to set aside a judgment or conveyance on the ground of fraud, it is not sufficient to aver in general terms that such judgment or conveyance was fraudulent, but the facts and circumstances constituting the alleged fraud must be set forth. (Kinder v. Macy, 7 Cal. 206.) The only fact charged to sustain the allegations of fraud is, "that Charles Bader is not indebted to John Bader" in the amount of the judgment or any other sum. It does not charge that he was not justly indebted in that sum at the commencement of John Bader's suit, or at the time of the rendition of the judgment; nor does it aver that John Bader's debt has been paid, satisfied, or discharged in any way.

The findings of the Court on this point are entirely insufficient to sustain the charge of fraud. They are, that the promissory notes on which the principal part of the judgment was rendered "were never filed with the Clerk, nor have they ever been produced in Court;" and "that a part of the eighty-four dollars' costs, to wit: the sum of forty-five dollars, is for receiver's fees, a charge not allowed by law, and for which the Clerk had no authority to enter judgment." The Court does not find that no such promissory notes ever existed, or that there was no debt due John Bader at the time the suit was commenced, or the judgment rendered, or the commencement of this action, which were the facts essential to sustain the charge of fraud made in the complaint. The mere fact that the notes were never filed with the Clerk or produced in Court, did not show or tend to show that no debt existed in favor of John Bader against Charles Bader. If the complaint had charged that no such notes were ever made or ever existed, then the defendants would have known that they would be required to produce them, or prove that they existed; but no such charge was made.

The fact that the attorney of John Bader, in making up the bill of costs, included an item of forty-five dollars, which he may not have been entitled to charge as part of the costs, is no evidence that the debt on which the judgment was rendered was fraudulent. It was merely a collateral matter, a mere incident of the debt. A mere error or irregularity in making out a bill of costs cannot have the effect of invalidating a judgment otherwise correct. This item of forty-five dollars seems to have been a payment made to the Sheriff for keeping the attached property, and the statute allows the Sheriff compensation for such services, to such an amount as the Court shall certify to be just and reasonable. (Wood's Dig. 443, 444, Sec. 29.) And such compensation the plaintiff had a clear right to tax as part of his costs. No objection seems to have been made that the sum thus paid to the Sheriff was unreasonable. Besides, the defendant John Bader offered to remit this sum of forty-five dollars and deduct it from the costs in his judgment, but it was not allowed. It results that neither the facts alleged in the complaint or as found by the Court, are sufficient to sustain the charge of fraud.

There is also another objection to the complaint, that it does not aver or show that the plaintiffs have acquired any lien upon the property they seek to reach and have applied in satisfaction of their debts, or that they have obtained judgments on their debts on which executions have been issued which have been returned no property found. (Hyneman v. Danenburg, 6 Cal. 376; Thornbury v. Hand, 7 Id. 554.) The complaint does not state whether the property levied upon by the Sheriff was real or personal, or consisted of both kinds; nor does it aver that the attachments issued by the plaintiffs were ever levied upon the property by which they would have acquired an attachment lien. In these respects the complaint is defective.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

GAVITT v. DOUB.

It is not error for a Court to allow pleadings to be amended so as to supply a defect or omission even after the commencement of a trial.

Courts should exercise great liberality in allowing Sheriffs to amend their returns so as to make them conform to the true state of facts and to correct errors and mistakes.

The case of Borland v. O'Neal (22 Cal.) affirmed.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Marin County.

The complaint alleges that about the twenty-sixth day of August, 1858, defendant with force and arms entered upon plaintiff's premises and forcibly took from plaintiff's possession, and drove and carried away, and converted to his own use, a yoke of oxen and two cows, the property of plaintiff.

The action was commenced February 19th, 1859. Defendant answered March 3d, 1859, setting up that he made the seizure as Sheriff by virtue of an attachment issued against the property of plaintiff March 6th, 1858, and sold the property on the twenty-sixth of August, 1858, by virtue of an execution dated August 16th, 1858, issued on a judgment recovered against plaintiff in the same action.

March 7th, 1860, the cause came on for trial and a jury was impaneled. After plaintiff had introduced part of his testimony defendant asked and obtained leave of the Court to amend his answer so as to set up a levy on the property by virtue of the execution made August 17th, 1858. On the sixth day of August, 1860, the day before the trial, the defendant asked and obtained leave of the Court to amend his return on the execution made in 1858 so as to include the property sued for.

Defendant had judgment and plaintiff appealed.

H. J. Wells, for Appellant.

Although it is a matter of discretion in the Court to allow amendments yet there must be reasonable grounds upon which to base the discretion. Here no showing is made, no reason shown why an amendment is made necessary at the time.

The object of introducing the Sheriff's amended return was to include a yoke of oxen and two cows (which plaintiff had claimed as exempt from execution as a farmer), which were not specified in first return, and which had been sold by the defendant.

Plaintiff claims that defendant could not make testimony for himself in that manner, and that the Court erred in allowing him to do so. The return of the Sheriff is evidence for him, created by himself, yet a complete defense to the action. It is relied on as such

here. The return of an officer is conclusive evidence in his favor. (Lias v. Badger, 6 N. H. 393.)

This conclusiveness of the officer's return must arise in part at least from his character as such officer, and the presumption is that when he makes his return he is acting indifferently and without any anticipation of a suit. But to hold that after suit is brought and on the very day of the trial, and a year and a half after his return had been made and filed, and he had conducted his defense for so long a time on the theory of his first return, he may make a return and give it in evidence to constitute his defense, would be to set at naught almost all the principles upon which the rule is based which makes a Sheriff's return evidence for himself.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORRE, C. J. concurring.

This is an action against the defendant, Sheriff of Marin County, to recover damages for the sale of certain personal property on an execution against the plaintiff, and claimed by him as exempt from levy and sale. The defendant recovered judgment, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The Court below permitted the defendant to amend his answer by adding an averment of the levy upon the property, and this is assigned as error. The amendment was properly allowed, and this point is therefore overruled.

On the trial the defendant offered in evidence an amendment to his return upon the execution, which had been made in pursuance of an order of the Court, on that day or the day before, to which the plaintiff objected. The material part of the amendment to the return was that which included in the levy and notice of sale a yoke of oxen and two cows, which the plaintiff claims were exempt from execution. It is not contended that this property was not in fact levied upon and sold under the execution, or that the return as amended, is not in strict accordance with the facts; nor does it appear that the plaintiff was injured in any way by allowing the amendment to be made. Courts exercise great liberality in allowing officers to amend their returns so as to make them conform to the true facts, and to correct errors and mistakes; and if in thus amending the officer makes a false return, he is liable therefor, and such amendments are often allowed after a great lapse of time. (Thatcher v. Miller, 11 Mass. 413; Adams v. Robinson, 1 Pick. 461; Haven v. Snow, 14 Id. 28; Johnson v. Day, 17 Id. 106; Burk v. Hardy, 6 Greenl. 162; Gilman v. Stetson, 4 Me. 124; Williams v. Rogers, 5 J. R. 163; Malone v. Samuel, 3 A. K. Marsh, 350; Woodward v. Harbin, 4 Ala. 534.) In one of these cases a return was allowed to be amended after the lapse of twenty years, and in another after six years.

In Maherin v. Brackett (5 N. H. 9) an officer having an execution in a case where bail had been given, returned that he had given notice to the bail, but omitted to make a return of non est incoetus as to the principal, and it was held that he might amend, and insert a return to that effect in order to charge the bail. In Smith v. Hudson (1 Cowan, 430) the Sheriff had sold three parcels of land under an execution, but in the certificate of sale which he had made and filed, he omitted one of them by mistake, and the Court ordered him to amend by inserting therein the omitted tract. In Smith v. Daniel's Executors (3 Murphy, 128) the Sheriff had sold some property on execution, which in fact belonged to a third party, who had sued him and recovered the value, and the Court allowed him to amend his return by striking out the levy and sale of the property, and return the execution "no property found," and withdraw the sale money which he had paid into Court. In the present case the Court properly allowed the amendment.

The plaintiff claimed to be a farmer, and that the property was exempt under the third clause of the two hundred and nineteenth section of the Practice Act. The property was levied on by the attachment March 10th, 1858, and it was not sold until the twenty-sixth day of August—a lapse of more than five months. The evidence shows that the plaintiff kept a sort of tavern or drinking saloon, and cultivated about twenty acres of land adjacent thereto in vegetables. He also owned a sloop which he navigated, and one question appears to have been, the kind of business or occupation he was engaged in, and under which he could properly claim exemption. No evidence appears to have been given of any selection, or notice to the Sheriff that he claimed the property as exempt at the time of the levy or at any time before the day of sale, nor is any reason or excuse given for the delay. The instructions of the Court upon this question of exemption do not appear in the statement, but the appellant assigns for error that the verdict is against the law and the evidence.

In the case of Borland v. O'Neal (22 Cal. 504), we have laid down the rules of law upon this subject. In that case we held that it was the duty of the debtor to make his selection and notify the Sheriff within a reasonable time after notice of the levy. Under the circumstances of this case, the jury might very properly have concluded that the plaintiff waived his right to claim the exemption by his delay, and the verdict and judgment ought not therefore to be disturbed on this ground. The presumption is that the Court gave the jury proper instructions as to the law governing the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE REAL DEL MONTE CONSOLIDATED GOLD AND SILVER MINING COMPANY v. THE POND GOLD AND SILVER MINING COMPANY.

WHEREAS an injunction is granted without notice, upon the filing of a complaint, and an answer is afterwards filed denying all the equities of the complaint, the injunction will be dissolved on motion.

If the plaintiffs permit the defendants to remain in possession of a mining claim several months without interference, working it as their own and expending large sums of money in developing it, a Court of Equity will require a very clear and strong showing to induce it to grant or sustain a preliminary injunction to stop the work.

When the title to the property is in dispute, the question, whether the creditors are solvent and able to respond in damages, forms an important element in passing upon an application for an injunction pending the litigation.

APPEAL from the Sixteenth Judicial District, Mono County.

Real Del Monte Mining Co. v. Pond Mining Co.

The complaint was filed August 10th, 1863, and avers that on the ninth day of February, 1863, the plaintiffs were the owners of, in the actual possession, and entitled to the possession of a gold and silver quartz lode, known as the Aurora Mine Ledge, commencing at a point distant fourteen feet in a direction north fifty-six degrees west from the cut in the ledge at the mouth of the shaft known as the old Aurora Shaft, and from said point of commencement extending in a westerly direction eight hundred feet on the ledge, and in an easterly direction eight hundred feet on the ledge; and that defendants on the said day and on divers days from that time until the commencement of the suit, and while plaintiffs were still the owners of and in possession of the ledge, with force and arms sunk pits and shafts upon, and excavated drifts and tunnels into the ledge, and took, removed, and carried away from the ledge large quantities of gold and silver-bearing rock, etc.

An injunction was granted by the County Judge the same day the complaint was filed on plaintiffs' application, without notice to defendants.

August 12th, 1863, the defendants filed their answer, and thereupon moved that the injunction be dissolved. The County Judge refused to dissolve the injunction, and from this order denying the motion to dissolve defendants appeal.

The injunction should have been dissolved. All the equities of the complaint are denied by the answer.

CHOCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

Repl Del Monte Mining Co. v. Pond Mining Co.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an injunction which had been granted upon the complaint, without notice to the defendants. The defendants filed an answer denying all the material allegations of the complaint, and moved thereon to dissolve the injunction, which was denied. The main question at issue is the ownership of the quartz ledge which the defendants are engaged in working—the plaintiffs claiming that it is a part of the “Aurora Ledge,” owned by them; and the defendants denying that it is part of the “Aurora Ledge,” aver that it is a part of the “Pond Lode,” owned by them, and that they are engaged in working the same as the rightful owners thereof.

The rule has been settled by this Court, that where a motion is made to dissolve an injunction upon complaint and answer, the injunction will be dissolved if the answer denies all the equities of the complaint, unless the complaint is supported by additional affidavits. (Gardiner v. Perkins, 9 Cal. 553; Burnett v. Whitesides, 13 Id. 156; Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Id. 263; Johnson v. The Wide West Co., 22 Id. 479.)

It appears that the defendants have been in possession of the quartz ledge in question for several months, have expended large sums of money in developing and working the same, and were, at the time of the granting of the injunction, and had, for some time previously, been working the mine as their own. In such case it requires a very clear and strong showing to induce a Court of Equity to grant or sustain an injunction to stop the work. There must be an urgent necessity, and, as a general rule, the title and right of the plaintiffs should be shown to be clear, well established and not in dispute. The application should also be made promptly, and not delayed until large expenditures have been made by the defendants. (Clavering v. Clavering, 2 Pierre Wm. 388; Anonymous, Ambler, 209; 18 Vesey, 515; Norway v. Rowe, 19 Id. 144; Field v. Beaumont, 1 Swanston, 203; Hilton v. Granville, 1 Craig & Phillips, 283.)

When the title to the property is in dispute between the parties, the extent of inconvenience and expense to which the defendant would be subjected by the granting of the injunction, as compared with the injury the plaintiff would be likely to suffer if refused, often forms an important consideration in determining the right to an injunction. (Hicks v. Compton, 18 Cal. 210; 3 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 1860; Adams' Eq. 357; Bruce v. Delaware & Hudson Canal Co., 119 Barb., S. C., 371.) The question whether the defendants are solvent, and able to respond in the damages they may cause by their acts or not, is often an important one in such cases. (Burnett v. Whitesides, 13 Cal. 156; 2 Story's Eq. Sec. 925; Waldron v. Marsh, 5 Cal. 119.) The plaintiffs in this case have set up no circumstances of this kind to sustain their application for the injunction.

The injunction is dissolved.

SEAEVER v. FITZGERALD.

In a suit commenced before a Justice of the Peace, if the summons be returned by the officer with his indorsement thereon that no service has been made because defendant cannot be found, and on the return day thereof it is further made to appear by affidavit that the defendant conceals himself to avoid service of process, the suit does not thereby abate, but the magistrate may continue the cause, issue a new summons, and make an order for its service by publication, and fix the return day of the new summons at a time sufficiently remote to have the service by publication completed before the return day, even if the period between the issuance of the new summons and its return day exceeds ten days.

In such case when an attachment is regularly issued by the Justice, at the time of the issuance of the first summons, the attachment is not vitiated by the failure to serve the first summons and the issuance of a second one, nor is the validity of attachment in any way affected by the proceedings.

The affidavit stated that the "defendant, D. C. Seaver, was at the time a resident of the first township in the County of Contra Costa; that he had occupied a house on a tract of land claimed to be his own and which he had cultivated up to the commencement of the suit and for a long time previous; that on the twenty-second day of October, the day before the commencement of the suit, he left his residence informing his servant that he would be back that evening or the next day; that the summons in the suit was put in the hands of a proper constable, who made diligent search and was wholly unable to serve it; that Seaver had not returned to his residence, and that he believed he concealed himself for the purpose of avoiding the service of the summons, and that the claim sued on is a just debt."

Held, to be sufficient to authorize the service by publication, and when publication made to give the Court jurisdiction.

Seaver v. Fitzgerald.

An order of publication of summons, made by a Justice, need not state that the paper designated "is the one most likely to give notice to the person to be served."

The publication of summons may be proved by the affidavit of the Clerk of the publisher of the paper, and the fact that the summons was deposited in a post-office may also be proved by affidavit; nor is it necessary that the constable state in his return on the summons that such publication was made and such deposit made in the post-office.

When the contract sued on is a joint contract of two defendants, and judgment is entered up against one only, it is not such an error as renders the judgment void so that it can be attacked in a collateral proceeding.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

At the time of the issuance of the attachment by the Justice, the constable in whose hands it was placed levied on several head of cattle and horses as the property of D. C. Seaver. Judgment was rendered by the Justice, November 17th, 1860. November 10th, 1860, Robert Seaver commenced an action against the constable, Fitzgerald, to recover possession of the property attached. The defendant answered, justifying under the attachment. Defendant recovered judgment, and plaintiff appealed. The remainder of the facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

Merrill, Clement, and White, for Appellants.

A void judgment—and consequently a void attachment, since attachment is only a means to secure the payment of the judgment, is unavailable for any purpose. It constitutes no justification, and all persons concerned in executing it are trespassers. (Doty v. Brown, 4 How. 429; Elliott v. Piersoll, 1 Pet. 328.) Especially is this the case when the party against whom it is sought to be enforced is a stranger to it. (Downs v. Fuller, 2 Metcalf, 138.) A void attachment gives an officer no lien upon the property. (Low v. Henry, 9 Cal. 552.) It gives the officer no right to take the property from the party against whom it is issued; surely it cannot give him any right to take it from an innocent party in possession under claim of ownership.

There was no attachment in the action in which judgment was rendered against D. C. Seaver. The writ issued on the twenty-third of October was void, so far as that action was concerned. It was issued before the summons. An attachment issued before summons is void, and the subsequent issuance of summons cannot cure it. (Low v. Henry, 9 Cal. 552; Pr. Act, Sec. 551.) The writ of attachment was issued on the twenty-third of October, subsequent to the issuance of a summons on that day. On the twenty-seventh, the return day, no service of the summons having been made, and no jurisdiction of the defendants in the action having been acquired, the Justice could not and did not proceed against them, but issued another summons, bearing date of that day, the twenty-seventh, and being returnable on the seventh of November — eleven days thereafter.

The issuance of summons is one of the acts to be performed upon the commencement of an action in a Justice's Court. An action is not commenced until summons is issued. There is no provision in the Practice Act for more than one summons in an action, and the issuance of the one is the commencement of the action. The attachment was issued and levied four days before the issuance of the summons. The new action commenced on the twenty-seventh in a manner to enable the Justice to acquire jurisdiction of the defendants by publication of summons and could not relate back to the twenty-third.

The affidavit was not sufficient to authorize service by publication. (Pr. Act, Sec. 543.) It does not show that any effort was made to find the defendants. It states that diligent search was made, but does not state what acts constituted that diligent search. (Swain et al. v. Chase, 12 Cal. 283.) There are no facts stated which show that the defendants concealed themselves to avoid service of process. The affiant's belief that they so concealed themselves was no fact upon which the Justice was authorized to act. (Same case as above.) It does not properly appear that a cause of action existed against the defendants. The facts constituting the cause of action should have been stated. The facts necessary to authorize publication are required to appear to the satisfaction of the Justice; and the Justice has no right to be "satisfied" upon the mere opinions of others, nor upon any less evidence than a man of ordinary intelligence and discretion would require in proof of any fact upon which he was called upon to act in the ordinary business of life. (Crandall v. Bryan, 15 How. 41.)

The order of publication is insufficient. It does not show that the paper designated was the one most likely to give notice to the persons to be served. (Pr. Act, Sec. 543.)

There is no return of the last summons—no sufficient evidence of service by publication. The law does not provide for a return of process by any person other than the officer or person to whom it was delivered for service. The return of the officer is as much a part of the record as the docket itself; and if such return fail to show personal service, the recital in the docket based upon such return alone can not be relied upon as giving validity and effect to the judgment. (Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 300.) The affidavit of the printer is not, in Justice's Courts, sufficient proof of service by publication. Sec. 33 of the Practice Act is not made applicable to Justice's Courts. (Secs. 533, 555.)

A Justice can no more make a summons returnable eleven days after date, than he could make it returnable in eleven months. (Secs. 541, 543, Pr. Act; Diedesheimer v. Browne, 8 Cal. 339.) A process unknown to the law, or prohibited by the law, makes the case no better than where there is an absence of all process and appearance. (Sanders v. Raines, 10 Missouri, 770.)

The Justice could acquire no jurisdiction of Seaver by a summons to Seaver, except upon personal service, and proof that the person served was the one named in the process, or intended to be named. (Sutter v. Cox, 6 Cal. 415.)

Blake & Wright, for Respondent.

The affidavit was sufficient to authorize the order of publication. (6 Cal. 197; 12 Id. 100; Pr. Act, Sec. 543.) The order complied with the statute. (Pr. Act, Sec. 543.) The affidavit of the Clerk shows a substantial compliance with the order. The published summons was issued on the twenty-seventh of October and was made returnable on the seventh of November. The publication commenced on the twenty-ninth of October, and the affidavit made on the seventh of November shows a publication of one week. Sec. 543 of the Practice Act authorizes a Justice to make his summons returnable more than ten days after date. The docket shows that the case was called for trial on November 7th, the return day mentioned in the summons. (Cow. Treat. 4th Ed. 664.) A copy of the summons was deposited in the post-office. The respondent was constable, and held the property by virtue of an attachment issued from Justice Dyer's Court, at the time it was replevied by appellant.

We contend that the attachment being regularly issued gave the respondent a standing in Court, to attack the sale between the Seavers for fraud. (Thornburgh v. Hand, 7 Cal. 554.)

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of certain personal property. The plaintiff claims title thereto by virtue of a bill of sale from D. C. Seaver, the former owner; but before a change of possession had been effected, under the bill of sale, the property was levied upon by the defendant, a constable, under an attachment issued by a Justice of the Peace in an action of Hagy & Gill against D. C. Seaver & J. W. Crosby, and the defendant claims the right to hold the property by virtue of the levy under this attachment. The Court below held this levy and attachment to be valid, and a verdict was rendered for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

It appears that at the time the attachment issued, a summons was also issued in the action, dated October 23d, 1860, and made returnable October 27th, 1860. On the return day this summons was returned not served. Thereupon the Justice of the Peace, upon an affidavit that the defendant concealed himself to avoid the service of summons, made an order that the summons be served by publication for one week, and a new summons was issued, dated October 27th, and made returnable November 7th. Upon proof of the publication of this summons a judgment by default was entered against the defendant, D. C. Seaver. Before any execution was issued on this judgment the present action was commenced.

The plaintiff contends that the second summons was the summons in the case, because that was the summons served by publication, and as the writ of attachment was issued before this second summons, it was therefore void, under Sec. 551 of the Practice Act. This point is clearly untenable. A summons was duly issued before or at the time of the issuing of the attachment, and the attachment was therefore valid when it issued. The fact that the defendant absented himself so that that summons could not be served on him before the return day thereof, and that it was returned not served, could not have the effect of vitiating the attachment. No rule of law or provision of statute has been referred to by counsel to sustain any such position, and such a principle would be most pernicious in its consequences. It would only be necessary for a debtor to conceal himself for a few days, until the return day of a summons issued against him had passed, to invalidate any attachment which had been issued against him. A principle so manifestly unjust in its results could only be sustained by clear and positive statutory provisions, which do not exist in our laws. The argument of the appellant is based upon the idea that a plaintiff is entitled to only one summons in an action, and that if he fails to procure a service of that summons within the time fixed for its return, and it is therefore returned not served, the action is thereby abated or determined, that the attachment falls with it, and the issuing of a new summons is the commencement of a new suit. This argument is without foundation, as the plaintiff in such case is entitled to a new summons and a continuance of the case until such time as he can procure a service of the same, by publication or otherwise, and the suit is not abated or determined thereby, nor is the attachment in any way affected by the proceeding.

It is further contended that the judgment rendered in the action in which the attachment issued is void, on the ground that the affidavit on which the order to publish the summons was made is insufficient. The affidavit states that the defendant, D. C. Seaver, was at the time a resident of the First Township in the County of Contra Costa; that he had occupied a house on a tract of land claimed by him to be his own, and which he had cultivated up to the commencement of the suit and for a long time previous; that on the twenty-second day of October, the day before the commencement of the suit, he left his residence, informing his servants that he would be back that evening or the next day; that the summons in the suit was put in the hands of a proper constable, who made diligent search and was wholly unable to serve it; that Seaver had not returned to his residence, and that he believed that he concealed himself for the purpose of avoiding the service of the summons; and that the claim sued on is a just debt. The return of the summons by the constable is "not found in the county." The return of the officer that the party could not be found is sufficient evidence of proper diligence, and the affidavit of the plaintiff in that action showing that the defendant resided in the township and county, and the facts respecting his absenting himself from his home, show sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the order of publication.

It is also objected that the order of publication is defective, because in designating the newspaper in which to publish the summons, it did not state that such paper was "most likely to give notice to the person to be served," or which summons was to be thus published. These objections are not well taken. The order directs the summons to be published in a certain newspaper, with the time it was to be thus published, and the presumption is that the Justice designated such particular paper because it was most likely to give notice to the person to be served, but it was not necessary for him to state in the order that such was his reason. The summons to be served was any legal summons issued in the case. The first summons had been returned not served, and it was therefore the second summons which was to be served by the publication—the first one having no longer any force.

The publication of the summons was proved by the affidavit of the principal clerk of the publishers of the newspaper, and the fact that a copy of the summons had been duly deposited in the post-office, properly directed, was proved by the affidavit of a competent witness. We think this a proper mode of proving such facts, and that a return of such facts, indorsed upon the summons by a constable or Sheriff, is not necessary in such cases.

It is also objected that the summons served is irregular and illegal, because it was returnable eleven days after its date, and it is urged that this is contrary to the provisions of Sec. 541 of the Practice Act, which allows no time exceeding ten days. Sec. 543 provides that in cases of non-residence, departure from the State, or concealment by defendant, the publication of the summons shall be ordered "for such length of time as may be deemed reasonable, at least one week," but in cases of non-residence or absence from the State, the publication "shall not be less than three months." It is evident that in the last class of cases the summons must be made returnable more than ten days from its date, and in many cases of concealment in the State, a reasonable time might require a publication for more than ten days, and a limit to ten days would prevent a proper service. These two sections of the statute must be so construed as to make them harmonize if possible, so that both can be rendered effectual. We think that the provisions of Sec. 541 do not properly apply to cases where summons has to be published as provided by Sec. 543; and that in the latter class of cases the return day may be fixed at such time as will enable the summons to be published as required by the order before such return day. And the fact that such return day is more than ten days from the date of the summons will not invalidate it in such cases.

It is also objected that the judgment is against D. C. Seaver, while the name in the published summons is "D. C. Seavers." The names are substantially the same, and there was therefore no error in this. It is further insisted that the judgment is void because the cause of action was a joint contract of Seaver & Crosby, and the judgment was not entered up "against all the defendants," as required by Sec. 594 of the Practice Act, but only against Seaver alone. This objection goes only to the form of the judgment, and it has no force in this collateral proceeding. It does not render the judgment void, and therefore cannot be interposed in this action.

We have thus noticed numerous objections of the appellants to the proceedings of the Justice subsequent to the issuing of the attachment, but even if the record had shown that the judgment in that case was irregular or void it would not have aided the appellant in this action. It would only have shown that the plaintiffs in that action had failed to obtain a valid judgment, in consequence of irregularities in the proceedings before the Justice, by which he failed to obtain jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants therein. The Justice still had jurisdiction of the case and the subject matter, and the plaintiffs therein would, in such case, be compelled to proceed and take the proper steps in that action to enable the Justice to acquire jurisdiction of the persons as well as of the subject matter in order to enable him to render a valid judgment. Even if the plaintiffs in that action had failed to obtain a valid judgment that fact alone would not operate as a release or discharge of the attachment, which had been regularly and legally issued. That would have still remained valid and effectual, notwithstanding the subsequent alleged irregularity or invalidity of the proceedings before the Justice in the rendition of the judgment. The property would still have been bound by the attachment, which was sufficient to enable the defendant to attack the sale to the plaintiff in this action, and to show its invalidity as against the plaintiffs in the attachment suit who were the creditors of D. C. Seaver. (Thornburgh v. Hand, 7 Cal. 554.)

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

THE PEOPLE v. WALLACE.

In a criminal case, when the People appeal to the Supreme Court, the notice of appeal must be served on the defendant personally, if he reside in the county where the trial was had.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions of Contra Costa County.

The defendant was indicted for perjury, and tried and convicted in the County of Contra Costa. The defendant's attorney (John F. Swift), on the trial in the Court of Sessions, resided in the City and County of San Francisco. After the jury had rendered their verdict, the Court of Sessions, on motion of defendant's attorney, arrested the judgment. From the order arresting the judgment the People appealed. The notice of appeal was served on defendant's attorney, at Sacramento, where he was temporarily sojourning. The defendant, at the time, was residing in Contra Costa County.

Attorney-General, for Appellant.

S. S. Wright, for Respondent.

The mode of taking appeals in criminal cases prescribed by law, is laid down in Wood's Digest, 308, Art. 1706, Secs. 486, 488: "The motion must be served on the defendant (where the People appeal) if he resides in the county; if not, then on the attorney who appeared for him in the trial below. If such service cannot be made, then by advertisement."

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. concurring.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the notice of appeal was served on his attorney, who lived out of the county, instead of on him personally, as required by the statute (Wood's Digest, 308, Sec. 488), he residing in the county at the time.

The objection is well taken, and the appeal is therefore dismissed.

MULFORD v. ESTUDILLO et al.

▲ LEVY under an execution upon sufficient personal property to satisfy the same, is a satisfaction of the judgment, sufficient at least to discharge third persons who are liable collaterally or as sureties therefor, and the release of the property from levy thus made, without the consent of the parties thus liable, cannot revive their liability.

The law does not deem such levy a payment, but it is a satisfaction or discharge.

Where such levy is set forth in the answer as a defense, it is new matter, and under the former provisions of the Practice Act concerning replications, is deemed admitted, unless a replication is filed denying the same.

If an Appellate Court affirms the judgment of the Court below with costs, and upon the filing of its mandate of affirmance in the Court below, an order is made directing a new judgment to be entered up in accordance with the directions of the mandate, such new judgment, although it may be erroneous or irregular, is not void so as to invalidate an execution issued on the same.

APPEAL from the Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

On the twenty-ninth day of January, 1857, Clement Boyreau recovered judgment in the Circuit Court of the United States for California, in an action of ejectment against Robert Campbell, Thos. W. Mulford, the present plaintiff, and thirty-six others, occupants of a portion of the San Leandro Rancho, for the recovery of the possession of a portion of said rancho, and costs of suit. From said judgment the defendants therein prosecuted a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, and to enable them to do so, the defendants in the judgment as principals and George V. Sanchs, James P. Valliant, G. W. Kinser, and John G. Bray, as sureties, executed the usual writ of error bond.

The defendants in this action, Juana M. Estudillo and eleven others, none of whom were defendants in the judgment recovered by Boyreau in the Circuit Court of the United States, on the twenty-ninth day of August, 1857, executed to the defendants in the judgment recovered by Boyreau a bond by which they covenanted to indemnify them and their sureties on the writ of error bond against all damages and costs from any judgment already recovered or to be recovered in the suit of Boyreau v. Campbell et al.

The judgment recovered by Boyreau was, on the thirty-first day of January, 1859, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States with costs; and on the same day the mandate of affirmance was sent down to the Circuit Court. Upon the filing of the mandate of affirmance, and on the ninth day of November, 1859, the Circuit Court on plaintiff's motion, without notice to the defendants, made an order that judgment be entered in accordance with the mandate; and on the same day a new judgment for costs was entered in favor of Boyreau. On the thirtieth day of November, 1859, an execution was issued on this new judgment and placed in the hands of the Marshal, who, on the second day of December, 1859, levied on sufficient of the goods of James Kennedy, one of the defendants, to satisfy the judgment; and on the same day the sale of the property was suspended by order of the Judge of the Circuit Court, and on the fourth day of February, 1860, the Circuit Court made an order that the original judgment in the case of Mulford v. Estudillo.

Boyreau v. Campbell et al. be enforced and not the new judgment, and that the costs directed to be collected by the mandate of the Supreme Court be made, nunc pro tunc, a part of the original judgment, and that execution issue for the enforcement of the same. On the twenty-first day of February, 1860, the Marshal, by order of Boyreau's attorney, released the levy which he had made on Kennedy's goods. On the sixteenth day of February, 1860, Bray, one of the sureties on the writ of error bond, was called on to pay the judgment for costs, and paid the same to Boyreau, the plaintiff. Bray then sued Mulford, one of the principals in the writ of error bond for reimbursement, and recovered judgment against him; and on the eleventh day of June, 1860, Mulford paid him the full amount of the judgment, $1,704.68. Mulford then brought the present action upon the indemnity bond given by Estudillo and others to recover judgment for the money thus paid. Plaintiff had judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

W. W. Crane, Jr., for Appellants.

The allegation that the execution was levied upon the goods and chattels of James Kennedy, sufficient in value to satisfy the judgment, is an averment of new matter, and not being replied to, stands admitted upon the record. It is a statement of facts occurring between Boyreau and Kennedy, the legal effect of which, we claim, was to avoid the liability.

Our answer confesses that the bond of indemnity was executed; that there was a judgment for costs; that Bray paid it; but we avoid the legal effect of those facts by stating that something occurred before the payment which discharges us per se.

In Frisch v. Caler (21 Cal. 71) this Court held, that an allegation of payment in an action upon a note was not new matter, because an essential averment of the complaint was non-payment. In the case at bar, there is no question as to whether or not the bond of indemnity has been paid. It was not necessary to allege it had not been paid. A statement of the above facts confessed by us leads to the legal conclusion that the indemnitors are bound. How can we avoid that conclusion? Either by showing that we paid it, or that something has occurred which in law discharges us. We show the latter, and do not claim that we paid.

Mulford v. Estudillo.

In an action at law upon a contract, about the only issues that can be presented, are: 1st. That the defendant never made the contract. 2d. That he has paid the claim. 3d. That since he made the contract, something has occurred, the legal effect of which is to discharge him. The first two constitute the general issue, the last, new matter. Goddard v. Fulton (21 Cal. 430) is to the same effect as Friech v. Caler.

The defendants here are third persons as to the judgment in the suit between Boyreau v. Campbell et al. They are sureties, to the effect that Boyreau will not compel Mulford to pay his judgment for costs. Therefore, a levy upon the property of Kennedy by Boyreau of sufficient value to satisfy the writ is as between the execution plaintiff and defendant, at least, prima facie, a satisfaction of the judgment, and as to third persons, like defendants here, is absolute satisfaction. (People v. Chisholm, 8 Cal. 29; Morley v. Dickinson, 12 Id. 563; Newson v. McLoudon, 6 Ga. 392; Duncan v. Harris, 17 Sergt. & Rawle, 436; Finley v. King, 1 Head, Tenn., 123; Brown v. Kidd, 34 Miss. 291; Voorhies v. Cross, 3 Howard's Pr. 262; Hayden v. Agent of State Prison, 1 Sand. Ch. 195.)

Respondent claims however that the judgment of November 9th, 1859, is absolutely void, and that consequently the execution under which the levy was made is also void. The record shows that the U. S. Circuit Court had jurisdiction of the persons of the defendant and the subject matter of the action. The broad proposition I urge is, that under these circumstances, the judgment or proceedings of the U. S. Circuit Court cannot be attacked collaterally, and that, though as between the parties to the suit the entry of the second judgment, might in the Circuit Court by motion, or in the Supreme Court on appeal, be held to be clearly erroneous, yet that in the case at bar it is conclusive. (Whitwell v. Barbier, 7 Cal. 54; Reynolds v. Harris, 14 Id. 667; Voorhies v. Bank of U. S., 10 Pet. 449.)

E. W. F. Sloan, for Respondent.

The averment of a levy under execution, is but a denial of the liability of Bray, as surety on the writ of error bond, circumstantially stated. It is not a statement of new matter. (Spear v. Ward et al., 20 Cal. 675; Frisch v. Caler, 21 Id. 71; Goddard v. Fulton, Id. 430.)

The seizure of Kennedy's goods by the Marshal under that execution, was not a satisfaction of the judgment of the Circuit Court, mentioned in the covenant and complaint herein, for various reasons. The mere seizure of personal property on execution, by the officer, is only a satisfaction sub modo. (Green v. Burke, 23 Wend. 495; People v. Hopson, 1 Denio, 577; Waddell v. Elmendorf, 5 Id. 448; Peck v. Tiffany, 2 Comst. 456.) Where the Sheriff or Marshal seizes as much property as he desires it is presumed to be sufficient, until the contrary appears upon a sale. A second seizure, or other excessive levy is oppressive, and renders the officer a trespasser. The first levy is, prima facie, a satisfaction as to the defendant, so long as the goods remain in the hands of the Sheriff. Not so, however, where they have been restored to and accepted by the defendant himself. But, if improperly restored or otherwise disposed of by the officer, he renders himself chargeable to the plaintiff in execution, who for that purpose may proceed against such officer as if the money had been collected. Again, the property seized may be released by order of Court, or by the direction of the plaintiff and acquiescence of the defendant; in which case, as to the officer and the parties, the matter would stand as before the levy, though it might be a discharge of the judgment lien as to a bona fide purchaser for value; as in Voorhies v. Gross (8 How. Pr. 262), cited by appellants.

The formal draft purporting to be an entry of judgment, bearing date November 9th, 1859, was a nullity. The Court had already exhausted its power over the subject matter and the parties. It was a fundamental principle of the common law, that "none could have judgment except upon complaint exhibited to the Court against the defendant whilst in Court." A final judgment puts an end to the cause in which it is pronounced. The cause itself is no longer pending. Error in law or fact, can be brought up for trial only by a new writ. If, upon reversal of the judgment for error in law, a venire facias de novo is awarded, the original cause is restored to its former position, and the Court below has jurisdiction to try the cause again.

Where the judgment below is simply affirmed on writ of error, unless it remains in the Appellate Court and is there carried into execution, no new judgment can be entered up. The Court below has no power to enter a new judgment. The original judgment is remanded alone for execution. (Eno v. Crooke, 6 How. 463, 465.)

The formal entry of judgment, in Boyreau v. Campbell et al., upon filing the mandate of the Supreme Court, was not a mere irregular erroneous proceeding. It was utterly coram non judice and void. The entry of the formal judgment must be regarded as a mere clerical act. If it possesses any validity whatever, why may not the plaintiff cause a new judgment to be entered up, from time to time, for an indefinite period, as it may suit his whims or caprices? How can absolute verity be ascribed to the judgment roll, if the plaintiff can have as many new entries of judgment made upon it as he pleases, after the suit has ended and the defendant gone hence?

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages upon a bond of indemnity. The case has been previously before this Court, on appeal from a judgment rendered upon demurrer to the complaint, and will be found reported in 17 Cal. 618. After the decision of the first appeal the defendant answered, setting forth that the parties to the agreement mentioned in the bond of indemnity were never called upon or required to pay any costs or damages recovered in the suit of Boyreau v. Campbell et al., or molested or disturbed by any judgment therein; and, further, that the costs in the action of Boyreau v. Campbell et al., were paid by other of the defendants therein than those who were parties to the agreement; that the execution issued in said action was duly levied on the goods and chattels of one James Kennedy, one of the defendants therein, but who was not a party to the agreement, to an amount and value amply sufficient to satisfy and discharge said execution; that this levy was made before the payment by Bray, and the goods and chattels were in the custody of the Marshal, under the levy, at the time of such payment. To this answer there was no replication. The action was tried by the Court, who found for the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the defendants appeal.

The appellants contend that the allegations in the answer respecting the satisfaction of the execution by a levy upon sufficient personal property is new matter, and, no replication being filed thereto, is to be deemed admitted. On the contrary, the respondent contends that these averments are in the nature of a plea of payment, and therefore not new matter needing a replication. The law is well settled that, as a general rule, a levy under an execution upon sufficient personal property to satisfy the same is a satisfaction of the judgment, sufficient at least to discharge third persons who were liable collaterally, or as sureties thereon. (People v. Chisholm, 8 Cal. 29; Mickles v. Haskin, 11 Wend. 125; Morley v. Dickinson, 12 Cal. 561.) The law does not deem such a levy a payment, but it is termed a satisfaction or discharge, and the facts thus set forth in the answer were properly new matter, and were to be taken as true, no replication denying the same having been filed.

The defendants agreed to indemnify the plaintiff against the payment of costs in Boyreau v. Campbell et al., and they were therefore in a manner collaterally liable therefor, in the nature of sureties. The levy upon sufficient personal property to satisfy the judgment and execution in that case operated as a satisfaction thereof, sufficient at least to discharge the collateral liability of these defendants. Neither the plaintiff in that action, nor Bray, one of the parties to the agreement, could do any act by which such discharge could be rendered ineffectual or nugatory, without the consent of these defendants. (Morley v. Dickinson, 12 Cal. 561.) It follows, that neither the release of the property from the levy by the plaintiff in that action, nor the subsequent voluntary payment of the judgment by Bray, could revive the liability of these defendants which had been thus discharged, unless done with their consent, no evidence of which appears in this case.

The rule that a levy upon sufficient personal property is satisfaction of the judgment is subject to many qualifications as between the parties to the judgment, which it is not necessary to notice here, as they do not apply to the case before us.

The judgment on which the execution issued may have been erroneous or irregular, but it was not void, so as to render the execution invalid. The Court in which it was rendered had jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject matter, and that was sufficient to make it valid, so far at least that it could not be inquired into in this collateral action.

The judgment of the Court below is reversed and the cause remanded.

BURNS v. McKENZIE et al.

Admissions made by one partner, after the dissolution of the partnership, concerning the partnership business, are not competent evidence to charge the other partner.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

B. P. Clement, for Appellant.

One partner can not, after dissolution of copartnership, bind the other partners by an admission relating to the partnership transactions. Gleason v. Clark, 9 Cow. 59; Baker v. Stackpole, Id. 434; Robbins v. Willard, 6 Pick. 464; Van Keusen v. Parmelee, 2 Comst. 530.)

Waller & Moore, for Respondent.

Conceding the dissolution to have taken place at the time these admissions were made, the power of one member to bind the firm does not entirely cease.

A partnership still exists, for the purpose of settling engagements made during its continuance, notwithstanding the decree of dissolution. (Johnson v. Totten, 3 Cal. 347.)

Burns v. McKenzie.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon a promissory note executed to the plaintiff by "McKenzie & Co.," a firm composed of the defendants. Dickinson was defaulted, and McKenzie filed an answer alleging that the note was given by his copartner, Dickinson, for his own individual debt, and the partnership name was signed thereto for the purpose of defrauding him. The case was tried by a jury, who found for the plaintiff, and a judgment was accordingly rendered against both defendants, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, McKenzie appeals.

On the trial the defendant McKenzie introduced one Moore as a witness, who testified that he first saw the note sued on some two or three days before it fell due, at his office, in the hands of the defendant Dickinson, and that he left it with him to have it presented to McKenzie for payment. On cross-examination the plaintiff asked the witness to state what Dickinson said at the time he left the note, to which the defendant objected that the statements of Dickinson were incompetent testimony against him, but the Court overruled the objection, to which the defendant excepted. The witness then testified that Dickinson stated that the note was made by the firm for money borrowed in the course of its business; that McKenzie should pay it, as he had the proceeds of the property, which he had left in his hands for that purpose. The refusal of the Court to sustain this objection is the first error assigned.

It appears from the pleadings and evidence that the partnership had been dissolved long before this conversation, and the appellant contends that these admissions of his copartner, therefore, are not evidence against him. Under the American decisions the rule is well established that admissions made by one partner, after the dissolution of the partnership, concerning the partnership business, are not competent evidence to charge the other partner, and this rule seems to be founded on the better reason than the contrary, which has been held in a few English cases. (1 Phillips' Evidence, C. H. & E.'s Notes, 498, notes 138, 500; Clark v. Gleason, 9 Cowen, 57; Baker v. Stackpole, Id. 420; Robbins v. Willard,

Dawley v. Hovious.

6 Pick. 464; Van Keusen v. Parmelee, 2 Comst. 530.) The respondent, however, insists that these admissions were a part of the res gestae, accompanying the delivery of the note to the witness Moore, and therefore admissible. There might be some force in this position if this act of delivery had been made for or on behalf of the partnership or his copartner, but it was made as the agent of the plaintiff, and in no sense was the act done for the partnership or his copartner. It was not, therefore, admissible on that ground.

The plaintiff also offered in evidence a paper signed by McKenzie, dated January 19th, 1862, the time of the dissolution of the partnership, in which it was stated that he was to collect the property and debts of McKenzie & Co., retain the sum of $4,577, and of the balance he was to pay to the order of Dickinson one-half, the other half belonging to him, to which the appellant objected that it was irrelevant and immaterial. The Court overruled the objection, and he excepted. This action of the Court is also assigned as error. We think this paper was not relevant to the matters in issue between these parties. There was no controversy as to the fact that McKenzie and Dickinson were partners on the first day of January, 1862, the date of the note, and there was therefore no necessity of proving that fact; and if there had been this paper affords no evidence upon that point. It was evidently a writing given upon the dissolution, setting forth how matters were to be settled between the partners, a question not in issue in this case. The Court therefore erred in admitting it.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

DAWLEY v. HOVIOUS et al.

In the statement on motion for a new trial does not show that it embodies all the evidence given on the trial, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, even if there is no conflict in the evidence contained in the statement.

The minutes of the Court during a trial copied into the transcript, are not a part of the record, unless made so by being embodied in the statement, or by a bill of exceptions.

Dawley v. Hovious.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District, San Mateo County.

The statement on motion for a new trial in this cause was agreed to by the attorneys of the parties in the following stipulation:

“MAY 28, 1862.

“It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the parties hereto and their respective attorneys, that the above statement shall be the statement on motion for a new trial herein, and on appeal.

“WM. J. BROWNSON, Defts' Att'y.

“WISE & GOUGH and FOX, Plff's Att'y's.”

Wm. J. Brownson and E. Cooke, for Appellant.

Tully R. Wise, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. and COPE, C. J. concurring.

This is an action against the Sheriff of San Mateo County and others, to recover damages for an alleged trespass in taking possession of a steam saw mill and a large quantity of lumber and stock claimed by the plaintiff. The Sheriff justified the taking under and by virtue of certain attachments in his hands; one against one Morrison, from whom the plaintiff had purchased one-half of the property, and others against said Morrison and said plaintiff. It was also charged that the conveyance which had been previously made by Morrison to the plaintiff was without consideration, and made to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of Morrison.

The assignment of error is that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. The plaintiff claimed damages in the sum of $37,000, and the verdict of the jury was in his favor, and returned damages in the sum of $2,083.33. The statement is very imperfect, and evidently does not set forth all the testimony in the case, nor does it purport to contain all of it. Under such circumstances, it is impossible for this Court to determine this point, even if there was no conflict in the evidence. The omitted evidence may make an entirely different case from that as now presented by the record.

It is urged that the evidence shows that the conveyance by Morrison to Dawley was made to defraud the creditors of the former. There is certainly very strong evidence to that effect; but still it is conflicting, and it seems to have been submitted to the jury, who must have found against the defendants on this point. It is not contended that the Court committed any error of law to the prejudice of the defendants during the trial, and this question of fraudulent intent was purely for the jury to determine, under proper instructions from the Court, which it is presumed were given though they are not set forth in the statement.

On this point it is also urged that the sheriff levied upon and sold the property by virtue of attachments and executions against both the plaintiff and Morrison, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to any damages. It is true that the amended answer sets up such facts, and the transcript contains what is termed "minutes of the Court," in which it is mentioned that some papers of that kind were introduced in evidence, and the deputy sheriff, in his evidence embodied in the statement, refers to such papers as having been in his hands. But these averments in the amended answer are not evidence, nor in the "minutes of the Court" made a part of the record by a statement or bill of exceptions, and even if they were, both they and the evidence of the deputy sheriff are entirely insufficient to enable us to determine the validity, force, or effect of these alleged attachments and executions. They should have been set out in the statement, to enable this Court to determine what weight to attach to them. Without them, we should not be justified in setting aside the verdict of the jury on this ground.

Several other points are stated by the appellant, but they amount to mere reasons why the verdict should be held to be contrary to the evidence, and it is not therefore necessary to notice them.

The judgment is affirmed.

Heyman & Lowell.

HEYMAN v. LOWELL et al.

WHEN the mortgagor sells the mortgaged property, after the execution of the mortgage, and before the commencement of a suit to foreclose, his grantees are necessary parties to the foreclosure suit.

IF the real holders of the title are not parties to the decree of foreclosure, a Court of Equity will allow them to be made such by a supplemental complaint, provided application be made within a reasonable time; but more than five years after the entry of the decree is not a reasonable time.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Harmon & Hartley, for Appellant.

The Statute of Limitations cannot be successfully interposed as a bar, in any manner, to the granting to plaintiff the relief prayed for in his supplemental complaint. The present proceeding is not in any respect a new suit, or proceeding, but merely bringing into the old proceeding a new party. Where a former suit prevents the running of the statute, it does so upon the footing that the plaintiff has pursued his remedy within the time limited by it, and in such case, the second suit is connected with the first, which is regarded as the commencement of the action to be tried. In the case at bar, there was nothing held by plaintiff upon which the statute could operate, except the note and mortgage; of course, if no suit had been brought to enforce them within the statutory period, then their collection would be barred, and holders of the mortgaged property junior to the mortgagor, would obtain priority of title over him, by reason of the extinguishment of the debt upon which the mortgage was founded;—but in this case, no such state of facts exists. The note and mortgage have gone to judgment and decree, and that before they were outlawed, and there is nothing upon which the statute can operate. The theory upon which the application of the Statute of Limitations is made to such cases is, that the lapse of time raises a presumption of payment; but this presumption may be rebutted, and it is so rebutted, by a foreclosure. (5 Wend. 296.)

Heyman v. Lowell.

John B. Felton, for Respondent.

There is but a single question involved in this case. The respondent, Bromell, insists that the Statute of Limitations is a bar to any proceedings against her. This Court has already decided principles which guided the Court below, and certainly control completely the present case. Boggs v. Hargrave and Goadenow v. Ewer, following the great current of authorities, have held that the foreclosure of a mortgage is ineffectual and void to transfer the title, when the real holder of the title is not before the Court. In Lord v. Morris, it has held that a mortgage, being a mere lien upon land incident to a debt, is barred by the statute so soon as the debt which supports it is barred, and that the vendee of land incumbered by a mortgage may avail himself of the bar of the statute to defeat the mortgage, if his right to do so has attached only for a moment, even though the mortgagor attempt to renew the lien. The Court has also decided, in Mason v. Cronise, that a judgment, like any other debt or cause of action, is barred by the statute.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORR, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose two mortgages. It was commenced on the fifteenth day of September, 1856, against the defendants, Lowell and wife, and a decree of foreclosure entered on the same day, under which the mortgaged premises were sold and purchased by the plaintiff. On the twenty-second day of March, 1862, he applied to the Court, upon affidavit, for leave to file a supplementary complaint, making several new parties of persons who had purchased a portion of the mortgaged premises of the mortgagors after the date of the mortgages, and prior to the commencement of the action. The Court granted leave to file the supplemental complaint, and it was filed accordingly, and the new parties subsequently moved to strike it from the files, which was denied, and one of them then filed a demurrer, on various grounds, one of which is the Statute of Limitations. The Court sustained the demurrer, and rendered a final judgment dismissing the supplemental complaint, from which the plaintiff appeals.

Dawley v. Ayers.

The plaintiff gives no reason or excuse why the vendees of the mortgagor were not made parties at the commencement of the action, or for the delay in filing the supplemental complaint. In the case of Goodenow v. Ewer (16 Cal. 470), this Court said: "Courts of Equity are ever ready to grant relief from sales made upon their decrees, where there has been irregularity in their proceedings rendering the title defective, as well when the purchaser or parties interested have been misled by a mistake of law as to the operation of the decree, as when they have been misled by a mistake of fact as to the condition of the property or the estate sold, provided application be made within a reasonable time, and the relief sought will not operate to the prejudice of the just rights of others." The "reasonable time" for applying to the Court in such cases is at least within the time fixed by the Statute of Limitations for the commencement of actions of a like character—that is, for the foreclosure of the mortgage, after the judgment of foreclosure has been entered. Whether a less period ought not to be fixed in such cases is not necessary to determine; for in this case, more than five years elapsed after the rendition of the judgment and the sale of the property, before the application was made to file the supplemental complaint. This cannot with propriety be considered a "reasonable time," under the rule established in Goodenow v. Ewer.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

DAWLEY AND WIFE v. AYERS.

THE fact that husband and wife do not intend to reside permanently in this State does not prohibit them from enjoying the benefit of the homestead law; but they are entitled to the right of homestead so long as they claim and use the property as such, and actually reside within the State.

The amendment to Sec. 422 of the Civil Practice Act, allowing parties to be examined as witnesses in their own behalf, did not, prior to the amendment to Sec. 395 in 1863, permit husband or wife to be witnesses for or against each other.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. E. N. Lewis, for Appellant.

The Act of 1861 does not change the common law rules prohibiting the wife and husband from testifying for or against each other, and Sec. 422 as it now stands does not modify or repeal Sec. 395 of the Practice Act. Sec. 395 expressly prohibits them from testifying for or against each other. The objection is not that they are parties in interest or to the record, but that they are man and wife. That disability has not been removed but established by Sec. 395, as it existed at common law. Under the Statutes of 1851 and 1860, we submit, to entitle a person to a homestead right, he must be:

1st. A citizen of the State or a bona fide resident thereof, in the sense that the expression "bona fide residents" is used in the Constitution, Art. 1, Sec. 17.

2d. It must be the permanent residence of such persons, with his or her family, with the intent of impressing it with the character of a homestead. (Cook v. McChristian, 4 Cal. 23.)

3d. Such persons must have no other residence or property either in or out of this State, claimed by them as a homestead.

H. O. Beatty, for Respondents.

Dawley and wife were both plaintiffs, and necessarily plaintiffs. Neither one could sue alone for the homestead. (See Pool v. Girard, 6 Cal. 73; 8 Id. 72-75, 353.) The Statutes of 1861, 522, or Practice Act, 422, provides that "a party to an action or proceeding may be examined as a witness in his own behalf." Another portion of the same section provides certain exceptions to this rule; among others, that where one of the original parties to the contract on which suit is brought is dead, the surviving party shall not testify, showing an intention to restrict the rule to cases where there was at least a partial equality. But there is no exception to the general rule. Now, does any body believe the Legislature intended to deprive a man of one of his most important privileges in the prosecution of legal rights, simply because he was a married man, and some technical rule of law required that his wife should be joined with him as a party to a suit? The mistake here is in saying the parties testify for each other. They testify for themselves; and the fact that the same testimony inures to the benefit of the other, is a mere incident. The statute which allows a man to testify, does not make an exception of those cases where his testimony, given for himself incidentally, inures to the benefit of his wife.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a tract of land, claimed by the plaintiffs as a homestead, and which the husband had sold and conveyed to the defendant. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs in the Court below, from which the defendant appeals.

It appears from the record that the plaintiffs own a tract of land in Missouri, incumbered by a mortgage, and that it has been their intention, after making some money here—sufficient at least to pay off the mortgage—to return to that State to reside, and the appellant contends that they are not citizens of this State, or bona fide residents, and therefore are not entitled to the benefits of the homestead law. In this he is mistaken. The homestead law is not limited in its operation to any class, but is universal in its application; and all classes of persons are entitled to its benefits, without any distinction as to citizenship, or capability of becoming citizens. So long as the parties actually reside in the State, and use the property as a home, they cannot be denied the the benefits secured by the law.

On the trial, the Court permitted the plaintiffs, husband and wife, to testify on their own behalf, under notice given in accordance with the provisions of the amendment of 1861 to Sec. 422 of the Practice Act; and this the appellant assigns as error. This objection is well taken. Sec. 395, before it was amended in 1863, expressly provided that the "husband shall not be a witness for or against his wife, nor a wife a witness for or against her husband." Although Sec. 422 provided that a party to an action might be examined as a witness in his own behalf, the same as any other witness, it was necessarily qualified by the provisions of Sec. 395, which virtually prohibits such examination where the parties are husband and wife. This construction is necessary, in order that both sections may stand and have effect. Any other view would operate as a virtual repeal of Sec. 395, which evidently was not intended by the Legislature. It is no valid answer to say that each one testified on his and her own behalf, and not on behalf of the other; because they were, to all intents and purposes, testifying for each other. The Court, therefore, erred in permitting them to testify.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

GUY v. WASHBURN.

WHEREAS taxes have been illegally assessed, and the tax collector is about to sell the property for the taxes thus assessed, the tax can be paid under protest and the money recovered back by action.

The presumption of law is that a Board of Equalisation perform their duty and correct any inequality in the assessment of taxes.

It is not sufficient in a pleading to state in general terms that a valuation of property is "unjust, disproportioned, and unequal," without stating clearly and distinctly wherein the alleged valuation is "unjust, disproportioned, and unequal."

APPEAL from the Twelfth District Court, City and County of San Francisco.

This was an action brought to recover back the sum of eleven thousand and thirty dollars and two cents, and interest from the date of payment, which sum was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant, the tax collector of the City and County of San Francisco, under protest. The remainder of the facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitcomb, Pringle & Felton, for Appellants.

Currey and Mastick, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NOXTON, J. concurring.

Gay v. Washburn.

This is an action to recover from the defendant, the Tax Collector of San Francisco, a certain sum of money paid him by the plaintiff for taxes, under protest, on the ground that the proceedings of the public officers respecting the tax list were irregular and void. The case was tried by the Court, who found for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The pleadings in this case are under oath. The complaint is made up almost entirely of averments of matters of evidence merely, and it is difficult to find an issuable fact properly stated in it. The answer follows the complaint, and the findings are subject to the same objection. But as no motion was made to strike out the objectionable averments, this Court can take no action upon it. This state of the pleadings and findings, however, renders it difficult to properly investigate the question presented for adjudication. The necessary averments in a case of this kind are few and simple, and there can be no excuse for stuffing the complaint with matters of evidence instead of the issuable facts. As an attempt to convert the complaint into a bill of discovery, it directly violates the spirit and letter of the four hundred and seventeenth section of the Practice Act. (Bowen v. Aubrey, 22 Cal. 566.) If, in a desire to get all the matters of evidence in the complaint, the plaintiff has neglected to state the necessary issuable facts, the Court cannot insert them for him. A pleading is always to be construed most strongly against the party pleading.

It appears that on the twenty-third of November, 1860, the plaintiff was the owner of a large amount of valuable real estate in the City of San Francisco liable to taxation; that this property was assessed to him, in his name (with the exception of a few lots only) by the Assessor of the City and County of San Francisco; that after this assessment had been made, and before the Board of Equalization had closed their labors upon it, certain irregular proceedings were had relating to the exhibition of the assessment roll for public inspection and its equalization, which the plaintiff claims rendered the levy of taxes on his property void, and released him from all legal liability to pay the same; that the Tax Collector, being about to sell his property for the taxes thus assessed and levied, the plaintiff came forward and paid his taxes to the Collector under protest, and he now brings this action to recover the money back.

It is objected by the respondent that as the property thus threatened to be sold was real estate, the payment, though under protest, was in law voluntary, and no action can be maintained to recover it back as it could if it had been a threatened sale of personal property. The right of a party who has paid money not justly due to a Tax Collector, under protest, to recover it back by action, has been sustained by this Court in cases of both real and personal property. (Hayes v. Hogan, 5 Cal. 243; Falkner v. Hunt, 18 Id. 167.) We are not disposed to disturb those decisions upon this point, and this objection is therefore overruled.

It is also objected that this action was not commenced until more than twenty days after the time fixed by law for the payment by the Tax Collector of the taxes collected by him to the County Treasurer; that the presumption of law is that the officer has done his duty and has so paid over the money; and therefore the action should have been against the County Treasurer and not the Tax Collector. It is unnecessary to determine this point, as it is not properly before us. The objection should have been taken by demurrer or answer. If the answer had stated that the defendant had, before the suit, paid the money received from the plaintiff to the County Treasurer, then the question could have been properly raised in this Court. But it is too late to raise it here for the first time.

The principal ground of the plaintiff's complaint is that the public officers did not keep the assessment roll open for public inspection, as required by the Revenue Law of 1857, under which the assessment was made, and their conduct towards himself and his agent, in their attempts to inspect the roll, is set forth with great minuteness and particularity. It appears, however, that several days before the adjournment of the Board of Equalization, and after he had asked the board for an inspection as a legal right, he was notified that he could personally inspect the roll; but neither he or his agent attended for that purpose, or after that applied for an inspection. It appears, further, that about the time of this notice, or shortly after, the plaintiff was compelled to leave the city for several weeks on account of ill-health. If the plaintiff, in consequence of the neglect or refusal of the public officers to perform their duty, had been entirely debarred or prevented from exercising his right to inspect the assessment roll, a question would have arisen as to whether such neglect or refusal would have vitiated his assessment and released him from all liability to pay the same, in the absence of all averment or proof that the valuation of his property by the Assessor had been excessive, or higher in proportion than the valuation of the other property in the city, or that he had suffered any actual damage thereby. That question is not, however, before us; for the fact appears that the plaintiff had a fair opportunity to inspect the tax list, either in person or by his agent, as he might choose, before the Board of Equalization had closed their labors, and thus he could have pointed out any inequality which might have existed in the valuation of his property, and could have applied to the board to have the same corrected. This fact is a sufficient answer to all the objections of the plaintiff, founded upon his inability to procure an inspection of the roll previous to that time.

The fact that he was rendered unable to make such personal inspection, by ill-health, is no answer or excuse. His ill-health was his misfortune; but that misfortune could not in any way invalidate his assessment for taxes, or sustain a charge that such assessment had never been equalized. If it could produce such a result, then every person would be relieved from paying his taxes by proving that during all the time fixed by law he had been unable, on account of sickness or any other misfortune, to personally inspect the assessment roll.

It appears futher, that the Board of Equalization met at the time required by law, and acted upon and duly equalized the assessment roll, and the presumption is that the plaintiff's property was duly equalized with the rest. The plaintiff avers in his complaint, however, "that the valuation of his property above-described, as made by the Assessor, is grossly unjust, disproportioned, and unequal," but it is nowhere averred that this inequality was not corrected by the Board of Equalization, and in the absence of such averment the presumption that the board did their duty and duly equalized it, must prevail. One of the most important averments in a case of this kind is, that the plaintiff has suffered actual damage by the acts and proceedings of the public officers complained of, and the above averment is the only one in the complaint upon that point. It is clearly insufficient as an averment of damage, or as a foundation for a charge of actual injury.

It is not sufficient in a pleading to state in general terms that a valuation of property is "unjust, disproportioned, and unequal," without stating clearly and distinctly wherein the alleged valuation is "unjust, disproportioned, and unequal." For aught that appears, this alleged disproportion and inequality may have consisted in valuing the plaintiff's property lower in proportion than other property in the city; in which case he would have no just cause of complaint, as it would appear that he had suffered no injury thereby. In such a case, the plaintiff could hardly expect a Court to declare the assessment roll void, or compel the Collector to repay his taxes. He should have averred, and proved if denied, that the valuation of his property was greater than it should have been to make it proportioned with the other property assessed. In the absence of such an averment, the complaint is defective, and the Court cannot cure that defect for the party.

In the case of Cowell v. Doub (12 Cal. 273) this Court, in examining a question relating to the necessity of a tax list being passed upon by the Board of Equalization, say: "It is no objection that the same act provides for a correction of this list by the Board of Equalization. The case does not show that there was error to be corrected, so far as the appellant's property is concerned. It is not material whether the notice provided to be given in the fifth section of this act was given regularly or not. The notice was only important as affording an opportunity for correcting errors in the value of the property taxed. But, as said before, the record does not show that there was any error in the value of the property taxed, to the prejudice of the appellant." So in the present case, "the record does not show that there was any error in the value of the property taxed, to the prejudice of the appellant," and it is therefore fully within the rule laid down in the above case.

Heyman v. Lowell.

HEYMAN v. LOWELL et al.

When the mortgagor sells the mortgaged property, after the execution of the mortgage, and before the commencement of a suit to foreclose, his grantees are necessary parties to the foreclosure suit.

If the real holders of the title are not parties to the decree of foreclosure, a Court of Equity will allow them to be made such by a supplemental complaint, provided application be made within a reasonable time; but more than five years after the entry of the decree is not a reasonable time.

APPEAL from the Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Harmon & Hartley, for Appellant.

The Statute of Limitations cannot be successfully interposed as a bar, in any manner, to the granting to plaintiff the relief prayed for in his supplemental complaint. The present proceeding is not in any respect a new suit, or proceeding, but merely bringing into the old proceeding a new party. Where a former suit prevents the running of the statute, it does so upon the footing that the plaintiff has pursued his remedy within the time limited by it, and in such case, the second suit is connected with the first, which is regarded as the commencement of the action to be tried. In the case at bar, there was nothing held by plaintiff upon which the statute could operate, except the note and mortgage; of course, if no suit had been brought to enforce them within the statutory period, then their collection would be barred, and holders of the mortgaged property junior to the mortgagor, would obtain priority of title over him, by reason of the extinguishment of the debt upon which the mortgage was founded;—but in this case, no such state of facts exists. The note and mortgage have gone to judgment and decree, and that before they were outlawed, and there is nothing upon which the statute can operate. The theory upon which the application of the Statute of Limitations is made to such cases is, that the lapse of time raises a presumption of payment; but this presumption may be rebutted, and it is so rebutted, by a foreclosure. (5 Wend. 296.)

Heyman v. Lowell.

John B. Felton, for Respondent.

There is but a single question involved in this case. The respondent, Bromell, insists that the Statute of Limitations is a bar to any proceedings against her. This Court has already decided principles which guided the Court below, and certainly control completely the present case. Boggs v. Hargrave and Goodenow v. Ewer, following the great current of authorities, have held that the foreclosure of a mortgage is ineffectual and void to transfer the title, when the real holder of the title is not before the Court. In Lord v. Morris, it has held that a mortgage, being a mere lien upon land incident to a debt, is barred by the statute so soon as the debt which supports it is barred, and that the vendee of land incumbered by a mortgage may avail himself of the bar of the statute to defeat the mortgage, if his right to do so has attached only for a moment, even though the mortgagor attempt to renew the lien. The Court has also decided, in Mason v. Cronise, that a judgment, like any other debt or cause of action, is barred by the statute.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORR, C. J. and NOETON, J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose two mortgages. It was commenced on the fifteenth day of September, 1856, against the defendants, Lowell and wife, and a decree of foreclosure entered on the same day, under which the mortgaged premises were sold and purchased by the plaintiff. On the twenty-second day of March, 1862, he applied to the Court, upon affidavit, for leave to file a supplementary complaint, making several new parties of persons who had purchased a portion of the mortgaged premises of the mortgagors after the date of the mortgages, and prior to the commencement of the action. The Court granted leave to file the supplemental complaint, and it was filed accordingly, and the new parties subsequently moved to strike it from the files, which was denied, and one of them then filed a demurrer, on various grounds, one of which is the Statute of Limitations. The Court sustained the demurrer, and rendered a final judgment dismissing the supplemental complaint, from which the plaintiff appeals.

any cause the last is ineffectual, he is entitled to have the original revived for his benefit, and it is the bounden duty of a Court of Equity to aid and enforce his claim. (5 Cal. 456; 10 Id. 385; 9 Id. 107; 13 Id. 530; 11 Id. 190; White v. Sheppard, 16 Texas, 172.) The Homestead Laws of 1851 and of 1860, so far as they restrain voluntary alienation are unconstitutional and void. (Gee v. Moore, 14 Cal. 472; Bowman v. Horton, 16 Id. 213.)

We contend that the abandonment not having been recorded before the mortgage was delivered, does not render the mortgage invalid. The signing, acknowledging, and delivery were good without recording, as between the parties. The only object of recording is to notify third parties. This is the universal construction of the recording law. Record has been universally understood to be a mere mode of giving constructive notice, not to the immediate parties having actual notice, but to the world. (H. S. v. Freeman, 3 How. 565, and cases cited; Juan v. Ingoldsby, 12 Cal. 564.) A right of homestead is a mere personal privilege, which may be waived by the party interested. (Guiod v. Guiod, 14 Cal. 506; Gee v. Moore, Id. 472; Bowman v. Norton, 16 Id. 213.)

John Satterlee, for Respondent.

The foreclosure of one certain mortgage is sought in this suit. No other is set up by the pleadings, and no other mortgage can be enforced in this suit. Reference to any other is therefore not justifiable in this argument. This mortgage was made upon a homestead, occupied by the mortgagor and his wife until she died, April 11th, 1856, and afterwards up to the trial by him and his and her children. Further dedicated as a homestead by a declaration duly made by him, and recorded May 26th, 1860, as required by the act passed April 28th, 1860. Afterwards, this mortgage was made, and it was invalid for any purpose whatever—so says the statute.

The only case cited by appellant's counsel which would seem to have any bearing upon this, is that of Cohen v. Davis (20 Cal. 187). But in that case the declaration of homestead had not been made and recorded at the time of the giving of the mortgage, and particular stress is laid upon this fact by the learned Judge who delivered the opinion. The decision, indeed, turned upon that fact.

Himmelman v. Schmidt.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPB, C. J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The defense is that the mortgaged premises were and are the homestead of the mortgagor. To this it is replied, that the homestead claim was duly abandoned, according to the provisions of the statute, before the mortgage was executed. The Court found for the defendant upon the homestead question, and rendered judgment accordingly for the debt alone, without any order for the sale of the mortgaged premises, from which the plaintiff appeals.

From the findings of the Court, it appears that the defendant for several years, while his wife was living, occupied the premises as a homestead; that she died in April, 1856, and he has ever since continued to reside thereon with his four children; that on the twentieth day of October, 1856, he executed a mortgage on the premises for $1,000; and April 25th, 1859, this mortgage was released and a new one given for $1,500, which included the old debt and the sum of $500 then advanced; and on the twenty-fourth day of November, 1860, this second mortgage was released, and the one now sued on given for $2,350, which included the debt secured by the second mortgage, and a still further advance of $850; that the defendant duly made, acknowledged, and recorded his homestead declaration on the twenty-fifth day of May, 1860; that he made his declaration of abandonment of the homestead, which bears date November 26th, 1860, but was not acknowledged and recorded until December 1st, 1860, at ten o'clock, A. M.; the mortgage bears date November 24th, but was not acknowledged and recorded until two minutes past ten o'clock, A. M. of December 1st, 1860. Under these facts, the Court below found as conclusion of law that the mortgage was not a valid incumbrance on the premises.

The Act of 1860, which was in force at the time this mortgage was executed, provides, that "No mortgage or alienation of any kind made for the purpose of securing a loan or indebtedness upon the homestead property shall be valid for any purpose whatsoever;" and it is contended that the present mortgage comes within the terms of this provision, and is therefore utterly null and void, and cannot be used for any purpose whatsoever. Such a clause, so restrictive upon the right of a citizen to make a contract, must be strictly construed, and can be applied only to those cases which come clearly within its letter and spirit. Only a part of the present mortgage was given to secure a "loan"—that is, the $850 advanced when it was made. The balance of the mortgage, $1,500, was given for the release of a prior valid mortgage upon the property, and as a substitute therefor, and does not therefore come within the letter or spirit of the clause. A Court of Equity, under such circumstances, even if it came within the provisions of the act, would treat it, to the extent of the old mortgage included in it, as a substitute for the former mortgage, and to that extent as a valid incumbrance upon the property. (Dillon v. Byrne, 5 Cal. 455.)

The defendant, after the death of his wife, had the right and the power to alienate or incumber the homestead by his single deed. (Revalk v. Kraemer, 8 Cal. 73; Benson v. Aitken, 17 Id. 163.) It follows, that but for this provision in the Act of 1860, above referred to, the mortgage of the homestead by the defendant would be valid, and constitute an effective incumbrance upon the property.

It is further insisted, that as the declaration of abandonment bears date two days after the date of the mortgage, it cannot validate the mortgage — or, in other words, an abandonment of the homestead after the date of the mortgage cannot make the mortgage a valid incumbrance upon the property. It is evident, that as the abandonment of the homestead was filed for record just previous to the filing of the mortgage, it was the intention of the parties that the former should take effect prior to the latter. The mortgage could only take effect from the time of its delivery, and there is no evidence that it was delivered prior to the execution and recording of the declaration of abandonment.

But whether the abandonment took effect prior to the mortgage or not, it is clear that when the declaration of abandonment did become valid and effectual, and the property thereby ceased to be a homestead, the mortgage immediately became a valid incumbrance upon the premises, and the plaintiff had a right to have the same sold for the payment of his whole debt.

Hathaway v. Brady.

In Gee v. Moore (14 Cal. 472), the husband and wife had alienated a part of the homestead, but the deed was not acknowledged by the wife. The wife died pending a suit for the possession, and the Court held, that upon the death of the wife, without issue living, the premises ceased to be a homestead, and the purchaser in the prior deed became entitled to the possession; and that upon her death, the right to the enjoyment and use of the premises as a homestead was gone.

In the case of Bowman v. Norton (16 Cal. 213), the husband had executed two mortgages on the homestead, without the signature of his wife, and they afterwards conveyed the premises by a valid deed duly executed and acknowledged by both, and the premises thereby ceased to be the homestead. The purchaser filed his complaint to quiet his title, as to the asserted claims of the mortgages; and the Court held that when the premises ceased to be the homestead of the mortgagor, the mortgages immediately became valid incumbrances upon the property, and they ordered the complaint to be dismissed. It was held that the mortgages were not absolutely void, but were invalid only to the extent required for the protection of the husband and wife in the enjoyment of their homestead rights, and that the conveyance was a relinquishment of this homestead right.

Under these decisions it is clear that the mortgage was a valid incumbrance upon the premises, and the Court therefore erred in not rendering a decree for the sale of the property. The judgment is therefore reversed, and the Court below is directed to enter the usual judgment for the amount of the debt, and the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the property mortgaged for the payment of the same.

HATHAWAY v. BRADY.

A Court of Equity may supply an omission in a promissory note, fixing the rate of interest, so as to make it correspond with the intention of the parties. Parol evidence may be introduced for the purpose of showing what were the words omitted, and that they were omitted by mistake, but such evidence should clearly and fully establish the fact.

The statute which requires that a contract, for a greater rate of interest than ten per cent. per annum, shall be in writing, does not prevent a Court of Equity from correcting mistakes as to the rate of interest, in contracts for the payment of money, although by such correction the rate of interest be made to exceed ten per cent. per annum.

APPEAL from the Third Judicial District, Alameda County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Stow, for Appellant.

The cause of action first set out in plaintiff's complaint, was upon a note of five hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of two per cent. until paid. It does not say two per cent. per month, nor per day, nor per annum. The Court allowed verbal evidence to be given that the note should read "two per cent. per month." This was a clear violation of the statute (Wood's Dig. 551), and was overrating. (Adler v. Friedman, 16 Cal. 140.) It will not do to say that a Court of Equity could reform this agreement, by making it correspond to the original intent of the parties, and make a written agreement to pay interest different from the written agreement which defendant actually executed. Besides, the agreement was not made with plaintiff. He became the owner of this note, according to his own showing, as it was written. The averment of the complaint is that this note was indorsed to him, i. e., as it reads, not as it might have been intended to read.

W. W. Crane, for Respondent.

It is apparent from the reading of this note that an omission was made. It became due by its terms the moment it was delivered, and if literally construed, is an obligation to pay five hundred dollars with two per cent. added, that is, five hundred and ten dollars immediately. The use of the words "until paid" indicates that the interest was to be at a certain rate for certain stated periods until paid. The Court acted properly in permitting us to explain the instrument and fill up an apparent omission. It was not an attempt on our part to vary or contradict the terms of the contract. (Palmer v. Vance, 13 Cal. 558; Thompson v. Brothers, 5 Mill. Lou. 275.) In this last case the Court says: "If a house be let or leased on a given rent, without saying whether it be a monthly or yearly one, parol evidence is certainly admissible to establish that the rate manifests that the parties contemplate a yearly one." (See also Seely v. Engell, 8 Kernan, N. Y. 542; Boyd v. Brotherton, 10 Wend. 98; Smith v. Wilson, 3 B. & Adolph. 728; Boorman v. Jenkins, 12 Wend. 566; 2 Parsons on Contracts, 76.)

Hathaway v. Brady.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon three promissory notes, one for $500, one for $6,197.43, and the other for $2,000. The case was tried by a jury, who rendered a verdict for $11,151.30. The defendant moved for a new trial, which the Court ordered to be granted, unless the plaintiff would remit the sum of $1,127.78 from the amount of the verdict. The plaintiff remitted the amount, and thereupon the Court refused a new trial, and the defendant appeals.

The first note sued on is as follows:

SAN LORENZO, Oct. 4th, 1857.

"For value received, I promise to pay to the order of George Hyde, five hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of two per cent. until paid.

LEWIS BRADY."

The complaint avers that the agreement of the defendant was to pay interest at the rate of two per cent. per month, but that by mistake the words per month were omitted in the note; and he asked that the mistake be corrected by inserting the omitted words in the note, and for judgment thereon accordingly. The answer of the defendant denies that there was any agreement to pay two per cent. per month, or that the words "per month" were omitted by mistake. On the trial the Court permitted the plaintiff to prove the facts thus put in issue by parol evidence, and this the defendant now assigns as error.

It is evident from the face of the promissory note that there is an omission of some kind in that part which relates to the rate of interest. If it be true that the words "per month" were intended to be inserted by the parties, and that they were omitted by mistake, the plaintiff has a right to have such mistake corrected. The power of a Court of Equity to correct mistakes in written contracts is clear and undoubted. And in such case the mistake may be proved by parol evidence, though such proof should fully and clearly establish the facts. (Wagonblast v. Washburn, 12 Cal. 212; Palmer v. Vance, 13 Id. 556; Eldridge v. See Yup Co., 17 Id. 55; Lestrade v. Barth, 19 Id. 661; Pierson v. McCahill, 21 Id. 122.) But it is urged that as the statute regulating the rate of interest requires that a contract for a greater rate of interest than ten per cent. per annum shall be in writing, therefore the agreement to pay a greater rate cannot be proved by parol. The power of a Court of Equity to correct mistakes in contracts which the statute requires to be in writing — such as conveyances of real estate — and to permit such mistake to be proved by parol evidence, is as well established as in cases where the contract is not required to be in writing. In fact, the greater class of cases in which this relief has been granted has been that of conveyances of real estate, which the law requires to be in writing. (1 Story's Eq. Secs. 158, 159.) It follows that there was no error in the action of the Court upon this point.

The only other error alleged is that the judgment is for a greater sum than the plaintiff was entitled to under the evidence. It seems that there were various matters on account between the plaintiff and the defendant, as also between the plaintiff and one Babcock, who rented defendant's land for a share of the crops. It is not contended here that the Court erred in any of its instructions to the jury or in the admission of evidence; but this Court is asked to investigate all these accounts, as a jury would be required to do, or a Court engaged in trying the case at nisi prius. These matters seem to have been fully and fairly investigated by the jury; but the Court below, in reviewing the action of the jury on the motion for a new trial, with all the evidence before it, came to the conclusion that the amount of the verdict was too great, and required the plaintiff to remit a large portion of it, which he did. Under these circumstances, where both Court and jury have acted upon the question, this Court will not reinvestigate it, upon the ground that the judgment is contrary to the evidence, where the evidence is conflicting, and no rule of law has been violated. The plaintiff claims that he was entitled to the full amount found by the verdict of the jury; but as he consented to take the lesser amount, by remitting under the order of the Court, and has not appealed from the judgment, we cannot act upon any such question.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE PEOPLE ex rel. BARRY v. GRAY.

A WARRANT drawn by the Auditor of a County upon the Treasurer, although payable to "A or bearer," does not possess the quality of negotiable paper so as to make it transferable by delivery.

The County Treasurer cannot be compelled to pay to any other person than the one in whose favor it is drawn, without at least an assignment of the warrant by the payee.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellant.

It has been settled by repeated decisions of this Court that instruments of the nature of the one set forth in the complaint are not negotiable instruments; it follows that they, by themselves, constituted no cause of action, and are not in fact the evidence of debt sufficient to support the action, and it follows of course that the character of negotiable paper being denied, the holder can claim none of its privileges in dealing with it. (People v. El Dorado Co., 11 Cal. 170; Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Id. 257; Martin v. Same, Id. 287; Dana & Bro. v. Same, 19 Id. 486; Keller v. Hicks, 22 Id. 457.)

With this rule so well established, the plaintiff's title must fail. He has simply averred and proved a purchase of the warrant — not a purchase of the debt — not an assignment of the account which the warrant was simply the machinery to pay, which might entitle him to protection, but a purchase from a person not the owner, who cannot and does not claim to have succeeded to the actual rights of the original payee — the right to draw the money from the treasury in satisfaction of his claim.

John Curry, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, who is the County Treasurer of Solano County, to pay a certain warrant drawn on the treasury of that county. The case was tried by the Court, who found for the plaintiff, and a judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the defendant appeals.

It appears that the warrant in question was issued to one Thompson for services as District Attorney; that he intrusted it to one Osborne to sell for him; that Osborne lost it; that Thompson afterwards applied to the Board of Supervisors for a duplicate warrant, which was issued, and which was in due time paid by the County Treasurer. One Weineman appears to have sold the original warrant to the relator; but Thompson never sold or assigned it to any person. The following is a copy of the warrant:

"No. 2,698. BENICIA, Solano County, October 27, 1858.

"The Treasurer of Solano County: Pay to James H. Thompson, or bearer, for salary as District Attorney, for the quarter ending October 1, 1858, out of the General County Fund, the amount of three hundred and seventy-five dollars ($375).

"WILLIAM J. HOOTEN,

"Auditor Solano County."

It has been repeatedly held by this Court that warrants of this kind do not possess the qualities of negotiable paper, like bills of exchange, promissory notes, and the like. (People v. El Dorado Co., 11 Cal. 170; Argenti v. San Francisco, 16 Id. 275; Martin v. San Francisco, Id. 285; Dana v. San Francisco, 19 Id. 486; Keller v. Hicks, 22 Id. 457.) The fact that the warrant is payable to bearer will not therefore make it transferable by delivery like a promissory note thus payable. In Martin v. San Francisco

it was held that even where there was a regular assignment of such a warrant by the person to whom it was issued, the assignee could not maintain an action on it without an assignment of the original indebtedness. But in Dana v. San Francisco it was intimated that an assignment of the warrant might be deemed in equity an assignment of the debt on which the warrant issued, and an authority to the assignee to receive the money. In the case of Martin the warrant was payable to the payees, or bearer, and in the case of Dana it was made payable to the order of the payee. It is clear that the County Treasurer cannot be compelled to pay a county warrant to any other person than the one in whose favor it is drawn, without at least an assignment of the warrant by the payee. The affidavit on which the application for the writ was made does not allege any such assignment, or any transfer or assignment either of the warrant or the debt for which it issued, by Thompson; and it therefore failed to show facts sufficient to authorize the writ to be issued. Nor was this defect cured by any evidence. The findings merely state "that in the month of August, 1859, or about that time, the said Barry purchased and became the owner and holder of said warrant." This is entirely insufficient to sustain the judgment, even if the affidavit was sufficient.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

THE PEOPLE v. RAINS et al.— No. 1.

When a default has been entered for a failure to answer or demur, an affidavit by the attorney that he had prepared a demurrer, but failed to file it in time, in consequence of a mistake on his part as to the day on which the time for filing would expire, is insufficient to open the default.

On application to set aside a default, it is necessary for the defendant to show that he has a good defense on the merits. Where the affidavit shows that the defense rests on matters appearing on the face of the complaint, it shows that the defense is of a technical character, and is therefore insufficient.

When a complaint contains the substantial averments of a cause of action, though defective in form and certainty, the defect is cured by a verdict or default.

Since the passage of the Act of 1861 an Assessor is only required to assess improvements on real estate and personal property in general terms and under a gross valuation, and a specific description of such property is unnecessary.

People v. Reina.

When a demurrer is overruled, with leave to answer, it is not necessary that the order fix the time within which the answer must be filed. The Court has power to fix such time for answering as it may deem proper; but where no time is fixed, the defendant should answer within the same time as in case of service of a copy of the original complaint.

APPEAL from the First Judicial District, San Bernardino County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Sharp & Lloyd, for Appellants.

The time required by law to answer the original complaint is ten days if served within the county, and twenty days if served out of the county; but no time is "required by law" within which a plea to an amended complaint shall be filed. But the defendant shall, according to Sec. 43, Practice Act, plead thereto "in such time as may be ordered by the Court." There being, therefore, no time "allowed by law," and none fixed by the Court, the defendants could never be brought into default, and therefore the default was improperly entered and should have been set aside. It should have been set aside on the ground of excusable neglect — the defendant having sworn to merits.

If the action is prosecuted under the Revenue Act of 1861 (Sess. Laws, 432, etc.), then the complaint is insufficient, for by the form prescribed by Sec. 40 it is made incumbent on the District Attorney to describe the improvements with the same particularity as would be required in actions for the recovery of personal property. (See Form, 433.)

The reason for requiring a particular description is because only certain defenses are allowed, as appears by Sec. 42, one of which is "that the property was exempt;" another, a denial of title.

How can the defendant plead either of these defenses unless the improvements and property are described so that he can know precisely what is, and what is not assessed? How can he deny title to the personal property when he is not told of what it consisted?

Horace C. Rolfe, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

People v. Raina.

This is an action to recover delinquent taxes. The defendants appeared and demurred to the original complaint; their demurrer was sustained, and leave granted to the plaintiff to amend the complaint. An amended complaint was duly filed and served; but the defendants failing to plead thereto within ten days, a default was duly entered, with a final judgment for the amount claimed in the complaint. The defendants came in and moved the Court to set aside the default and judgment, which motion was denied, and they then appealed therefrom to this Court.

It appears that the attorneys of the defendants had prepared a demurrer to file to the amended complaint, but they failed to file it in time, in consequence of a mistake on their part as to the day on which the time for filing would expire—they, by a miscalculation of time, supposing that the time would not expire until the day after it did. In the affidavit on which the motion was founded, and which was sworn to by one of the attorneys of the defendants, he says that after a careful examination the attorneys for the defendants are of the opinion that they have a good legal defense to the complaint, as the same appears upon the face thereof. The facts set forth in excuse of the failure to plead in time are insufficient. (Elliot v. Shaw, 16 Cal. 377.) It was also necessary for the defendants to show that they had a good defense to the action, on the merits, to entitle them to an order setting aside the judgment and default. (Gregory v. Ford, 14 Cal. 141; Gibbons v. Scott, 15 Id. 284; Logan v. Hillegass, 16 Id. 200; Woodward v. Backus, 20 Id. 137.) The statement that their defense depends upon matters appearing upon the face of the amended complaint shows that their defense is of a technical character, not affecting the merits of the action, and it was therefore insufficient, and there was no error in refusing the motion.

The next error assigned is, that the amended complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in this, that there is no detailed specific description of the improvements on real estate and personal property assessed to the defendants. The real estate is described fully, and then follow these words: "and also the improvements thereon;" and in another portion of the complaint it is averred that there was duly assessed to the defendant, "the above-described real estate, improvements on real estate, and certain personal property." Even if there was a lack of certainty and particularity in the description of the improvements and personal property, there is still a substantial averment of the facts, though defective in form and certainty, and in such case the defect is cured by a verdict or default. (Garner v. Marshall, 9 Cal. 268; Hentsch v. Porter, 10 Id. 559.) The forty-fifth section of the Practice Act provides that objections on the ground of uncertainty and the like must be taken by demurrer or answer, or they will be deemed waived.

This action is brought under the General Revenue Act of May 17th, 1861 (Stat. 1861, 419), and we had occasion to give a construction to this act on the question of the sufficiency of a description of personal property like the present in the case of The People v. Eastman, decided at the present term, in which it was held to be sufficient. The same reasons by which such a description of personal property was upheld will apply equally to "improvements on real estate." The Assessor is only required to assess such improvements in general terms under a gross valuation, and the statute does not seem to contemplate a more specific description in the complaint.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

On petition for rehearing, CROCKER, J. delivered the following opinion—NORTON, J. concurring:

The appellant insists, in his petition for a rehearing, that the plaintiff had no right to enter a default, because the Court did not fix any time within which to answer the amended complaint, in accordance with the provisions of Sec. 43 of the Practice Act. It is the universal practice in this State to answer amended complaints within the same time after service of a copy as in case of a service of a summons with a copy of the original complaint, and it is seldom that the Court fixes any specific time by an order for answering in such cases. The defendants in this case evidently were governed by this practice, and so construed the law, as they intended to file their answer within ten days after the service of the amended complaint, but failed to do so by a mistake as to the date of the expiration of the ten days. We think that a reasonable construction of the Practice Act sustains this practical interpretation of the law upon this subject. (See Sec. 67.) Under Sec. 43, the Court would have the power to fix such time as it might deem proper, but it does not follow that, because the Court failed to make such an order, the defendant would have an unlimited time to answer. In such case the defendant should answer within the same time as in cases of a service of a copy of the original complaint with the summons.

The rehearing is denied.

THE PEOPLE v. RAINS et al.— No. 2.

IN an action to recover delinquent taxes in the County of San Bernardino, assessed for the year 1860, the complaint should state the assessed value of the real estate, the improvements, and the personal property, each separately. When the statute provides that the District Attorney, before commencing suit, shall publish notice to delinquents, it is not necessary to aver in the complaint that this notice was published, but the failure to publish this notice must be taken advantage of by plea in abatement, or it is waived. It is not error to make the real estate a party, as in proceedings to rem. in an action to collect taxes. The Assessor may assess real estate to any person whom he finds in the possession, charge, or control of it, and such person is liable for the taxes, as well as the property assessed.

APPEAL from the First Judicial District, San Bernardino County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

R. H. Lloyd, for Appellants.

This suit was brought under the Act of March 27th, 1861 (Laws 1861, 75, 76). It is a special act, providing for the collection of delinquent taxes for 1860, in San Bernardino County. Under this act the complaint is insufficient.

The second section prescribes that the District Attorney "shall designate in his complaint the amount of taxes due and unpaid for State, County and other purposes, separately, and shall state the kind and value of property assessed, both real and personal." The complaint in this case does not state the kind of personal property—whether it was money, hogs, sheep, cattle, or what it was. All the information given is, that it was "certain personal property." Nor does the complaint state the value of it, nor the value of the real estate.

The reason why the statute requires the kind and value to be stated appears in the same section, and is, because the defendant is only allowed to plead to the complaint: first, that the taxes have been paid; and, second, that he had not the property mentioned in the complaint or the valuation thereof, at the time of the assessment.

The answer must be under oath. How are the defendants in this case to answer under oath? They are not informed whether the real estate was rated at one dollar or fifty thousand dollars. They are not told what personal property they are charged with having, whether it is money, cattle, or hogs, or what value was placed on the different kinds of property. The defendants are deprived of the opportunity to make the statutory defense; and the statute declares they shall make no other.

By Sec. 7 of the act, it is provided that "the District Attorney of said county shall, immediately upon the receipt of a certified copy of this act, cause the same to be published weekly for the space of four weeks in some newspaper published in said county; and he shall not commence suit against delinquents until after said term of publication has expired." This is a condition precedent to his right of action. The notice must be given before a right of action accrued under the statute. The complaint must show that the party is entitled to his action; for that purpose, in this case it must appear that the notice was given. It has not been alleged, nor does it so appear.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover delinquent taxes levied for the fiscal year 1860, on certain real estate, improvements thereon, and personal property, in the County of San Bernardino. The Court rendered judgment against the defendants and the real estate assessed, from which they appeal.

People v. Raina.

The defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that several causes of action had been improperly united; that it was ambiguous and uncertain, and that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. The Court overruled the demurrer, and this is assigned for error. The complaint in this case follows the form prescribed by the General Revenue Act of 1861 (Stat. of 1861, 433); but this action does not properly come within the provisions of that act, which apply only to the taxes of the year 1861 and the succeeding years, and these taxes were levied in the year 1860. But on the twenty-seventh day of March, 1861 (Stat. 1861, 75), a law was passed relating to the delinquent taxes of 1860 in the County of San Bernardino, and that act therefore properly governs this action. The second section of the latter act provides that the complaint "shall state the kind and value of the property assessed, both real and personal." The complaint in this case describes the real estate fully and particularly, and then states, "also the improvements thereon." A further averment is that the defendants were "the owners of, and there was duly assessed to them the above described real estate, improvements upon the same, and certain personal property," and then sets forth the amounts of the several kinds of taxes levied upon the property. It contains no further description of the improvements or personal property, nor does it state the value of any of the property assessed. It is evident that the complaint is defective in not stating the assessed value of the property—that is, the assessed value of the real estate, the improvements thereon, and of the personal property, each separately. It is sufficient in stating the "kind" of property to state which of these three kinds of property the assessed property consists of. The description of the property in this complaint we deem sufficient, for the reasons stated in the case of The People v. Eastman, decided at the present term. The act in question does not require a more particular or specific description than the law in question in that case.

The seventh section of the act under which this action was brought provides, that the District Attorney shall, immediately upon the receipt of a certified copy of the act, cause the same to be published weekly for four weeks in some newspaper published in the county, and that he should not commence suits against delinquents until after said term of publication had expired. It is contended that the complaint is defective, because it does not aver that this publication had been made, and that the term of publication had expired. This matter of publication does not affect or relate to the right or cause of action, but merely to the time of commencing the action. If the publication was not in fact made, or the term had not expired, these facts should have been plead in abatement of the suit. It was not necessary to aver them in the complaint, but they could be plead as a defense, to abate the suit, if the defendants saw proper to do so. That objection to the complaint, therefore, is not tenable.

It is objected that the real estate is made a party, as in a proceeding in rem. All proceedings for the assessment of property and the collection of taxes thereon are in the nature of proceedings in rem, as the property is considered primarily liable for the taxes assessed thereon, and there is therefore no impropriety in framing the proceedings in the form of an action in which the property is sought to be sold for the payment of the taxes. This objection, therefore, is not valid. The demurrer should have been sustained, however, as the complaint fails to state the value of the several kinds of property assessed.

After the demurrer had been overruled, the defendants answered, alleging that the property assessed was the separate property of their wives, as they acquired the same by descent from their deceased father; and denying that they had any right, title, or interest in the real estate, improvements, or personal property, except as managers of the personal property; and the Court found such to be the facts, but also found that the defendants lived upon and had been in the possession, charge, and control of the property ever since 1858. The General Revenue Law of 1860, under which this assessment was made, authorizes property to be assessed to the persons "owning, claiming, or having the possession, charge, or control of any real or personal property," and as the property assessed in this case was in the possession, charge, and control of the defendants, the assessment was properly made to them, and under that act they were liable to pay the taxes. County Assessors are not required to investigate the titles to all the property in the county, and to determine who are the real owners thereof. Such questions often require the skill, research, and learning of the ablest lawyers and jurists, which Assessors are not expected to have. It is sufficient for the purpose of assessment and taxation that he finds some person in possession, or having the charge and control of the property, to authorize him to assess it in the name of such person, and to make the latter liable for such taxes, leaving him to his remedy against the real owner of the property, if any he has. The property itself is, however, also liable for the taxes.

On the seventeenth day of May, 1861, the Legislature passed an act supplementary to the Act of March 27th (Stat. 1861, 416). It provides that in certain cases, including that of an assessment "to the husband or agent of the real owner, the person liable to pay the taxes thereon may be sued by a fictitious name, or the real name of the party liable to pay the same; and the fact that the property was not assessed in the name of the party liable to pay the same, shall be no defense to an action brought for the recovery of the amount of the taxes due thereon, if the summons is served upon the party liable to pay the same." This provision does not properly apply to the case before us, because the property was "assessed in the name of the party liable to pay the same," as the defendants were in the possession, charge, and control of the property, and were thus liable to pay the taxes, as has been already shown. The summons has therefore in this case been "served upon the party liable to pay the taxes," within the terms of the statute. There may be cases where "the husband or agent" was not in "the possession, charge, or control" of the property, and therefore perhaps not liable to pay the taxes, in which case this provision may be applicable. The objection, therefore, that no summons was served on the wives of the defendants, is not valid.

The Court having erred in overruling the demurrer, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

 Zoller v. McDonald.

ZOLLER et al. v. McDONALD.

THE order of a County Court dismissing an appeal from a Justice's Court in an action of forcible entry and detainer is a final judgment, from which an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court.

An undertaking on appeal to the Supreme Court, conditioned "that appellant will pay all costs and damages which may be awarded against him on the appeal, and also all the rents and profits of the premises in controversy during the pendency of the appeal, not exceeding six hundred dollars," is sufficient to sustain an appeal.

An undertaking on appeal filed under the three hundred and forty-eighth section of the Practice Act is not invalidated because the sum mentioned exceeds three hundred dollars.

A notice of appeal from a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court to the County Court, in an action of forcible entry and detainer, is not invalidated because it contains a clause that the "appeal is taken on questions of law alone."

APPEAL from the County Court of the County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Alfred Rix, for Appellant.

W. H. Tompkins, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action of unlawful detainer, tried in a Justice's Court, where the plaintiffs recovered judgment, from which the defendant appealed to the County Court, where, on motion of the plaintiffs, the appeal was dismissed, and the defendant appeals to this Court.

The plaintiffs move to dismiss the appeal to this Court on the ground that we have no jurisdiction; that the undertaking is insufficient, and that it is an appeal from an order and not a judgment. The order of the County Court dismissing the appeal is the final decision and determination of that Court upon the case before it, which puts an end to the suit; and is, therefore, to all intents and purposes, a judgment, subject to the revision of this Court. It matters not in what form the determination of the suit is put, so that it embodies the final action of the Court, it is sufficient. (Bell v. Davis, 1 Cal. 135.) The undertaking on appeal is conditioned that the appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal, as also all the rents and profits of the premises in controversy during the pendency of the appeal, not exceeding six hundred dollars. It is urged that the undertaking was filed for the sole purpose of staying proceedings, as required by Sec. 352 of the Practice Act, and is not the one required by Sec. 348. Whether it is sufficient as an undertaking to stay execution, under Sec. 352, is a question not necessary for us to determine; for it is sufficient to sustain the appeal, if it contains the substantial requirements of Sec. 348, which we think it clearly does. That the amount exceeds three hundred dollars is no valid objection to it, so long as it contains the conditions required by Sec. 348. The undertaking required by these sections may be embodied in one instrument by Sec. 354. The action is to recover the possession of lands or tenements, and we think comes within the terms used in the sixth section of the act regulating the jurisdiction of this Court. (Wood's Dig. 148.) The motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore overruled.

The notice of appeal from the Justice's Court to the county Court was full and sufficient; but it contained this clause at the end: "This appeal is taken on questions of law alone." The plaintiffs moved in the County Court to dismiss the appeal because the same was taken on questions of law alone, instead of law and fact; and the Court sustained the motion. The seventeenth section of the act respecting forcible entries and unlawful detainers, as amended in 1832, provides that the Appellate Court shall try the case anew on the evidence introduced before it; and this section controls appeals in this particular form of action. Such an appeal, therefore, cannot be tried on a statement of the case, or evidence or exceptions taken before a Justice of the Peace. This section regulates the mode of trial in the County Court. The fact that the defendant inserted in his notice that the appeal was taken on questions of law alone cannot affect or vary the mode of trial presented by the statute, nor did it vitiate the notice. His notice was good and sufficient without that clause, and it may well be treated as surplusage. Sec. 19 of the act especially provides that the Appellate Court shall not dismiss the proceedings for want of form, and the objection in this case goes to the form of the notice only. Parties should not be held to any great strictness in proceedings before Justices of the Peace. The notice was sufficient to advise the plaintiffs that the defendant appealed from the judgment of the Justice; and then the statute, and not the notice, regulated the mode in which that appeal should be tried.

The judgment of the County Court dismissing the appeal is reversed, and the cause remanded.

THE PEOPLE v. PARK.

UNDER the Revenue Law of 1860, choses in action and property of an intangible character, such as debts and the like, are properly assessable in the county where the owner resides at the time of the assessment.

APPEAL from the Thirteenth Judicial District, Mariposa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

[No briefs on file.]

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover a sum of money claimed to be due for taxes on personal property assessed to the defendant in Mariposa County. The assessment was originally made in the following form:

“T. W. Park. Mortgage on J. C. Fremont, value $350,000.

But it was afterwards changed by the Board of Equalization so as to read as follows:

“T. W. Park. Money at interest secured by mortgage executed by J. C. Fremont, June 14, 1860, and recorded in the Recorder's Office of Mariposa County, in book E, on folios 409, 411, 412, and 413. valued at $350,000.”

The defendant was a resident of the City of San Francisco before and since the levy of this tax, and was assessed for personal property in that city for the same year. The Court found in favor of the defendant, and the State took this appeal.

The tax in this case was levied under the Revenue Law of 1860 (Stat. of 1860, 365.) Sec. 11 of that act provides that each District Assessor shall ascertain the names of all persons "owning, claiming, or having the possession, charge, or control of any real or personal property, not exempt from taxation, within the district," and the cash value of the same; and he is required to assess the same to such person, and to demand of every person within his district a statement under oath of all such real or personal property within his district. Sec. 14 requires the Assessor to list under the head of "personal property," all movable property, and movable chattels, etc., etc., including among others, "all money at interest, secured by mortgage or otherwise." Under this law all "personal property within the district" of the Assessor must be assessed in such district. It is evident that all personal property of a tangible character, such as is capable of manual possession and delivery, is to be assessed in the county where it may be at the time of the commencement of the assessment, to wit: the first Monday in March. But the question is, in what county must personal property, of an intangible character, such as mere choses in action, debts, promissory notes and the like, be assessed in? Are they to be considered as having a taxable locality where the debtor resides, or where the property on which the debt may be a lien is located, or where the owner resides?

The general rule of law is that personal property follows the body or person of the owner. (Story on Conflict of Laws, Secs. 378-380.) And this rule is applied to the question as to where such property is properly taxable; and it is held that it should be assessed and taxed in the town or county where the owner resides. (Holton v. Bangor, 23 Maine, 264; Little v. Greenleaf, 7 Mass. 236; Salem Iron Factory v. Danvers, 10 Id. 514; Amesbury Man. Co. v. Amesbury, 17 Id. 461; Preston v. Boston, 12 Pick. 7; Lyman v. Fiske, 17 Id. 231; Blood v. Sayre, 17 Vt. 609.) By special statute this rule was changed in Massachusetts so as not to apply to persons who hired stores and carried on business in other towns than those in which they dwelt; and in such cases such property was made taxable in the town where the business was conducted. (10 Mass. 514; Gray v. Kittell, 12 Id. 161.)

Under these authorities and rules of law, we think the proper construction of the Revenue Law of 1860 is that all personal property of a tangible character was properly taxable in the county where it was actually situated at the time of the commencement of the assessment; but choses in action, and property of an intangible character, such as debts and the like, cannot be said to be "within the district" of the Assessor, and are, therefore, properly taxable in the county where the owner resides at that time. They could not properly be assessed where the debtors reside, as they may be non-residents, or reside in several counties; nor where the property on which it may be secured is located, for that might be in several counties, and it is the debt and not the security which is properly taxable. (Falkner v. Hunt, 16 Cal. 167.)

In this case the debt and mortgage did not exist at the commencement of the assessment; and if they had, they were properly assessable and taxable in the County of San Francisco, where the defendant resided, and not in the County of Mariposa.

It follows that the judgment of the Court below is correct, and is therefore affirmed.

McGARVEY v. HALL.

At the time of the execution and delivery of a promissory note, the payer also give the payee a bill of sale of personal property by way of mortgage to secure the note, and also deliver possession of the property, the payer has a right to have the property mortgaged applied in satisfaction of the debt; and if the payee sells any of the property he has a right to have the proceeds or value applied towards the satisfaction of the debt.

If the payee sells the note, the purchaser takes it subject to the equities subsisting between the original parties.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Mendocino County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

McGarvey v. Hall.

William Holden, for Appellant.

Wm. Neely Johnson, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORP, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by McGarvey upon a promissory note and an account against the defendant, assigned to him by one Dickson. The defendant in his answer, among other things, made the following averments: That at the time of making the promissory note he executed and delivered to Dickson a bill of sale intended as a mortgage, to secure the note, conveying all his interest in a certain sheep contract with S. C. Hastings, one hundred and fifty head of hogs, and four horses, and delivered the said property to Dickson; that the said property is worth $2,000; that afterwards Dickson and the defendant entered into a written agreement, which is copied into the answer, by which it was agreed that, in case the defendant did not sell before the first of October, he had sold to Dickson his interest in a flock of sheep belonging to S. C. Hastings; also his quarter ranch, and two tons of hay thereon; Dickson agreeing to take the ranch, sheep, and hay for a fair valuation, to be determined by two or more men "that both might agree to;" Dickson to take the property as far as it would go on the debt of the defendant; that he did not sell said property on or before the first of October; that he has complied with said agreement on his part, and Dickson has failed and refused to comply on his part; and that his interest in the property described in this agreement is worth the sum of $1,500. The plaintiff moved to strike out this portion of defendant's answer, and the motion was sustained. The case was tried by the Court, findings in favor of the plaintiff were filed, and a judgment rendered accordingly, from which the defendant appeals.

It is clear that the defendant had a right to set up the execution and delivery of the bill of sale in the nature of a mortgage, and the fact of the delivery of the property therein named, as a defense. He had a right to have the property mortgaged applied in satisfaction of the debt. If the assignor, Dickson, had sold or disposed of any of the property, the defendant was entitled to have the proceeds or the value thereof applied toward the satisfaction of his debt. If the property still remained in the hands of Dickson, he had a right to have it sold under the order of the Court, and the proceeds applied in the same way. The Court therefore erred in striking out that portion of the answer.

The execution of the subsequent agreement cannot be pleaded as an accord and satisfaction at common law, because there has been no acceptance of the property as a satisfaction, as required by the rules of law upon that subject. (Chitty on Contracts, 658, 659.)

Nor can it be pleaded as a ground for equitable relief in the nature of a specific performance of the contract. As a general rule, equity will not decree a specific performance of a contract respecting personal property. There are some exceptions to this rule, relating to heir-looms, family jewels, and the like, when there is a peculiar value attached to the article, that cannot be compensated in the damages. In such cases, because of the especial value placed upon the property on account of its individual or associate qualities, equity will grant relief by decreeing a specific performance, or a delivery of the specific article. (Fry on Specific Performances, Secs. 27-31.) The present case does not come within the exceptions.

But the defendant had a clear right to set up this agreement in his answer, as a ground for damages which he had sustained by the non-performance of the contract on the part of Dickson; and he had a right to have such damages applied, by way of recoupment, upon the debt. The Court therefore erred in striking out this part of the answer.

The judgment is reversed, the order striking out is set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

foreclose it, one who has purchased or acquired a lien on the property subsequent to the mortgage, has a right to intervene in the action and plead the Statute of Limitations.

APPEAL from the Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. C. Sloss, for Appellant.

S. W. Sanderson, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. Schneider filed a petition of intervention, alleging that he had purchased the mortgaged premises at a sale under a decree of foreclosure of a subsequent mortgage, and that plaintiff's mortgage was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff demurred to the petition, so far as it set up the Statute of Limitations, on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action. The Court below sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the debt, foreclosing the mortgage and ordering a sale of the mortgaged premises; from which the intervenor appeals.

The note sued on, and to secure which the mortgage was given, fell due on the first day of November, 1857, and this action was not commenced until December 18th, 1861, more than four years after the right of action accrued. We have held in several cases, that a subsequent purchaser or incumbrancer of the mortgaged premises has the right to plead the Statute of Limitations in bar of any action for the sale of the property. (Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 490; McCarthy v. White, 21 Id. 495; Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Id. 16.) The intervenor had a clear right to intervene in this case, and plead the Statute of Limitations in bar of so much of the relief as related to a sale of the mortgaged premises for the payment of the plaintiff's debt.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

McNiel v. Borland.

McNIEL et al. v. BORLAND et al.

THE proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien under the law of 1861, is a special case, within the proper meaning of that term as used in the Constitution, of which the Legislature might properly give jurisdiction to the County Courts. The law of 1861, giving to County Courts jurisdiction to enforce mechanics' liens, is not unconstitutional.

APPEAL from the Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

Plaintiffs filed their petition, on the 18th day of January, 1862, in the County Court of El Dorado County, to foreclose a mechanic's lien for work and labor performed in the construction of a building. The County Court dismissed the proceeding for want of jurisdiction and plaintiffs appealed:

S. W. Sanderson, for Appellants.

The Constitution, Art. 6, Sec. 9, provides as follows, to wit: "The County Courts shall have such jurisdiction in cases arising in Justices' Courts and in special cases, as the Legislature may prescribe; but shall have no original civil jurisdiction except in such special cases."

"An Act concerning the Courts of Justice of this State and Judicial Officers, passed May 19th, 1853" (Chap. 5, Sec. 44), provides as follows, to wit: "The County Court shall have original civil jurisdiction — 1st, of an action to enforce the lien of mechanics and others." * * * * *

Sec. 7 of the Mechanics' Lien Law of 1861, provides as follows, to wit: "Said liens may be enforced in the County Court by any lienholder, upon his filing a petition, etc." * *

Thus it appears that both these acts confer jurisdiction in express terms; but it is contended on the other side, that both these acts, in the present particular, are unconstitutional. Whether they are so or not, depends upon the meaning of the words "special cases" in the Constitution, and whether mechanics' liens come within that meaning. The section of the Constitution in question is taken, word for word, from the Constitution of New York, Art. 6, Sec. 14, last sentence of the section. Under this section, the Court of Appeals of that State have held that the foreclosure of a mortgage was a special case, and that an act conferring jurisdiction of actions for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the County Court was constitutional. (Arnold v. Rees, 18 N. Y.; 4 Smith's Court of Appeals, 57.) Also in the case of Doubleday v. Heath (16 N. Y., 2 Smith, 80), the same Court held that an action for a partition of real estate was a special case, and jurisdiction was constitutionally conferred upon the County Court. Upon the question as to what are special cases, Rundolf v. Tholheimer et al. (12 N. Y., 2 Kern., 593) is also cited.

McNiel v. Borland.

Within the reasoning of those cases, a mechanic's lien under Sec. 7 of the Act of 1861, is undoubtedly a special case. No case could be more special. The proceeding there described is wholly unknown to the common law. It is wholly the creation of statute, and bears no resemblance to an action at law or a bill in equity. It is sui generis, and unlike any proceeding belonging to Courts of general jurisdiction, whether legal or equitable. The language used by Ch. J. Denio, in Doubleday v. Heath (p. 83), is in every respect applicable to the present case. "The proceeding to obtain partition" (to enforce a mechanic's lien) "is, in fact, very special in its character. It is commenced by petition, without a suit of any kind. The allegations of the parties are peculiar, and unlike those in the ordinary common law actions. Everything is summary, with a view to save expenses and prevent delay. It may be characterized, I think, as a special statutory proceeding, instituted to take the place of the tedious action by original writ out of chancery, to which I have referred. It may, therefore, in my opinion, be considered a special case, according to the use of that phraseology in the Constitution."

But it is contended that a different construction has been put upon the phrase in question, by the Supreme Court of this State, and the doctrine of stare decisis is appealed to by counsel upon the other side. In support of this position, the cases of Parsons v. The Tuolumne Co. Water Company (5 Cal. 43), and Brock v. Bruce et al. (5 Id. 279), are relied upon. We submit that neither of these cases, either expressly or by implication, asserts a doctrine fatal to the present case. The first case decides that an action to abate a nuisance is not a special case, and the Court there say: "We think that the term 'special cases' was not meant to include any class of cases for which the Courts of general jurisdiction had always supplied a remedy."

But it is further contended that the case of Brock v. Bruce et al. (5 Cal. 279), goes further and especially declares that a mechanic's lien is not a special case. That case decides that a mechanic's lien under the statute which existed at that time, was not a special case; but it does not decide that it is not competent for the Legislature to create a lien and prescribe proceedings under it which might make it a special case. The lien which the Court decides in that case was not a special case — was created and governed by the Act of 1850.

But, non sequitur, that the Mechanics' Lien of 1861 is not a special case. On the contrary, the same reasoning that shows that of 1850 not to have been one, proves that of 1861 to be one. Under the Act of 1861, we have no action or suit by complaint and summons in the ordinary manner; we obtain no personal judgment, but if such is desired, we are sent to another Court, and remitted to the ordinary remedy by suit. The remedy is summary, unusual, extraordinary, peculiar, and special; and so new and strange that it never has been, before this time at least, attached to "the general frame-work of Courts of Common Law and Equity."

The case made by the seventh section of the Act of 1861 is as much a peculiar and special case as that of the insolvent, or a contested election, or the granting or dissolving of injunctions, or the issuing of commissions to take testimony; yet jurisdiction in all these cases has been constitutionally conferred upon the County Court or the Judge thereof.

Humphrey Griffith, for Respondent.

It would scarcely be deemed either necessary or proper to argue this question before this Court after the decision of Brock v. Bruce et al. (5 Cal. 279), where this question is decided in terms, were it not for the effort of appellant to procure a reversal of that decision. In the decision of that case, the Court go to the foundation of the right as conferred by statute, and say that it is one which can be enforced on the chancery side of the District Court. And surely that Court has the same power now that it had under the old statute, in addition to which is the fact that the course contended for by the appellant would require a multiplicity of suits to accomplish what, under the ruling of the Supreme Court heretofore, could as well be done in one.

This Court, in a long series of decisions, has defined the limits of the jurisdiction of the different Courts under the Constitution, and that jurisdiction is now well settled and understood; for no light cause should it be interfered with. We think the Court decided rightly in holding that a suit to enforce a mechanic's lien was not a special case. If there ever was room to doubt the propriety of that decision, the evil of overturning it would be greater than to abide by it.

NORTON, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORE, C. J. and CROCKER, J. concurring.

The provision of our State Constitution, that County Courts shall have jurisdiction in special cases as the Legislature may prescribe, was copied from the Constitution of the State of New York. The Judges of the Court of Appeals of that State are about equally divided as to the proper meaning of the provision. One portion consider that it is the purpose of the Constitution to confer upon the Supreme Court, which corresponds to our District Court, general jurisdiction in all cases properly cognizable in Courts of Law and Equity, without specially designating them; and also to authorize the Legislature to confer upon County Courts jurisdiction in such cases as the Legislature might think appropriate to that tribunal, and should specially designate. Another portion consider that the Constitution intends only to authorize the Legislature to confer jurisdiction upon County Courts in cases which are in their character special, by differing from those cases of which the Supreme Court would take cognizance by virtue of its powers as a Court of general jurisdiction. (Arnold v. Rees, 18 N. Y. 57.) The latter is the view taken by the Supreme Court of this State. (Parsons v. The Tuolumne County Water Co., 5 Cal. 43; Brock v. Bruce et al., 5 Id. 279.) In these cases our Supreme Court say:

McNiel v. Borland.

"The 'special cases,' therefore, must be confined to such new cases as are the creation of statutes, and the proceedings under which are unknown to the general framework of Courts of Common Law and Equity." There remains difficulty, however, in determining what are such special cases.

It is a maxim that there can be no right without a remedy; and it is not easy to imagine any new case in which a right should be conferred by statute, for which a mode of enforcing it would not be found in the general framework of the Courts of Common Law and Equity. In New York, some of the Judges, who held that these special cases must be in their character different from those falling within the cognizance of Courts of general jurisdiction, have nevertheless concurred in holding that a proceeding for the partition of land and an action to foreclose a mortgage were special cases. (Arnold v. Rees, cited above; Doubleday v. Heath, 16 N. Y. 80.) And in our State the same has been decided in regard to proceedings in insolvency. (Harper v. Freelon, 6 Cal. 76.)

The lien of a mechanic upon a house and the ground on which it stands, as security for the amount due to him for work done and materials furnished in building the house, irrespective of any contract for such a lien, is the "creation of statute," and the proceedings to enforce it as provided by the law of this State as amended in 1861, "are unknown to the general framework of Courts of Common Law and Equity," if any proceedings can be. They are commenced by petition, and not by complaint and summons. No summons or other process is issued, but in their place a notice is published for all persons interested to come in and participate; and all the other steps are calculated to dispose of the matter in a summary way, and with the least delay and expense. In these respects they are substantially identical with the proceedings in insolvency. The right and the remedy are peculiar, and we can conceive of no case that could be considered "special," if this is not.

It is said, however, that the point has been decided the other way in the case of Brock v. Bruce (cited above). We think there is a radical difference between that case and this. By the law as it stood when that case was decided, the mechanics' lien could only be enforced by an action; and the Court put the decision expressly upon the ground that the mechanic could enforce his right to compensation for his work and materials by suit in Courts of general jurisdiction, and that the lien was a species of mortgage added by statute, which followed the debt, and might be enforced in the same action. In the law, as it now stands, the debt and the lien are expressly separated: the former to be enforced by an action, of course, either in the District Court, or before a Justice of the Peace; the latter by a special proceeding in the County Court only. The debt, which would exist if there were no Mechanics' Lien Law, may be enforced like any other debt—by action in a proper Court. The lien is a peculiar right, existing only by the statute, and which the same statute provides must be enforced by a special proceeding wholly separate from the debt. This case falls within the definition of "special cases," as given in the case of Brock v. Bruce et al. (5 Cal. 279), but is not within the effect of that decision.

If the term "special cases" in the Constitution, means such cases as the Legislature may see fit to assign to the jurisdiction of County Courts by special designation, without regard to their peculiar character, then of course the County Court had jurisdiction of the case under consideration, as such jurisdiction is directly given by the seventh section of the Mechanics' Lien Law as amended in 1861.

Our conclusion is, that under either view of the proper meaning of the term "special cases" in the Constitution, the provision to enforce a mechanic's lien under the law as amended in 1861, is a special case of which the Legislature might properly give jurisdiction to the County Courts under the Constitution.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

People v. Linn.

THE PEOPLE v. ADAM LINN.

In an indictment for larceny in stealing coin, the same strictness of proof in identifying the property is not required as in other species of property; and in such case it is proper that the jury should be left to determine from all the testimony and all the circumstances, whether the coin proved to have been stolen was the same as that charged in the indictment.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions, City and County of San Francisco.

The defendant was indicted for stealing sixty-four pieces of gold coin of the lawful currency of the United States, of the value of twenty dollars each, being of the denomination of double-eagles. He was found guilty, sentenced, and from the judgment of the Court appeals.

Henry B. Jones, for Appellant.

There is an entire variance between the description of the money in the indictment and the proof.

This Court has, in terms, decided what the description of money must be in an indictment for larceny. (People v. Bell, 14 Cal. 101.) In all material averments, the proof and the description in the indictment must correspond, even although the averments of the indictment are unnecessary. (Roscoe's Cr. Ev. 102; State v. Hughes, 1 Swan, 262; 2 Russ. on Crimes, 109.)

When a specific coin is described, the proof must show the larceny of some one or more of the specific coins charged to have been stolen. (Burr. on Cr. Ev. 171, 186, 657; 1 Stark. Ev. 491, 499, note; Whart. Cr. L. 162; Barb. Id. 2d Ed. 187.)

Proof that property is of the same kind with that lost is insufficient. The larceny charged of a "gray horse," is not sustained by proof of the larceny of a "gray gelding." (Hooks v. The State, 4 Ohio, 350.) The larceny of "money" is not sustained by proof of the larceny of bank notes." (Prior v. The Commonwealth, 2 Darm. 298.)

Nathan Porter, for Respondent.

People v. Llan.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

The defendant was indicted for the crime of grand larceny in stealing gold coin. On the trial, the defendant asked the Court to instruct the jury as follows: 1st. That if the jury find from the evidence that the prosecution has failed to identify the money described in the indictment, as it is there described, they must acquit the defendant. 2d. That the mere statement of a sum, is not a sufficient identification of the money described in the indictment to warrant a verdict of guilty." The Court instructed the jury as asked, with this explanation: "That the jury must be satisfied from all the testimony that the money referred to by the witness Williamson, in the alleged admission of the defendant to her, was the same money, or a part of the same money, described in the indictment—that that would be a sufficient identification, without a more specific identification of the money taken;" and the defendant excepted to this qualification of the instructions as asked by him. There is no error in this qualification of the instructions. Coin is not capable of the same specific description and identification as other property, and therefore the same exactness in proof cannot be had. It is therefore proper that the jury should be left to determine, from all the testimony and all the circumstances, whether the coin proved to have been stolen was the same kind of coin as that charged in the indictment; and if several kinds are stated in the indictment, then the proof should show that one or more of such kinds were among the kinds of coin stolen.

It is also urged that the mere confession of the defendant is insufficient, without other proof of the fact, that a crime had been committed. The weight of the authorities is in favor of the doctrine that the prisoner's confession alone is sufficient to warrant a conviction; while some cases hold that the corpus delicti at least must be proved by other evidence. (1 Phillip's Ev., C. H. & E.'s Notes, 532, 541.)

In the present case, there was sufficient evidence to show that a larceny had been committed, and that the prisoner was in all probability the person who committed it, independent of his confessions.

Neely v. Naglee.

This objection is therefore overruled. There was also sufficient evidence to show that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the Court that tried the case.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

NEELY v. NAGLEE.

WHEN a legal notice is served by mail, the distance which it travels is a question of fact to be determined by proof.

The law fixing the distances from the different County Seats to the Capital, State Prison, and Asylum, refers only to the distances for which mileage shall be allowed to Sheriffs, County Treasurers, etc., and has no application to the service of legal notices.

The statement or representation of an agent, made at the time of a transaction which is within the scope of his authority, is evidence against the principal himself.

When an agent's letters have been adopted or acted upon by the principal, they become admissible in evidence against the principal.

APPEAL from the Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Stow, for Appellant.

“The declarations or admissions of an agent, made in regard to a transaction already past, but while his agency for a similar purpose still continues, will not bind the principal.” (See a similar letter in Webber v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 453; and see this case subsequently decided on the ground and principle above laid down.) Thalhimer v. Brinckerhof (4 Wend. 394), was decided on this principle, and Judge Marcy quotes, with approbation, Bentham v. Benson (Gow's N. P. 45), as follows: “It is not true that when an agency is established, the declarations of an agent are admitted in evidence merely because they are his declarations; they are only evidence when they form a part of the contract entered into by the agent, on the behalf of his principal, and in that simple case, they become admissible.” (Fairlie v. Hastings, 10 Vesey, 123; see City Bank of B. v. Bateman, 7 H. & John. 104, 108; 19 Pick 220; 3 Day, 491, 495; 8 Metc. 142; Laughom v. Allnutt, 4 Taunt. 511.) The law is too well settled to admit of a doubt.

Neely v. Naglee.

C. T. Ryland, for Respondent.

In the letter, Janes does no say "our arrangement about the cattle was," but, "our arrangement is," as follows: This contract or letter is signed by him, as Naglee's agent. He was acting for Naglee; he was making the contract then. He was not, as appellant now contends, telling what the arrangement had been. He spoke nothing of a former contract, but was at the date of that instrument, making the contract itself. From the evidence, it will appear that what defendant calls admissions of the agent, were made dum ferveret opus, and that exhibit No. 6, being the contract, was made during that time, and was in fact res gesta. (See 1 Greenl. 113-126; Story's Agency, 134, 135; 9 Cal. 256.) The case in 19 Cal. 453, referred to by defendant, is not in point. In that case, the agreement was as a fact, made before the letter of Hammond was written; and the letter shows on its face that it referred to a prior transaction, and was written as evidence of such prior agreement.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This was an action upon an account for work and labor performed by the plaintiff and his wife, for goods sold, money paid, etc. The case was, by stipulation of the parties and order of the Court, referred to a referee to take the testimony and report the same to the Court. The referee took the testimony, duly reported the same, the Court filed its findings therein in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the defendant appeals.

The stipulation of the parties provides that five days' notice of the time and place of taking the testimony by the referee should be given to the parties. The referee resided at San José, and the testimony was taken there, while the defendant's attorney resided at San Francisco. A proper notice, specifying the time and place of taking the testimony, was duly deposited in the post-office at San José, postage paid, directed to the defendant's attorney at San Francisco, seven days before the time fixed. The defendant did not appear at the taking of the testimony; and when the case came before the Court, upon the testimony as reported by the referee, the plaintiff moved for judgment upon the pleadings and testimony, which was opposed by the defendant, who objected to the Court's considering any part of the testimony, on the ground that he was not present when it was taken, and proper notice had not been given. On the hearing of this motion, the plaintiff introduced a witness who testified that he knew the distance between San José and San Francisco, and that the distance by the United States mail-route is about forty-eight or fifty miles. The defendant, however, contended that the distance was to be ascertained by the Statute of 1858, defining the legal distances from each county seat to the Capital, Lunatic Asylum, and State Prison; that by that act the legal distance from San José to San Quentin was fixed at eighty miles, and the distance from San Francisco to the latter place was fixed at twelve miles, leaving the legal distance from San José to San Francisco at sixty-eight miles, which, at twenty-five miles per day, would require three instead of two days for the traveling time of the notice. The Court overruled the defendant's objection, and he now assigns this action of the Court as error.

The act referred to by the defendant declares that the distances established by it, are the legal distances for which mileage shall be allowed for County Treasurers settling their accounts, for conveying the insane to the State Asylum, and to Sheriffs for transporting prisoners to the State Prison, and it therefore has no application to the question before the Court. The distance between San José and San Francisco was a fact to be determined by proper evidence; and such evidence was introduced by the plaintiff, establishing it at forty-eight to fifty miles. This evidence shows that the notice was served in due time, and the Court therefore properly overruled the defendant's objection.

Among other evidence reported by the referee was the following letter to the plaintiff, written by Janes, the defendant's agent, to wit:

SAN FRANCISCO, December 1st, 1860.

MR. ROBERT NEELY—Dear Sir: Our arrangement about cattle, hogs, and poultry, on Naglee's place in San José, occupied by you, is as follows: For taking care of the same, you are to have half the produce and increase, Naglee furnishing the feed and service of bulls, etc.—you doing all the labor. Yours, etc.,

H. P. JAMES,

Agent for H. M. Naglee.

The defendant moved the Court below to strike out this letter from the testimony, on the ground that it was a mere declaration or admission made by the agent after the agreement stated in the letter was made, and therefore not admissible. The Court overruled this motion, and this is also assigned for error.

The general rule is that the statement or representation of an agent, at the time of a transaction which is within the scope of his authority, is evidence against the principal himself, in consequence of the legal relation between principal and agent. (1 Phillip's Ev. C. H. & E.'s Notes, 507.) But when an agent has said or written anything relative to a transaction which is past and completed, the question of the admissibility of the agent's declaration without calling the agent depends on the point whether the making of such a statement was within the scope of the agent's authority. (Id. 513.) When an agent's letters have been adopted or acted upon by the principal, they become admissible against him, for the principal's conduct raises the inference that the letters were written within the scope of the agent's authority. (Id. 516.)

From the terms of this letter it would seem to relate to a present contract then put in writing. The words are, "our agreement is as follows," not was, which would have been the word used had the writer referred to an agreement previously made. The writing is therefore to be considered as the agreement itself, and not as an admission merely of some prior contract. The authority of the agent to make such an agreement on behalf of the defendant is not disputed. The evidence shows further that the plaintiff afterwards exhibited to the defendant his account, which included the matters to which this letter relates, and he made no objection to it, but promised to send him the money from San Francisco, where he was going the next day. It appears also that one Fox, on behalf of the plaintiff, asked the defendant for a settlement of the plaintiff's accounts with him, and for a division of the stock and poultry, to which the defendant replied that he was not prepared; but he made no objection as to the right of the plaintiff to a division. From this evidence it would seem that the defendant must have known of the agreement referred to in the letter, and that he had adopted or acquiesced in it. It is clear, however, that the Court did not err in overruling this motion of the defendant.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

THE PEOPLE v. GAUNT.

THE granting of continuances rests very much in the discretion of the Court below, and it is only in cases where that discretion has been abused, that the Supreme Court will review its action.

An affidavit for a continuance should state that the facts expected to be proved by the absent witness, cannot be proved by any other witness.

The case of the People v. Gatewood (20 Cal. 147), as to challenging jurors, affirmed.

APPEAL from the Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hereford & Williams, for Appellant.

If error be committed in the case (that is a criminal case), this Court will not undertake to say whether the defendant was injured or not. In the case of The People v. Stewart (7 Cal. 144) the Court say: "It is enough for us to know it might have been different." In the case of People v. Ybarra (17 Cal. 171) the Court say: "When error is shown, the burden of establishing its immateriality rests upon the party in whose favor it was committed." In People v. Williams (18 Cal. 194) the Court say: "If any error intervenes in the proceeding, it is presumed to be injurious to the prisoner."

Certainly error intervened in this case; if so, the case should be reversed, and the case of The People v. Gatewood reversed.

C. J. Hillyer, for Respondent.

As the jurors challenged did not sit in the case, and as the jury was completed and accepted by defendant without exhausting his peremptory challenges, he cannot avail himself of any exception to the ruling of the Court upon the challenges for cause. (People v. Gatewood, 20 Cal. 146; People v. Knickerbocker, 1 Parker's Crim. 302; Freeman v. The People, 4 Denio, 31; Stewart v. The State, 8 Eng., 13 Ark. 741-743.)

The People v. Gatewood, which is precisely in point, is fully sustained by the other cases cited, in each of which the facts are almost identical with those of the case at bar.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

The defendant in this case was indicted and tried, in the County of Placer, for the crime of murder, and was convicted of manslaughter. The case was first set for trial July 22d, 1862, but was continued until the next (October) Term, on the application of the defendant, on the ground of the absence of material witnesses. At the October Term, when the case was called for trial, the defendant again moved for a continuance, on the ground of the absence of some of his witnesses; the Court overruled the motion, and this is assigned as error.

The trial was set for October 31st, 1862. The subpoena bears date October 13th; was issued to the Sheriff of Santa Clara County, and was served by him on two of the three witnesses October 27th, in that county, the return showing that the other witness was not found. The affidavit of the defendant, on which the motion for a continuance was founded, set forth that he expected to prove by these witnesses the character of the deceased—that he was a quarrelsome man, etc.—and that these facts were known to the defendant; and further states “that he does not know of any other witnesses by whom he can prove the facts aforesaid as fully as by the said witnesses.” This matter of granting and refusing continuance rests very much in the discretion of the Court below; and it is only in cases where that discretion has been abused that this Court will review their action. We see no abuse of that discretion in the present case. It is necessary in applications of this kind to show that the testimony of the absent witness is not merely cumulative, and that the same facts cannot be proved by another whose testimony can be procured. (People v. Thompson, 4 Cal. 240; People v. Quincy, 8 Id. 89.) In this respect the affidavit is clearly insufficient, for it admits that the same facts can be proved by others, though not in his opinion as fully as by the absent witnesses. The facts he states he expected to prove by the absent witnesses, are of such a character as would be likely to be generally known in the community where the deceased lived; and could, therefore, hardly be confined to a few persons. There was, therefore, no error in denying the continuance.

During the impanneling of the jury, the defendant challenged one Myrick, who was called as a juror, for implied bias. Three triers were sworn to inquire whether the jurors challenged were biased against the defendant. During the examination of the juror, several questions asked by the defendant were ruled out by the Court, to which he excepted. The triers found the challenge was not true. Thereupon the defendant challenged the juror peremptorily. Like proceedings were had as to two other jurors. This action of the Court is also assigned for error. The statute gave the defendant twenty peremptory challenges, only ten of which were used by him, thus leaving him ten peremptory challenges after the jury was impaneled. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant suffered no injury by the ruling of the Court upon these questions, and it is therefore unnecessary to determine whether such ruling was erroneous or not. (The People v. Gatewood, 20 Cal. 147.)

THE crime of false imprisonment is not a felony under the laws of this State. If the indictment be for a misdemeanor, the defendant may appear and plead by attorney, and the trial may be had in his absence. In an indictment for a misdemeanor, if the defendant appear and offer to plead by attorney, the Court has no power to enter his default and declare his recognisance forfeited.

People v. Ebner.

APPEAL from the Sixteenth Judicial District, Amador County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. C. Goods and J. W. Coffroth, for Appellants.

It is well settled that the District Court cannot revise a judgment of forfeiture which has been entered in the Court of Sessions. The District Court has no power to question the regularity or legality of such judgment. (People v. Wolf, 16 Cal. 385.)

In this case the appellants do not question the correctness of the opinion in the case of People v. Wolf, but they do contend strenuously that they had a legal right in the District Court, as a defense to the action upon the forfeited recognizance, to prove that the defendant Heilbron was present by attorney in the Court of Sessions when called.

Can sureties who are sued in the District Court upon a recognizance forfeited by the Court of Sessions make any defense to the action?

The District Court would surely not be revising the judgment of forfeiture entered by the Court of Sessions by hearing testimony of witnesses to prove that the defendant (for whose appearance the sureties became responsible) was dead at the time of forfeiting the recognizance, and consequently unable to appear and answer the indictment. If such testimony would be a defense for the sureties, why may they not plead any legal cause? In this case it is admitted that the defendant was charged with a misdemeanor, and that he appeared by counsel when called for arraignment. Having thus appeared, appellants contend that it was a good and sufficient defense to the action in the District Court.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon a forfeited recognizance, executed by the defendants as sureties for one A. Heilbron, for his appearance to answer to an indictment for the crime of false imprisonment. On the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence the record of the Court of Sessions of Amador County, in which the indictment was pending, relating to the default of the party charged with the offense, which showed that when the case was called the defendant Heilbron appeared by attorney, though not in person, and tendered to the Court a plea of not guilty to the indictment; but the Court refused to accept the plea, and, on motion of the District Attorney, he was three times called at the window of the court-house, and not appearing in person his default was entered, and his recognizance declared forfeited. The defendants in this action, upon the production of this record, insisted that the defendant in the indictment had a right to appear and plead to it by attorney, and that his personal presence was not necessary—the offense charged being a mere misdemeanor, and not a felony; but the Court below overruled their objection and rendered judgment for the plaintiffs, from which the defendants appeal.

Sec. 259 of the Criminal Practice Act provides that: "If the indictment be for a felony, the defendant must be personally present; but if for a misdemeanor, his personal presence is unnecessary, and he may appear upon the arraignment by counsel." Sec. 320 also provides: "If the indictment be for a misdemeanor, the trial may be had in the absence of the defendant; but if for a felony, he must be personally present." So, also, Sec. 415 provides that in cases of misdemeanor the verdict may be rendered in the absence of the defendant. A forfeiture must be strictly proved. The record discloses that the Court of Sessions had no power or authority to enter a default, or to declare the recognizance forfeited.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the Court below is directed to dismiss the action.

ELLIS v. HULL et al.

WHEREAS an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court from a judgment, by filing notice of appeal and undertaking, and the appeal is afterwards dismissed by the Supreme Court for failure of the appellant to send up a transcript, the sureties are liable on the undertaking on appeal.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

People v. Leet.

On the twenty-fourth day of December, 1861, judgment was rendered in the County Court of Solano County in favor of Ellis against Hull & Hull for three hundred and fifty-one dollars and fifty-three cents damages, and for one hundred and four dollars and fifty cents costs. On the twenty-third day of January, 1862, the defendants appealed to the Supreme Court, and the defendants W. Long and S. W. Long, as sureties, signed the undertaking on appeal. On the twelfth day of April, 1862, the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal, because the transcript had not been filed. This action was brought on the undertaking on appeal. The Court gave judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed.

M. A. Wheaton, for Appellants.

Swan & Hays and G. W. McMurtry, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon an undertaking on appeal, and the only ground of error assigned is that no appeal had been taken, and therefore that the undertaking was without consideration. The evidence sustains the findings of the Court that an appeal had been taken, which was dismissed by the Supreme Court with costs, on the ground of the failure of the appellants to file the transcript. The objection, therefore, is not well taken.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE PEOPLE v. LEET.

THE Statute of 1861, requiring real estate, in actions to recover taxes, to be described in the complaint with the same particularity as in actions of ejectment, only applies to actions in which the real estate is made a party defendant.

In an assessment for taxes, a description of a tract of land by name is sufficient. When the complaint avers that the property was duly assessed by an Assessor of a district or county (naming it), it is not necessary to further aver that the property was situated within the jurisdiction of the Assessor.

People v. Leet.

APPEAL from the Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. H. Bullock, for Appellant.

The description is defective. The description of the real estate is, "Forks House Ranch"; the number of acres is not stated; the complaint does not state that it is inclosed; it does not state whether there are any buildings on the ranch, or any improvements.

There is no allegation that the property assessed in is Township No. 6. This is fatally defective. Assessors in Placer County are elected in each township. Unless the property was in Township No. 6, Spear had no power or authority to assess it. The complaint should show clearly the authority of the Assessor. There are no presumptions in his favor. (Lachman v. Clark, 14 Cal. 138; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Id. 632; People v. Pico, 20 Id. 595.)

The description of the property at Michigan Bluffs is as follows: "Stone buildings on the south side of Main Street," etc. This is insufficient; each building should be separately assessed, because they may belong to different owners, or they may be sold to different persons, and each would have the right to pay the taxes on his own property. Several buildings could not be sold in a lump for taxes; such a tax deed would convey no title. This is a plain principle, applicable to all taxation; this principle was decided in the case of Terrill v. Graves (18 Cal. 149). The assessment should show that the tax was on the improvements, and not on the land itself. (Hall v. Downing, 18 Cal. 619.)

Jo. Hamilton, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover delinquent taxes levied upon property assessed to the defendant in the year 1862, under the Revenue Law of 1861 and the amendments thereto. The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action; that the Court had no jurisdiction of the subject of the action; that there was a misjoinder of parties; and that it was ambiguous and uncertain. And a special demurrer on behalf of the real estate, which was made a party, was also interposed, that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the real estate. The Court sustained the demurrer as to the real estate, and overruled it as to the defendant, Leet; and, no answer having been filed within the time fixed by the Court, a final judgment was rendered against the defendant for the amount of the taxes and costs, from which the defendant appeals.

No appeal having been taken on behalf of the plaintiffs, the action of the Court in sustaining the demurrer as to the real estate cannot be reviewed.

The appellant alleges as error, that the description of the real estate is defective and insufficient, and the Court erred in not sustaining his demurrer for that reason. It is doubtful whether the appellant has the right to raise this objection here, under the peculiar circumstances of this case. The Statute of 1861 authorizes suit to be brought against the "person so delinquent, and against the real estate and improvements assessed so delinquent," etc.; and, in making the real estate a party, it requires that it shall be described with the same particularity as in actions of ejectment; but no description seems to be required, except for the purpose of identifying the real estate as a party. (Stat. of 1861, 432, Sec. 40.) The demurrer filed on behalf of the real estate having been sustained, and no amendment having been made, the real estate ceased to be a party to the action; and the reason for a particular description ceased to have any force, as no judgment could be or was entered against it.

Still, however this may be, we think the description is sufficient. One tract is described as the "Forks House Ranch, valued at $1,500; said ranch situated about twelve miles north and easterly from Michigan Bluffs, about one and a half miles southerly and easterly from Damascus." This is a sufficient description, as held in the cases of Castro v. Gill (5 Cal. 42) and Yount v. Howell (14 Id. 467). A description of a tract of land by name is sufficient, as it is presumed that the tract, and the extent of its boundaries, is well known by the name. The next piece is described as a "house and lot on the north side of Main Street, Michigan Bluffs, occupied by A. Ferguson as a tin shop, valued at $400." This is clearly sufficient to identify it. The last is a "stone building on the south side of Main Street, Michigan Bluffs, between Tyler's and Levin & Hefter's, valued at $2,700." This is also sufficient to identify the tract. This objection is therefore overruled.

It is also objected, that the complaint avers that the property was assessed by the District Assessor of Township No. 6, and it does not aver that the property is in that township. The complaint avers that the property was duly assessed by the District Assessor; and this is all that is required by the statute, which prescribes the form of the complaint in such actions. If it was not properly assessed, and there was any fraud in the assessment, the defendant should have set forth the facts in an answer.

It is also contended that the complaint should show that each building was separately assessed. The statute does not require any such statement in the complaint; and if it did the complaint in this case sufficiently states it, in averring the separate sums the property was valued at. The objection that the personal property assessed is not sufficiently described in the complaint, is untenable, as was held in The People v. Eastman, decided at the present term. The total amount of taxes claimed exceeds two hundred dollars, and the District Court therefore had jurisdiction of the case. If the property assessed included any public lands belonging to the United States, and therefore exempt from taxation, that fact should have been stated in an answer. The complaint does not show it, and the question, therefore, could not be raised by demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

GREWELL v. WALDEN et al.

THE plaintiff in an action may have the place of trial changed upon a proper showing made under the twenty-first section of the Practice Act, and it is error in the Court to refuse it.

IN pleading, it is the ultimate and not the probative facts, which should be averred; and it is error in the Court to exclude evidence offered to establish the probative facts, although they are not averred in the complaint.

APPEAL from the Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. G. Cobb, for Appellant.

Appellant contends that if appellant's vendors had been owners of the land upon which the wood was cut, and out of possession, and defendants had entered without title, and cut and carried away the wood, the right to the wood may be shown by showing title to the land from which it was cut, and this without any allegation of title to the land in the complaint.

In support of this proposition in the Court below, the appellant relied upon Halleck v. Mixer (16 Cal. 574). Strange to say, the defendants in support of their doctrine that appellant could not go into the question of title to the land, not even the possession, without an allegation of title, etc., relied with equal confidence upon the same case. Unfortunately, the complaint set out in this case (Halleck v. Mixer), and which was demurred to, gives the defendants some justification for taking this ground.

As the appellant understands that case, the Court simply say, that where the title to personal property sought in a replevin suit depends upon the plaintiff's title to land, it does not vitiate the complaint to set out in it the land title. This case does not decide that this must be done. Defendants do not, or rather did not, dispute the law of this case but said in all cases, where the right to personalty is derived from realty, the title to the realty must be set out in the complaint expressis verbis.

The appellant has examined the authorities cited by the Court in Grewell v. Walden.

Halleck v. Mixer, and also those cited by counsel for appellants in the same case; in none was the question raised which has been raised on this point of pleading; in nearly all, however, it may fairly be inferred that the title to real estate was incidentally tried under the personal action of replevin or trover, without any express averment having been made, as to the title in the complaint. (Sands v. Pfeiffer et al., 10 Cal. 258; Rockwell v. Sanders, 19 Barb. 473; Harlan v. Harlan, 15 Penn. 507; Brown v. Sax, 7 Cow. 95; Baker v. Wheeler, 8 Wend. 505; Wingate v. Smith, 20 Me. 287; Davis v. Early, 13 Ill. 192; Heath et al. v. Ross, 12 Johns. 140.)

In replevin, a general allegation that plaintiff is the owner of the property, is sufficient under the New York Code, from which we have copied literally. (Heine v. Anderson, 2 Duer, 318; see also, Vogel v. Babcock, 1 Abb. Pr. 176; Hunter v. Hudson River Ins. Co., 20 Barb. 501; 1 Whittaker's Prac. 738; 1 Van Santvoord's Plead. 279.)

The Court erred in not granting appellant a change of venue. The New York Code, Sec. 126, is similar to our own in this respect.

No point was made in the Court below by counsel for defendants as to the sufficiency of the affidavit in this case. The only point was as to the Court's having any discretion in such a case; the plaintiff having elected his tribunal. In local actions, where the plaintiff in the first instance is compelled to bring his action within a certain jurisdiction, the Courts have entertained motions for a change of venue on the part of plaintiff, on the ground of convenience of witnesses. (Inter. Assur. Co. v. Sweetland, 14 Abb. Pr. 240.)

As between plaintiff and defendant in such motions, in New York the Courts have laid it down, as a general principle governing applications of this nature, that the place of trial should be in the county where the principal transactions between the parties occurred, and where it appears the largest number of witnesses who know anything of the transaction sued upon, reside. (Jordan v. Garrison, 6 How. 6; People v. Wright, 5 Id. 23; Goodrich v. Vanderbilt, 7 Id. 467; Hinchman v. Butler, Id. 462; Mason v. Brown, 6 Id. 481; 2 Whittaker's Prac. 3d Ed. 251.)

Grewell v. Walden.

Our statute is broad enough to cover the discretion asked for.

Hall & Scaniker, for Respondents.

The general rule as to allegation of title in an action strictly personal, at common law, cannot be doubted; and it is not necessary that the evidence of the title should be stated. But all that is claimed here, on these points by the respondents, is that they should have been put upon notice by a general allegation that the appellant was the owner or in possession of the land from which the wood was severed. The defendants would then have put that fact in issue by a denial.

The case of Halleck v. Mixer establishes the following propositions:

1. That if it appears, whether on the face of the complaint or under the proofs, that the plaintiff's title to the wood rests upon his title to the land, and at the time of the cutting of the wood he is not in possession, but the defendant is, claiming the land adversely under color of title, the action of replevin cannot be maintained, because the Court will not determine the land title in the personal action.

2. But in other cases proof is admissible of title to the land, as the means of showing title to the wood; that is, where the title to the wood is founded on the title or possession of the land, and the defendant is a mere intruder or trespasser.

3. But in such case, in order to admit proof of the plaintiff's title or possession of the land, such title or possession must be alleged, because the title to the chattel is inseparably connected with the right to the land, and because it is that upon such proof the right of recovery rests.

The defendants did not deny in the Court below that the Court had a discretionary power to order a change of venue; but the defendants claimed that the proof upon the affidavits did not justify the Court in making the order, for the reason that the convenience of parties and of witnesses would not be subserved, but rather hindered thereby.

No such rule as that sought to be sustained by the cases cited in New York has been recognized in this State; and your Honors would not disturb the action of the Court below unless it was apparent that its discretion had been grossly abused.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought in San Joaquin County to recover the possession of a quantity of cord wood, alleged to have been taken from the plaintiff's possession in Stanislaus County, and then detained in the County of San Joaquin. The defendant recovered judgment, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff, after issue joined, moved the Court for a change of venue to Stanislaus County, alleging in his affidavit that his right to the wood depended upon his title and possession of the land from which the wood was cut, which lay in Stanislaus County, and that the convenience of witnesses, seventeen of whom are stated to be residents of Stanislaus County, required a change of the place of trial to the latter county. He also states good reasons why he commenced the action in San Joaquin County, to wit: the necessity of procuring the immediate possession of the wood before it could be removed beyond his reach to some other part of the State. No opposing affidavits appear to have been filed. The Court denied the application, and this is assigned for error. We see no good reason why the plaintiff in an action may not have the place of trial changed, upon a proper showing, equally with the defendant. There is nothing in the statute forbidding it. Sec. 21 of the Practice Act provides that "The Court may, on motion, change the place of trial in the following cases," etc. It does not confine this motion to the defendant, but leaves it open for both parties. As a general rule, the action should be commenced in the county where the defendants reside; but if, after the issues are made up, and each party knows the facts necessary to be proved, the plaintiff should find that the convenience of his witnesses requires that the trial should be had in some other county, where the cause of action arose, and where his witnesses reside, he is certainly as much entitled to a change as the defendant would be under the same circumstances, and he should not be denied that right because he has brought his action in the county where the defendants reside, or where the personal property in controversy may happen to be found. The present case shows the importance of thus establishing the rule. The plaintiff finds his property in San Joaquin County, and to prevent its being carried away beyond his reach, or being converted by the trespasser, he commenced his suit in that county to recover its possession. But the property was taken from his possession in Stanislaus County, where the act was committed which forms the gravamen of the action, and where it is presumed the witnesses reside who know the facts. The Court therefore erred in refusing to change the place of trial.

During the trial the plaintiff called a witness, and offered to prove by him that he owned the land upon which the wood in question was cut, and sold the wood to the plaintiff, and put the following question to the witness: "Who was the owner and in possession of the land upon which the wood in question was cut and taken away by the defendants?" The defendants objected to the question, because it was inquiring into the title of land, and the plaintiff had made no allegation of such title in his complaint. The Court sustained the objection, and excluded all evidence relating to the title or possession of the land on which the wood was cut. After the plaintiff had closed his testimony, the defendants moved for a nonsuit, on the ground that the plaintiff's title to the wood depended upon the title of his vendors to the land upon which the wood was cut, and no such fact of title was averred in the complaint, or proved. The Court granted the nonsuit, and these rulings of the Court are assigned as error.

The Court erred in excluding the evidence, and in granting the nonsuit on the ground stated. In discussing the rules of pleading this Court say, in the case of Green v. Palmer (15 Cal. 411): "To illustrate this, let us suppose an ultimate fact, upon the establishment of which the claim or defense depends, and that the establishment of this fact depends upon the establishment of three or four prior facts, which being established proves this. It is the ultimate fact, and not the prior or probative facts, which should be set forth." To apply this rule to the present case. The ultimate fact to be established here is the ownership of the wood, when it was taken away by the defendants. The establishment of this fact depends upon establishing the ownership and possession of the land from which it was severed. These latter are, therefore, but probative facts, and need not be set forth; but the ultimate fact, to wit: the ownership of the wood being stated, it is sufficient. The principle that the owner of the land is entitled to the wood cut from it, where there is no other person in possession of the land, holding adversely in good faith under claim and color of title, was fully established in the case of Halleck v. Mixer (16 Cal. 574), and a similar principle had been sustained by this Court in the case of Sands v. Pfeiffer (10 Cal. 263). It is true that in the case of Halleck v. Mixer the facts relating to the ownership and possession of the land by the plaintiffs were fully set forth in the complaint, and there is no impropriety in making the averments in that manner; but it is not essential that they should be so stated in order to admit the proof of such facts.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

OCTOBER TERM, 1863.

REPORTS OF CASES

DETERMINED IN

THE SUPREME COURT

OCTOBER TERM, 1863.

FRANKLIN v. STATE BOARD OF EXAMINERS.

THE Constitution does not impose any limitation upon the amount of State indebtedness which may be created by the Legislature in case of war, to repel invasion or suppress insurrection.

The political department of the State Government is the sole judge of the existence of war or insurrection ; and when it declares either of these emergencies to exist, its action is not subject to review, or liable to be controlled by the judicial department of the State.

APPEAL from the Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

On the twenty-first day of August, 1863, John Franklin filed his petition, in which he set forth that on the twenty-fifth day of November, 1861, he became an enlisted soldier in Company H of the second regiment of cavalry, California Volunteers, and on the twenty-fifth day of July, 1863, was honorably discharged from service, and that on the eighteenth day of August, 1863, he requested the Board of State Examiners to audit and allow his claim for five dollars per month during his period of service under the Act of April

27th, 1863, and that said board refused to audit and allow his claim.

The District Court denied the application for a mandamus, and from this judgment the petitioner appealed.

George Cadwalader, for Appellant.

In case of war, invasion, or insurrection, there is no limitation on the power of the Legislature to create a State debt exceeding $300,000. (The People v. Rogers, 13 Cal. 159; Cal. State Telegraph Co. v. Alta Telegraph Co. 22 Id. 398; Nogues v. Douglass, 7 Id. 65.)

The recognition by the Legislature of either war, invasion, or insurrection, is a determination of a question of fact solely and exclusively confided in the Legislature. (Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat. 1; Martin v. Mott, 12 Id. 29; Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1.)

F. M. Pixley, Attorney-General, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring, and COPE, C. J. concurring specially.

This is an application for a mandamus to compel the defendants to audit and allow a claim to the bounty of five dollars per month allowed by the Act of April 27th, 1863, entitled "An Act for the Relief of the Enlisted Men of the California Volunteers in the Service of the United States." The Court below refused the mandamus, and the plaintiff appeals.

The respondents contend that the act in question violates the eighth article of the State Constitution, and is therefore void. The portion of the article applicable to the present case reads as follows: "The Legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly or in the aggregate with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of $300,000, except in case of war, to repel invasion or suppress insurrection," etc., etc. The act in question provides for the creation of a debt which may amount to $600,000; and it is admitted that the indebtedness of the State, at the time of the passage of the law, greatly exceeded the constitutional limit of $300,000. These facts would render the act invalid, unless it is saved by the exception in Art. 8.

It is contended by the appellant, that the present condition of the nation is evidence that the exigency exists provided for by the exception, and, therefore, the act is valid; while, on the other hand, the respondents insist that there is nothing in the condition of our National affairs which authorizes the law. In arguing this question, various constructions of this exception have been suggested: One is, that the power of the Legislature to create debts is unlimited only in cases where a war exists in the State, or where there is an invasion or threatened invasion of the State; or where there is an insurrection within its boundaries. Another is, that it applies in all cases where a war or insurrection exists in any part of the United States, or there is an invasion or threatened invasion of any territory within the National jurisdiction. It is also claimed that it applies only to repelling invasions of the State, or suppressing insurrections within its bounds in time of war. We do not deem it necessary to investigate this question, or to attempt to give an exact or definite construction of the terms thus used in the Constitution. The evident intention was to impose limitations upon the general power of the Legislature to create debts, leaving them free, however, from such restrictions in great emergencies caused by a war, an invasion, or an insurrection. In such cases, the Legislature should be left free to exercise their judgment and discretion upon the subject, answerable alone to the people for any abuse of the power. The existence of the emergency calling for the exercise of the power is purely a political question, and the Legislature, as the body in whom the political power of the State is vested, are the sole judges as to the existence of such emergency. It is the exercise of a purely political power, upon a political subject, in no manner of a judicial character, and it is not, therefore, subject to review, or liable to be controlled by the judicial department of the State. The Legislature is, therefore, the proper judge of the construction to be given to the Constitution upon this subject.

In the exercise of their rightful authority, they have decided that the exigency has arisen demanding the exercise of the power, and they have directly declared that the object of the law and the debt created by it, is "to aid in repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, enforcing the laws, and preserving and protecting the public property;" and this decision cannot be reviewed or set aside by this Court.

In the case of Luther v. Borden (7 How. U. S. 1), it was held that the decision and determination of matters of a political character by the Executive or Legislative departments of the Government, was binding on every other department, and could not be questioned by a judicial tribunal. The dangers and difficulties which would grow out of the adoption of a contrary rule are there clearly and ably pointed out. The National Constitution declares that Congress shall have power "to provide for calling out the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions;" and Congress, by the Act of 1795, provided "that whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion." It was held that this power to provide for repelling invasions includes the power to provide against the attempt and danger of invasion, as the necessary and proper means to effectuate the object. It was also held that although the power is in its terms limited and confined to cases of actual invasion, or of imminent danger of invasion, yet the authority to decide whether the exigency has arisen belongs exclusively to the President, and that his decision is conclusive upon all other persons. There is no provision for any appeal from the decision of the President. (Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat. 19.)

But even if it was necessary for this Court to decide whether or not war exists in the country, and that the emergency had arisen justifying the exercise of the power, there is sufficient in the condition of our National affairs to sustain the position that the emergency existed which justified the Legislature in passing the law. It is a matter of public history that eleven of the State Governments have organized a new confederacy of States, which they have called the "Confederate States of America," and under this new but unconstitutional organization they have levied war against the United States, and for nearly three years have prosecuted direct and open hostilities against the National and many of the State Governments, with all the means in their power. These hostilities constitute, both in law and fact, war. The fact that an insurrection exists, and that these hostilities are conducted by persons owing allegiance to the National Government, who are therefore rebels and traitors, renders it none the less a war. One part of the constitutional definition of treason is, that it consists "in levying war against them," that is, the United States. It is none the less treason because the rebels have levied war under a pretended national organization. A traitor cannot escape the punishment of his crime by adding thereto the offense of creating or acting under a governmental organization, and committing his treasonable acts under its pretended authority. Still, however this may be, the hostilities in which the nation is engaged are none the less war, whether carried on against traitors or not.

The fact that the rebels have never invaded this State can make no difference; for they are waging war against the nation, of which the State is a component part, and which we are equally interested, with each and all the other States, in sustaining. Whatever affects any one part of the nation equally affects us. The success or defeat of the National Government is equally our success and defeat. It is therefore the duty of the State to aid the National Government, when necessary, to the full extent of its means and ability. The Legislature is the sole judge of this necessity, and the extent to which aid should be rendered.

Not only does the public history of the times establish the fact of the existence of war, but various acts of Congress providing the means for prosecuting it, and the proclamations of the President of the United States, especially those of September 22d, 1862, and January 1st, 1863, recognize the existence of war, and prescribe rules regulating it. (12 U. S. Stat. at Large, 1267-1269.)

Our conclusion is, that the law in question is constitutional, and that the Court below erred in refusing the mandamus. The order to that effect is therefore reversed, and the Court below is directed to order a mandamus to issue, as prayed for by the plaintiff.

Gatewood v. McLaughlin.

CORE, C. J.—I concur in the judgment, upon the ground that the exigencies contemplated by the Constitution are matters of the existence of which the Legislature is the sole judge.

GATEWOOD v. McLAUGHLIN.

THE right to a mining claim upon the public lands rests upon possession only, and a sale by parol by one in possession accompanied by a transfer of possession, transfers the title.

APPEAL from the Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. P. Barber and William S. Wood, for Appellant.

H. O. Beatty, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of the undivided one-fourth of a mining claim. Both parties claim under one Tyson; the plaintiff under a deed dater March 25th, 1861, and the defendant under an alleged verbal sale and delivery of possession prior to that date, by Tyson to one McCabe, and by McCabe to one Harris, and by Harris to the defendant. On the trial, the defendant "offered to prove by good and competent evidence, to wit: by parol, that the plaintiff's grantor, prior to the conveyance made to the plaintiff, had sold his interest, being the interest in controversy, to one McCabe; that McCabe afterwards sold to James Harris; that Harris sold to the defendant the identical interest sold to the plaintiff by Tyson, and that the grantors of the defendant went into the possession, and they and the defendant have held the possession thereof to the present time." To this the plaintiff objected that such parol transfer was void and not binding upon him, as he claimed under a deed duly acknowledged. The Court sustained the objection and ruled out the evidence, and this is assigned for error.

In the case of the Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan

Zeigler v. Wells, Fargo & Co.

(20 Cal. 198), it was held that the right to a mining claim rested upon possession only, and did not amount to an interest in the land, and therefore was not within the Statute of Frauds; and that no conveyance other than a delivery of the possession was necessary to transfer the title from one person to another. And the Court intimated a similar opinion in the case of Jackson v. Feather River Water Co. (14 Cal. 22). Under these rulings, which we see no good reason for disturbing, the Court clearly erred in rejecting the evidence offered by the defendant.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ZEIGLER v. WELLS, FARGO & CO.

- IN an action against a common carrier, to recover damages for the loss of a draft the measure of damages, prima facie, is the amount due on the same; but the defendant is at liberty to reduce the damages by proof of payment, the insolvency of the maker, or any fact tending to invalidate the security.
- IN such action, a complaint which does not state the date of the draft, the amount for which it was drawn, the time when it was payable, or to whom payable, is insufficient.

APPEAL from the Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Saunders, Dwinelle, and Wilkins, for Appellant.

Jo. Hamilton, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages caused by the failure of the defendants to deliver a letter containing a check or draft received from the plaintiff at their office in Auburn, inclosed in a common ten-cent letter envelope, issued by the defendants, directed to Louis Sloss & Co., at Sacramento. The check in question was drawn by one Jackson, on the defendants at San Francisco, and soon after the letter was deposited with the defendants for transmission to Sacramento, Jackson became insolvent and left the country, leaving no funds in the hands of the defendants for the payment of the check.

The original complaint was demurred to, and the demurrer was sustained. The plaintiff filed an amended complaint, which was also demurred to. The Court overruled the demurrer, and this is assigned for error. It is objected that the complaint should have averred that Jackson had sufficient funds in the hands of the defendants at the time he drew the draft to pay the same, and that the averment of Jackson's solvency at the time is not sufficient. The plaintiff avers in his amended complaint that the draft was worth the sum of nine hundred and thirty-four dollars—the amount he paid for it. Where property sued for is a chose in action, as a bill, note, or other security for the payment of money, the measure of damages is prima facie the amount due on the security; the defendant being at liberty to reduce that valuation by evidence showing payment, the insolvency of the maker, or any fact tending to invalidate the security. (Sedgwick on Damages, 488.) We think the statement of the value of the draft in the complaint would be sufficient, if it had stated the sum for which it was drawn; but in the absence of any averment that it was drawn for any sum, the mere averment that it was "valuable," or of a certain value, is insufficient.

It is further objected that the draft is not sufficiently described in the amended complaint. The description is as follows: "A valuable draft or writing drawn by John Q. Jackson on Wells, Fargo & Co., at San Francisco." Neither the date or amount of the draft is stated, or the time when it was payable, or to whom it was payable. The defendants were entitled to such a description as would clearly identify the draft in question, and in this respect the averments in the complaint are clearly insufficient. The Court therefore erred in overruling the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

People v. Todd.

THE PEOPLE v. TODD.

AN act of the Legislature legalizing assessments for taxes for the fiscal year ending on the first day of March, is not void because the Constitution provides that the fiscal year shall commence on the first day of July, but the word "fiscal" in the act, may be treated as surplusage.

A complaint in an action to recover unpaid taxes is sufficient if it avers "that certain sums are due for certain taxes levied in the year 1858, upon certain real estate assessed in the year 1858," without stating that these taxes were levied under an assessment ending on the first day of March, 1858.

The addition of five per cent. imposed by Act of 1858, on the third Monday in October, upon the taxes of delinquents, may be recovered in the action, along with the unpaid taxes, as well as the cost of advertising.

Where an act of the Legislature provides that taxes which have been remitted by the Board of Supervisors shall be exempt from its provisions, it is not necessary to aver in the complaint that the taxes sued for have not been remitted; but that fact, if it exists, should be pleaded in bar of the action.

Courts have no power to go behind assessments legalized and confirmed by an act of the Legislature, to inquire into alleged errors and irregularities in the assessment.

APPEAL from the Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

O. C. Pratt, for Appellant.

No assessment of taxes known to the laws of California, whether for State or other purposes, upon property, whether personal or real, were legalized, and confirmed, and rendered valid and binding against the persons assessed, by the act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Collection of Delinquent Taxes in the County of Butte," approved April 5th, 1861. That act was special, and confined in its terms to assessments of taxes upon property for the fiscal years ending on the first days of March for the respective years 1858, 1859, and 1860. There is no fiscal year known to the laws of California, ending on the first day of March in any year. Sec. 8, Art. 11 of the State Constitution, provides that "the fiscal year shall commence on the first day of July;" and as a consequence, no fiscal year can end on the first day of March.

The complaint counts upon a supposed cause of action under the special act approved April 5th, 1861, which professes only to legalize the assessments of taxes for "fiscal years" ending at particular and impossible dates under the Constitution; and it would be equally faulty if the facts contained in it were those provided for in the general act on the same subject, approved May 17th, 1861. (See Stat. 1861, 92, 471.) Both provide for rendering valid that which never had entity of any kind.

George Cadwalader, also for Appellant.

F. M. Pixley, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover delinquent taxes, brought under an act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Collection of Delinquent Taxes in the County of Butte," approved April 5th, 1861 (Stat. 1861, 92). The defendant demurred to the complaint, the Court overruled the demurrer, the defendant declined to answer, and judgment was rendered accordingly against him, from which he appeals.

Section 1 of the act in question legalizes and confirms the assessment for taxes on all property "for the fiscal year ending on the first day of March, 1858, and for the fiscal year ending on the first day of March, 1859, and for the fiscal year ending on the first day of March, 1860." The appellant insists that no assessments for taxes were legalized by this act, because, as he contends, there is no fiscal year known to the laws of California ending on the first day of March of any year, and the State Constitution provides that "the fiscal year shall commence on the first day of July." We would not be justified in holding this statute void because it uses the term "fiscal" in an inappropriate manner. On the contrary, if necessary, it would be more appropriate to treat the word "fiscal" as surplusage, and thus give the statute full effect. The general revenue law in force at the time these taxes were levied provided that the Assessor should commence assessing property for taxes on the first Monday of March of each year, and it is evident that the statute intended to refer to this period of time in legalizing the yearly assessments referred to. The mere fact that it terms these yearly periods of time "fiscal" years, certainly would not have the effect of invalidating the law. They had the right and power to designate these yearly periods of time by any term they might see fit, which would convey their meaning and intention, and there can be no valid objection to their using the term "fiscal" for that purpose.

The second section of the act in question authorizes the District Attorney to commence civil actions "to recover the unpaid taxes in said county for the fiscal years mentioned in the last section." The complaint avers that certain sums were due for certain taxes "levied in the year 1858" upon certain "real estate assessed in the year 1858," describing it. It is contended that no such taxes were provided for in the act, because it does not aver in precise terms that these taxes were levied under an assessment of property "for the fiscal year ending on the first day of March" either of the year 1858, 1859, or 1860. It is only necessary, under our system of practice, to state the facts in a pleading in "ordinary and concise language;" and a pleader is not required to use the precise and specific terms employed by the statute. There is no difficulty in understanding, from the terms used in this pleading, that the action was brought to recover taxes levied upon property assessed for that purpose during the year commencing on the first Monday of March, 1858, and ending on the day preceding the first Monday of March, 1859 — as by the law in force this assessment and levy had to be made during that portion of such yearly period included in the year 1858, and could not be made after that. This objection, therefore, is not valid.

The complaint avers that the taxes sued for "were levied upon and assessed against the following property, belonging to said defendant, in the County of Butte." It is objected that it does not state that the property belonged to or was claimed by the defendant at the time of the assessment. Even if it were necessary to aver that the property belonged to the defendant at the time of the assessment, the complaint states that fact with sufficient certainty. The fair meaning of the language used is substantially to that effect. But we do not wish to be understood as holding that such an averment is necessary; for the general revenue law makes parties in the possession, charge, or control of property, liable for the taxes thereon, whether they own it or not. This objection is therefore overruled.

The complaint contains two items; one being the five per cent imposed by section thirteen of the general revenue law in force in 1858 (Wood's Digest, 618), amounting to forty-one dollars and forty-six cents, and another item of one dollar for advertising. The defendant insists that these items cannot be recovered in action. In the case of The People v. Seymour (16 Cal. 332), which was an action under a law similar to the one we are considering, the same objections were made to the complaint; but the Court affirmed the judgment of the Court below, which included these items, evidently considering them as properly included within the terms of the statute.

The eighth section of the act provides that "all taxes and assessments which were remitted by the Board of Supervisors of Butte County, and which may hereafter be remitted, shall be exempt from the provisions of this act." The appellant contends that the complaint is insufficient, because it contains no averment that the taxes sued for were not remitted by the Board of Supervisors. This objection is not tenable. If the taxes had been wholly or in part remitted, that fact could and should have been pleaded in bar of the action.

It is also contended that the description of the real estate in the complaint shows that a portion of it lies in the County of Colusa, and therefore the action will not lie. As we have already shown, the complaint sufficiently avers that the property belonged to the defendant at the time of the assessment, and if it is true that a portion of the property thus assessed lay in the County of Colusa, and therefore is not taxable in Butte County, he could have applied to the Board of Equalization and had the error corrected. The assessment having been made in Butte County, the act in question legalizes and confirms the assessment, and makes it "valid and binding, both in law and equity." We do not think the Courts have the power to go behind assessments thus declared legal and binding, and inquire into alleged errors and irregularities in the assessment, especially where the defendant has neglected to have such errors and irregularities corrected by the proper tribunal provided by law for that purpose.

The judgment is affirmed.

Hayes v. Wells, Fargo & Co.

HAYES v. WELLS, FARGO & CO.

Common carriers, who are engaged in the transmission and delivery of letters inclosed in envelopes, are not liable for any article of special value inclosed within the envelope, or for any loss beyond that of an ordinary letter, unless informed at the time they received the letter for transmission of the value of the same.

APPEAL from the Fourth District Court, City and County of San Francisco.

The complaint avers that defendants, at their office in San José, California, received from the plaintiff a letter containing a check or draft of the value of seven hundred and ninety-two dollars and ten cents; such letter and check being inclosed in an envelope, sealed, and properly addressed to H. M. Newhall & Co., of San Francisco, California. That at the time of the receipt of such letter and check by defendants, the plaintiff paid them ten cents as hire for the transportation and delivery of such letter and check to the persons to whom the same were addressed, that being the amount demanded for such service; no disclosure having been asked by defendants or made by the plaintiff of the value of the contents of the letter or envelope. The complaint further avers, that through the negligence or fault of defendants, such letter and contents were not delivered to the person to whom the same were addressed and the check made payable, but were delivered to a person not authorized to receive the same, and that the money was drawn by such person, and thus wholly lost to plaintiff.

The answer admitted "that defendants were common carriers, and as such engaged in transmitting and delivering letters, etc., for hire." It further averred "that plaintiff, at the time when he delivered the letter to defendants, knew that although they (defendants) received and assumed to transmit and deliver ordinary business letters of advice and information, within the State of California, at the rate of ten cents each, still that they did not assume, nor ever have assumed to transmit and deliver such letters with valuable inclosures at the rate of ten cents each, but to charge for such letters in proportion to the value of the articles inclosed." And further, "that the custom of these defendants is and always has been to discharge their contract for the delivery of such ordinary business letters, by delivering them at the place of business or of residence of the person to whom they were addressed, by throwing them upon the counter, dropping them into the letter-box, or even putting them under the door, and in like manner, without attempting to make a personal delivery thereof to any person. But in regard to other letters and packages purporting to contain valuable inclosures, it has always been the custom of defendants to register such letters and packages, deliver them personally to the person to whom they were addressed, take his receipt therefor, and take all other precautions called for by the value of the letter or package."

The answer further alleged: "That plaintiff knew the matters of fact above stated, and that he did not disclose to these defendants or to any of their agents the fact that his letter contained an inclosure of great value, nor offer to pay these defendants a hire proportioned to the risk and value of such inclosure."

Henry B. Jones, for Appellants.

The plaintiff having made a prima facie case of gross negligence or wrong delivery, the defense interposed is no bar to this action being maintained. Such a prima facie case is made "when defendants refuse to deliver the goods, and fail to suggest any grounds for such refusal, or give any explanation of their conduct." (Newstadt v. Adams, 5 Duer; Beardslie v. Richardson, 11 Wend. 25; A. & A. on Carriers, Sec. 38, note 4, Ed. 1857.) The plaintiff was not bound to disclose the contents of the envelope or its value, no questions being asked by defendants. "Fraud cannot be imputed to the owner from the mere fact that he delivered the goods after having seen a general notice published by the carrier, whatever may be its purport. If the carrier wishes to ascertain the extent of his risk, he should inquire at the time the goods are delivered." (Hollister v. Nowlan, 19 Wend. 218, and authorities there cited; Story on Bail, 5th Ed. 586, 588; Philips v. Earle, 8 Pick. 182.)

The rule of the common law in respect to disclosure is well settled; exceptions were made to it by the passage of the Statute 2 William, 4, Chap. 68 (quoted at length in Edwards on Bail— ments, 480). This statute was passed in 1830, and it is said that "While under its provisions the carrier is relieved from responsibility for parcels and packages of the articles enumerated in that statute, unless their value and contents are declared in the act of delivery, and a proper compensation paid for their carriage, it is to be observed that his duties in other respects remain unaltered." The common law, in the absence of statute law, is the rule in this State. (Stat. of 1850, 219.)

Saunders, Dwinelle & Hepburn, for Respondents.

The cases on the subject of the liability of common carriers are resolved by analysis into two classes.

1. When the common carrier, undertaking to receive and transport goods for hire, receives packages containing goods of large value, but still answering the description of goods. Here it is held, that mere silence as to the large value of the goods is not a fraud on the part of the shipper. Such were the cases of Philips v. Earle (8 Pick. 182); Orange County Bank v. Brown (9 Wend. 85); and see Story on Bail. Secs. 565-569.

2. Where the shipper, pretending to ship goods, secretly places in the package some other article of large value, which does not answer the description of the goods, such as money, bills of exchange, diamonds, jewelry, etc., this is held to be a fraud on the common carrier, as being an attempt to bind him to a contract which he did not make. Such were the cases: (Orange County Bank v. Brown, 9 Wend. 85; Sewell v. Adams, 6 Id. 335; Story on Bail. Secs. 565, 565 a, 566; Gibbon v. Paynton, 4 Burr. 2298.)

The following cases are not in point for the purpose for which they are cited by the appellant: (Hollister v. Nowlan, 19 Wend. 234; N. J. Nav. Co. v. Merchants Bank, 6 How. 344; Cole v. Goodwin, 19 Wend. 251; Gould v. Hill, 2 Hill, 623; Atwood v. Reliance Trans. Co., 9 Watts, 87; Moses v. Boston & M. R. Road, 32 N. H. 523.) They go to show only that there are certain responsibilities which enter into the definition of the term "common carrier," from which persons following that occupation cannot divest themselves. They are not authority to the effect that common carriers cannot charge rates for transportation which are proportioned to the value and risk of the packages transported. On the contrary, the case of Hollister v. Nowlan (19 Wend. 284) is authority for the contrary proposition.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NOXON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages for the failure of the defendants to transport and deliver a letter, containing a check for seven hundred and ninety-two dollars, received from the plaintiff at their office in San José, inclosed in a sealed letter envelope, addressed to H. M. Newhall & Co., San Francisco. The defendants do not appear to have been informed that the sealed envelope contained the check. It appears also that the envelope with its contents was not delivered to the persons to whom it was addressed, but by some means came to the hands of a person not authorized to receive it, who drew the money on the check, and the plaintiff therefore claims that he is entitled to recover the value of the check as damages. The case was tried by a jury, who found for the defendants, and a judgment was rendered in their favor, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The defendants are extensively engaged in the transportation of letters and packages of goods, and as such are common carriers, and subject to all the duties and responsibilities of common carriers. The general rule of law is well settled, that common carriers must take care at their peril, that goods placed in their charge for transportation are delivered to the right person; for otherwise they will become responsible. (Story on Bailments, Sec. 543-545 b, Angell on Car. Secs. 297, 324-326; Edwards on Bailments, 515.) But, while such is the general rule, the question as to what will constitute a delivery by which the responsibility of the carrier will cease, depends upon a variety of circumstances: such as the custom of particular places, the usage of particular trades, the manner of transacting business by different classes of carriers, their different means of transportation, and often upon special or implied contracts between the parties. Any local or special custom or usage upon the subject will govern as an implied term in the contract between the parties. Thus, while a carrier by the ordinary means of land conveyance will be required to deliver goods transported by him to the person entitled thereto, either at his place of business or residence, a carrier whose means of conveyance is by water will only, as a general rule, be required to deliver property at the proper wharf or landing; or if a railroad, at the proper depot. The mode in which the defendants transact their business, however, makes it their duty to deliver letters and packages to the owner at his place of business or residence, according to the character of the articles. This delivery must be either to the party to whom the letter or package is addressed in person, or to some agent, clerk, or employé authorized by him to receive the same. This will often depend upon the established mode or custom of doing business between the carrier and his customers. What that mode or custom was as between the defendants and Newhall & Co., does not appear in the evidence. The defendants in this case failed to deliver the letter in question, either to the person to whom it was directed, or to any other person authorized to receive it.

The degree of care and diligence which a carrier is bound to bestow upon property intrusted to him for transportation, depends upon its value and quality. Thus he will be required to exercise greater care and diligence in the preservation and safe delivery of a box of coin than a keg of nails, and of glassware than of bar iron. The value of the article especially is an important ingredient in considering the question of negligence; for that will be gross negligence in the case of a parcel of great value, which would not be in the case of a common article of little value. (Angell on Carriers, Sec. 8.) The general rule in the case of carriers is that they are bound to use ordinary diligence, and are liable for ordinary neglect; that is, they must take such care of the property intrusted to them as every prudent and intelligent man commonly takes of his own goods. (Id. Sec. 11.)

When the carrier is unable to ascertain the value of the goods intrusted to his care, from the appearance of the package, a question has arisen whether he must inquire its value, or whether the person employing him must inform him of the value, when it is of some great or peculiar value, which is not disclosed by the appearance of the package itself. The carrier has no right to open a letter or package intrusted to him for transportation, in order to inform himself of the quality or value of its contents. How, then, is he to obtain the necessary information to enable him to exercise that care and diligence which the law requires of him — which, as we have shown, depends to a great extent upon the article itself? It is the duty of every person sending goods to make use of no fraud or artifice to deceive or mislead the carrier, so as to increase the risk, or to lessen his care and diligence. If any fraud or unfair concealment is used, the carrier will not be responsible for any loss, and it will make the contract between them null and void. This rule applies to all cases of concealment or suppression of facts, and to all false statements made by the employer for the purpose of misleading the carrier. (Story on Bailments, Sec. 565.)

Still, the general rule has been held to be that the employer is under no obligation to inform the carrier of the value of the property; and the mere fact that he does not do so, in the absence of any attempt or act to mislead or deceive him as to the value, will not, as a general rule, affect the legal liability and responsibility of the carrier. But it is also held, as a general rule, that the carrier has a right to inquire as to the value and character of the property, and to have a correct answer. If he is deceived in any way, or a false answer is given, in such case he will not be responsible for any loss. It has also been held, as a general rule, that "if he makes no inquiry, and no artifice is made use of to mislead him, then he is responsible for any loss, however great the value may be." (Id. Sec. 567.)

These rules were adopted in cases where the articles transported were goods of the kind ordinarily transported by carriers, before the more modern changes in the modes of doing mercantile business. But recently a new kind of business has grown up in connection with the carriage of goods, and that is, the transmission of letters put up in sealed envelopes, which has become a most important branch of the express business of the country. It is an important question whether this rule, making it the duty of the carrier to inquire as to the value, properly applies to that branch of the business. There are some good reasons for the rule in the case of ordinary packages of goods, which are from necessity received personally by the carrier or his servants. But those reasons do not apply to the receipt and transmission of letters. The evidence in this case shows, what is generally known to be the case, that the greater portion of such letters are received by the letter-carriers in boxes, placed either in their own business houses or in different localities convenient to business men in the larger cities; and it is only a very small portion of the letters that are ever received by the carriers or their employés in person. This plan of doing business has become necessary, for the speedy transaction of business and the convenience of the public. With the thousands of letters daily received and transmitted by letter-carriers, it would be almost an impossibility for the carrier to make the inquiry as to the value of the contents of each letter received by them. The law does not require impossibilities, or attempt to deprive the public of the means necessary for the convenient, safe, and speedy transmission of their letters. On the contrary, it will adapt its rules to the new and varying systems of business, so that justice may be done to all parties. Where the reason ceases, the rule ceases. We are satisfied that this rule should be so far modified as to except letters from its application, and relieve the carrier from the necessity of making the inquiry of the value of the contents of letters received by him; making it the duty of the person employing the carrier to inform him of such value, in all cases where he desires to hold the latter responsible for any loss beyond that of an ordinary letter not containing articles or papers of special value. Where he does not desire to hold the carrier responsible, by withholding the information he assumes the risk, and avoids the payment of the extra compensation the carrier would be entitled to demand. By adopting this rule, the question is relieved of many of its difficulties, and no hardship or improper burden is imposed upon either party. Upon giving this notice of the value of the letter, the carrier can advise the employer of the compensation he requires for assuming the care of the letter, and the responsibility for its safe transmission and delivery to the proper person. If he demands no extra compensation beyond that for an ordinary letter, he will still be bound by all the duties and liabilities of a common carrier. By means of the notice, the carrier will be required to use such kind of care and diligence in the performance of his duties as the law demands in cases of that kind, where articles of value are placed in his charge. It has been a mooted question as to how far one party may innocently be silent as to any matters which may form ingredients in directing the judgment of the other contracting party; and a very able writer on the subject of bailments maintains the necessity of a full disclosure of all the facts. (Jones on Bailments, Sec. 38; Story on Bailments, Sec. 566.) But the authorities have settled the general rule as before stated; and that rule we would not disturb in cases where it is properly applicable.

The evidence in this case shows that it is the custom and usage of the defendants to receive, transmit, and deliver letters specially intrusted to them as valuable, in a mode different from ordinary ones; and that they make an extra charge for so doing, depending upon the value of the letter, as a compensation for the extra trouble and risk. By that mode, great pains are taken to deliver the letter to the proper person, taking his receipt therefor, which is not done with ordinary letters. But the evidence leaves it uncertain whether the plaintiff knew of this difference in the mode of carrying and delivering the different kinds of letters. Under the view we have taken of the rights and duties of the parties, it was immaterial whether he had notice or not; as it was the duty of the plaintiff to inform the agent of the defendant of the contents of the letter, so far as it contained any article of special value.

It is a general rule in the law of bailments, that, if the plaintiff has brought the injury on himself, or has been guilty of negligence, and that negligence in any way concurred in causing the loss or damage, he is not entitled to recover. This rule is most frequently applied to cases of damage occasioned by obstructions in a highway, to collisions between carriages upon land and vessels upon water. (Angell on Carriers, Secs. 556-562, 636.) It also applies to common carriers, who are not held responsible for damages caused by the neglect of their employer. (Story on Bailments, Secs. 492, 563.) It also applies to innkeepers. (2 Hilliard on Torts, 617, 618.) In this case, the evidence shows that the plaintiff is an intelligent business man, yet he sent the check in question, indorsed by himself, in blank—thus leaving it in the power of any person, who might get possession of it improperly, to draw the money; whereas, if it had been indorsed payable to the order of the firm to whom it was sent, the money could not have been drawn by an unauthorized person without forging the names of the indorsers; and, if the money had been paid on such forged indorsement, the drawees could have been compelled to repay it to the person really entitled to it. This was gross carelessness and culpable negligence on the part of the plaintiff. If he had used but ordinary care and the precautions usual in such cases, in indorsing the check, the probability is that no loss or injury would have occurred.

The judgment is affirmed.

PRESTON v. KEYS et al.

It is not error in a Court to refuse an instruction asked, which assumes a certain fact to exist, respecting which evidence has been introduced before the jury. Where the evidence is conflicting the Appellate Court will not reverse the order of the Court below denying a new trial.

APPEAL from the Seventh Judicial District, Marin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. Skidmore, for Appellant.

John Reynolds, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages caused by cattle driven into the plaintiff's inclosed field by the defendants. It appears that the plaintiff had an outside fence which inclosed about six hundred and sixty-seven acres of land, with some smaller inclosures inside of it. While the outside fence was in process of construction, and before it was completed, the defendant Murphy and one Kehoe erected a house upon a spot now within the large inclosure of the plaintiffs. Afterward Kehoe filed a claim in the County Recorder's office, under the Possessory Act of this State, for a tract of one hundred and sixty acres of land, which was within this large inclosure, and included the house above spoken of. Afterward Kehoe sold his interest in the land to the defendant Murphy. The plaintiff has resided and pastured cattle within the large inclosure ever since the fence was built. The action was tried by a jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which a judgment was duly entered in favor, from which the defendants appeal.

On the trial, the Court refused to give the following instruction, asked for by the defendants, to wit: "If the jury believe that the land now inside of Preston's fence was, previous to June 1st, 1857, when Kehoe built his house, used as a common for the pasture of all the cattle of the neighborhood, and that Kehoe took possession and built a house before Preston inclosed it, the fact that Preston afterward built a fence which took in Kehoe's house will not operate to give Preston the exclusive possession and benefit of the inclosure: but the inclosure caused by the fence will continue as much for the benefit of Kehoe and his assigns as for Preston, because Preston's fence does not divide the possession of the two." The first part of this instruction is correct; but the last part, in italics, is incorrect, and therefore there was no error in refusing the instruction as asked for. Kehoe had no right, title, or interest in the fence built by Preston, nor was he entitled to use it, or claim any benefit from it. So, too, the conveyance of the tract of land by Kehoe to Murphy conveyed no right to, or interest in, this fence built by Preston.

The Court also refused to give the following instruction asked for by the defendants, to wit: "If Kehoe was the first in possession of the land on which he built his house, the fact that Preston afterwards built a fence which took in the land on which Kehoe's house was built will not debar Kehoe and his assigns from the benefit of pasturage around his house, because the fence does not segregate Preston's possessions from the possessions of Kehoe." The record shows that one question raised by the plaintiff at the trial in the Court below, and respecting which he introduced evidence, was as to an alleged abandonment by Kehoe of his claim to the house and land. That question was a pertinent one to the case; for if this possession or claim of Kehoe's had been in fact abandoned, all right to the premises in him or his assignee fell with it, and the defendants could not set up that possession as a defense to this action. This instruction, as asked for by the defendants, entirely ignores this question of abandonment. The mere fact that Kehoe was first in possession of the tract claimed by him did not establish a right claimed under it long afterwards, unless that possession was continuous and had not been abandoned. There was, therefore, no error in denying the instruction as thus framed.

The following instruction, asked for by the defendants, was also refused, to wit: "If the jury believe that Kehoe was prevented from complying with the statute in relation to maintaining possessory actions on public lands by the action of Preston in pulling down his house, and hauling off the materials, and interfering with him, then the jury will find for the defendants in the same manner as though the statute had been complied with." This instruction is objectionable, because it assumes as a fact that Preston had pulled down Kehoe's house and hauled off the materials. This was one of the facts respecting which evidence was given, and it was the province of the jury to determine from the evidence whether such were the facts or not; and it would have been improper for the Court to give an instruction virtually assuming that such facts had been proved.

The action of the Court in not permitting a witness to testify that the plaintiff admitted to him that the land in question was public land, was not prejudicial to the defendants, as the Court afterwards instructed the jury, at the defendants' request, that "all lands in this State are presumed to be public lands of the United States until the contrary is made to appear." The second instruction which was refused, although the rule of law respecting possession was not as fully and accurately stated as it should have been, was substantially correct, and there would have been no impropriety in giving it. Still there does not seem to have been any question that the plaintiff's outside fence constituted an inclosure within the rules of law, at the time of the alleged trespass on which this action is founded. The Court gave other instructions, defining what constituted actual possession and what did not, so that the defendants suffered no injury by the refusal to give this particular one.

The last ground urged by the appellants is, that the verdict was contrary to evidence. The evidence is conflicting in this case, and it was therefore proper for the jury to determine the facts. The verdict has been sustained by the Court in refusing to grant a new trial on this ground. Under these circumstances we do not deem it necessary to enter into an examination of the testimony to determine whether we might have decided differently, sitting as a Judge or juror at the trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCARTY v. FREMONT et al.

THE different causes of action which are allowed by the sixty-fourth section of the Practice Act to be united in one complaint should be separately stated. The owner of real estate has a right to remove a trespasser from his premises, using, however, only so much force as may be necessary for that purpose. If the damages assessed by the verdict of a jury are clearly excessive, and were evidently given under the influence of passion or prejudice, the Appellate Court will grant a new trial.

APPEAL from the Thirteenth Judicial District, Mariposa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

D. W. Perley, for Appellant.

The plaintiff has united several causes of action in his complaint, to wit: Injuries to personal property with injuries to real property. He has also united injuries to his person with injuries to both real and personal property. He has also united with the aforesaid actions, an action for a false imprisonment; which could not be done under the statute. (Pr. Act, Sec. 64; How. N. Y. Code, 284, 287.)

Another defect in the complaint is this: These causes of action, if they could be united, should have been separately stated, and the separate damages alleged for each injury. This was not done, but general damages claimed for all the injuries united. The one hundred and sixty-seventh section of the New York Code is like the sixty-fourth section of the California Code, and the New York authorities are applicable. (How. N. Y. Code, 287; 8 How. Pr. 177; 6 Id. 131; 4 Id. 226.)

McCarty v. Fremont.

Harris, Merritt, & Deering, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages for alleged injuries to the person and property of the plaintiff, and for false imprisonment of the plaintiff's person, for forcibly ejecting him from a house and premises alleged to have been in plaintiff's possession, and keeping him out of the possession thereof. The defendants demurred to the complaint, but it was overruled by the Court. Sec. 64 of the Practice Act provides that the plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint, when they all arise out of certain classes of contracts or injuries as therein stated under seven different heads; the sixth class being injuries to the person, and the seventh, injuries to property. "But the causes of action so united shall all belong to only one of these classes, and shall affect all the parties to the action, and not require different places of trial, and shall be separately stated." In the present case the complaint includes two, if not three, of these several classes; and instead of being separately stated, they are all united in one count. This is a clear violation of the provisions of the Practice Act.

The evidence shows that an old dilapidated building, of little or no value, upon the "Mariposa Ranch," in Mariposa County, owned by the defendant Fremont, had been occupied by some Chinese, as tenants of one Smith, who acted as the agent of one Luce. Fremont, being desirous of erecting a mill and other buildings at that place, made an agreement with Smith, by which the latter authorized him to take possession of the building, upon making arrangement with the Chinese then in possession, which he did, and they soon afterwards, at his request, left the premises. The plaintiff, it seems, rented the building of Smith for a small sum, and when the agents and employés of Fremont went there they found the plaintiff in the building, which was, however, destitute of furniture, claiming possession and refusing to leave. They thereupon forcibly removed him; and for this alleged injury he brought this action, claiming damages in the sum of $7,000. The jury returned a verdict for $1,000 damages, and judgment was rendered accordingly; from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, they take this appeal, and one ground of error assigned is that the damages are excessive. The evidence shows, and it is not controverted, that Fremont was the owner of the land; that the building was erected by one Hammett; that Luce was merely his agent to rent it, and that Hammett had, prior to these transactions, authorized Fremont to take possession. Smith had no authority from Hammett to rent it, nor did Luce have any right to vest such a power in him. It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff had no right to the possession, and was a trespasser in his attempts to obtain the possession. The plaintiff was not, in fact, in possession of the property, but he was attempting to secure the possession when removed by the defendants. Under these circumstances, the defendants had a right to remove him from the premises, using, however, only so much force as was necessary for that purpose. It does not appear that any unnecessary or any serious injury was caused to the plaintiff by their acts. The damages, under these circumstances, even if the plaintiff had been entitled to recover any, are clearly excessive, and were evidently given under the influence of passion and prejudice.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

SKILLMAN v. LACHMAN et al.

When the plaintiff is appellant, and the judgment is for the defendant, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court on appeal is determined by the amount claimed in the complaint.

If the appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in his favor, then the amount in dispute is the difference between the amount of the judgment and the sum claimed by the complaint.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court on appeal is determined by the amount in dispute; and, before the amendments to the Constitution which went into effect in 1863, that amount was any sum exceeding two hundred dollars, exclusive of costs.

If the appeal is taken by the defendant from a judgment in his favor, where he set up a counter claim, the amount in dispute is the difference between the amount of the judgment, exclusive of costs, and the sum claimed in his counter claim. The interest due forms a part of the amount in dispute; and where the principal sum, for which judgment is recovered, is less than two hundred dollars, if the interest added swells the judgment to more than two hundred dollars, the Supreme Court has jurisdiction.

Where the several owners of a mine unite and coöperate in working the same, they form a mining partnership, which is governed by many of the rules relating to ordinary partnerships, but which has some rules peculiar to itself. One of these rules, peculiar to a mining partnership, is, that each owner has a right at any time to sell and convey his interest, and such sale does not dissolve the partnership.

Another of these rules is, that the law does not, in case of a mining partnership, imply any authority, either to a member of such partnership, or to its managing agent, to bind the company or its individual members by a promissory note, or a contract of indebtedness, executed in the name of the company; but it is incumbent on the party claiming to hold the company for such indebtedness to show that the person, executing or contracting the same in the name of the company, had power and authority to do so.

APPEAL from the County Court, Nevada County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

C. Wilson Hill, for Appellant.

The points that arise are these: it being conceded that the members of this mining company are tenants in common, and so found by the Court:

1. Can one tenant in common bind his co-tenants, or, rather, make contracts, like the present, binding them without their authority or consent?

2. Would representations of defendant, as co-tenant, made before the execution of the note, that he was interested in the mining claims, be sufficient authority to authorize Sprout, his co-tenant, to execute said note so as to bind defendant?

Under the first point, I submit: Partners, by virtue of an agency arising from the relations existing between them as such, may make such contracts; but the relations existing between partners and those between tenants in common are widely distinct.

Skillman v. Lachman.

Among tenants in common there is no community of interest or authority, nor are they agents of each other, unless under special authority delegated to them. (Story on Partnership, Sec. 458.) Tenants in common of mines are considered, both in reference to themselves and to others, as the ordinary owners of the land, working their respective interest of the mines, responsible only for their own acts, subject to no laws of partnership whatever, and possessing distinct rights in the property. (Crawshay v. Maule, 1 Proanst. 523.) As tenants in common and as joint owners in mines, one tenant in common has no authority or power to pledge the credit of the general company; and the fact that one tenant in common has the general management of the mines makes no difference, in the absence of circumstances from which authority for that purpose can be inferred. (Ricketts v. Bennet, 4 C. B. 686; Manning v. Granger & Scott, 17 Law Jurist, C. P., 17.)

Thomas P. Hawley, for Respondent.

Does the finding of facts support the judgment? The Court finds, that Sprout was a member, and foreman, of the Gold Hill Company, and that he was authorized to execute a company note for the debts of the company. Also, that the note sued upon was by said Sprout, executed in said capacity, and given for a company debt. Now, if Sprout was authorized (and there is no doubt on the point) to execute this note for the company, then it is only necessary to see whether D. Lachman was a member, or can be holden as a member, of said company.

The counsel for appellants goes behind the facts found by the Court, and contends that a tenant in common cannot, without authority from his co-tenant, bind such co-tenant by note; ergo, that Sprout could not bind Lachman by the note executed to Skillman.

I am perfectly willing to concede, that one tenant in common cannot, from that fact alone, bind his co-tenant by contract; but, with all due respect to the opinions of the learned counsel for appellant, I must frankly admit my inability to see its application in the present case.

It is apparent from the evidence, as well as from the facts found by the learned Judge, that the owners of certain mining ground had thrown their several interests together, and formed a mining company known as the Gold Hill Company. Hence, we here find not only tenancy in common, but, more than this, we find the interests of the several owners thrown together for the conducting of a certain business—that of mining—for the common profit of all. We find the owners no longer representing their several interests as individuals, but we find those interests associated together in a mining partnership, under the name “Gold Hill Company”; and we find W. P. Sprout inducted as managing partner and foreman of said company, employing workmen, purchasing materials, giving the notes and due-bills of said company for company indebtedness, and transacting the whole business of said Gold Hill Company, with the acquiescence, consent, and approval of said company.

The working of a mine may be the subject of a partnership, and such partnership is subject to all the rules governing partnerships. (Collyer on Partnership, Sec. 165; Story on Partnership, Sec. 82; Collyer on Mines, 58; Rockwell on Mines, 574.)

The fact that the partnership was formed for the purpose of deriving profit from real estate by working the mines therein, coupled with the appointment of Sprout as the agent for the conduct of said business, would be sufficient to authorize Sprout to bind the company by note.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring, and COPE, C. J. concurring specially.

This is an action upon a promissory note for one hundred and two dollars, with interest at three per cent. per month, against the defendants, as members of the “Gold Hill Company,” originally brought before a Justice of the Peace, where a judgment was rendered against the defendants, from which they appealed to the County Court, where judgment was again rendered against them for two hundred and sixty dollars and forty-six cents, besides costs, that sum being the principal and interest of the note, and from which they appeal to this Court.

The respondent contends that as the note was for the sum of one hundred and two dollars only, this Court has no jurisdiction of the case. Where the plaintiff is appellant, and the judgment is for the defendant, the jurisdiction of this Court is determined by the amount claimed by the complaint, for that is the "amount in dispute" in such cases. (Gillespie v. Benson, 18 Cal. 410; Votan v. Reese, 20 Id. 89.) But if the appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in his favor, then the "amount in dispute" is the difference between the amount of the judgment and the sum claimed by the complaint. (Votan v. Reese, 20 Cal. 89.) So, upon the same principle, if the appeal is taken by the defendant from a judgment rendered against him for a sum exceeding two hundred dollars, exclusive of costs and per centage, this Court has jurisdiction of the case, because the amount of the judgment is the "amount in dispute" on the appeal. So, too, of the appeal is taken by the defendant from a judgment in his favor, where he has set up a counter claim, if that judgment is for a sum more than two hundred dollars less than he claims in his answer, this Court has jurisdiction. The respondent contends, however, that the interest due on the demand, forms no part of the amount to be included in the estimate of the "amount in dispute." In this he is mistaken. The interest forms part of the demand sued for, and should properly be included in the estimate. It follows that the objection to the jurisdiction of this Court is not well taken.

The transcript in this case is very imperfect—neither the note sued on nor the pleadings are inserted in it. It appears, however, that the plaintiff furnished the "Gold Hill Company" (a company of persons who were working a mine together) with a quantity of lumber, for which the note was given, and which was signed, as follows: "H. P. Sprout, Foreman for Gold Hill Company." When the note was offered in evidence in the County Court, the defendants objected that it was the note of Sprout, and not of the company, which was overruled and excepted to. Judging from the signature it would appear to be the note of Sprout alone, and the words "Foreman for Gold Hill Company" are merely descriptio personæ; but the terms of the note itself may show that it was, in fact, intended to be the note of the company. This point we cannot determine, as the note does not appear in the transcript.

The principal point raised by the appellant is that the owners of the claim are tenants in common and not partners, that Sprout was one of the owners, and that one co-tenant cannot bind his co-tenants by a note given in the name of the company. This question of the relation which exists between persons owning several interests in a mine, and engaged in working the same, is a very important one. Whatever may be the rights and liabilities of tenants in common of a mine not being worked, it is clear that where the several owners unite and coöperate in working the mine, then a new relation exists between them, and, to a certain extent, they are governed by the rules relating to partnerships. They form what is termed a mining partnership, which is governed by many of the rules relating to ordinary partnerships, but which has also some rules peculiar to itself—one of which is that one person may convey his interest in the mine and business, without dissolving the partnership. (Ferreday v. Wightwick, 1 Russ. & Mylne, 49.) Still, there may be a partnership in the working of a mine, subject to the rules relating to an ordinary partnership in trade. (Story on Part. Sec. 82.) And this relation of partnership may be constituted either by express stipulation or by implication deduced from the acts of the parties. (Rockw. on Mines, 575.) But in the case of an ordinary mining partnership, something more will be required to raise the presumption of liability arising from persons holding themselves out to the world as partners than would be necessary in the case of an ordinary partnership. Such persons, in the absence of other circumstances, cannot fairly be presumed to have intended to render themselves liable to all the consequences of a commercial partnership. (Id.) The same author concludes his examination of this question, as follows: "If the works are carried on by persons as mere owners of land, concurring in a general system of management for their common benefit, the shares of each person will only be liable for his individual engagement, and to the payment of debts contracted by himself, or his authorized agent, without interfering with the shares of the other tenants in common." (Id. 579.)

There have been several decisions relative to the rights and liabilities of shareholders in mining companies to the public and among themselves, which it may be well to examine. In the case of Vice v. Lady Anson (7 B. & C. 409), which was an action for goods sold and materials furnished for working a mine, in which the defendant held one share, evidenced only by certificate issued by the secretary of the company, the plaintiff, at the time he furnished the goods, had no knowledge that she was a shareholder. She had paid the deposit on some shares, and had spoken and written of herself (in private letters) as a shareholder of the company. The Judge held that the plaintiff did not actually give credit to the defendant, and was not misled by her, and that she never held herself out to the world as a partner, and therefore she could only be chargeable on the ground of being really interested. The fact that she thought she had an interest did not make her interested; and he held that the certificate conveyed no interest in the mine, and therefore she was not liable. The correctness of this decision, that it was necessary to prove a conveyance of an interest in the mine, has been doubted.

The case of Dickinson v. Valpy (10 B. & C. 128), was an action by an indorsee of a bill of exchange, drawn and accepted by a mining company, against the defendant as a member of the company. The defendant had applied for and obtained shares in the company, on which he had paid several installments. The business of the company was transacted by a Board of Directors, and the bill had been drawn and accepted in pursuance of a resolution passed by them. It was held necessary for the plaintiff to show that the directors had power to bind the shareholders by drawing bills of exchange; and for that purpose, evidence should have been given of the nature and character of the business of the company, to show that in order to carry into effect the purposes for which it was instituted the drawing and accepting of bills was necessary, or to show from the practice of similar companies that it was usual to draw such bills. It was also held, that although in ordinary trading partnerships the law implied that one partner had power to bind another by drawing and accepting bills, yet that rule did not apply to mining partnerships, without showing that it was necessary to carry on its business.

In Judson v. Bourne (6 M. & W. 461), it was held that the members of a mining company have authority by law (in the absence of any proof of a more limited authority), to bind each other by dealings on credit for the purpose of working the mines, if that appears to be necessary or usual in the management of the mines. In Hawtayne v. Bourne (7 M. & W. 595), the managing agent of the mining company had borrowed money from a bank to pay debts due to laborers who had levied distress warrants upon the materials of the mine, and it was held that there was no rule of law that such an agent could, even in case of an emergency suddenly arising, raise money and pledge the credit of his principals for its repayment; that the authority of the agent was only that he should conduct and carry on the affairs of the mine in the usual manner, and there was no proof of express authority to borrow money, or that it was necessary in the ordinary course of the undertaking.

A joint stock company was formed to work a mine, in which the defendant became a shareholder, and took part in its proceedings. The prospectus, issued on the formation of the company, stated that all supplies for the mine were to be purchased at cash prices, and no debt was to be incurred; and the scrip certificates also bore an indorsement to the same effect. The plaintiff supplied goods for the necessary working of the mine, on the order of a resident agent appointed by the directors to manage the mine, which was the customary course in such concerns: held, that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the price of such goods, notwithstanding the statements in the prospectus and certificates, unless it were shown that the agent had, in fact, no authority from the defendant, and that the plaintiff had notice thereof. (Hawkin v. Bourne, 8 M. & W. 703.)

Where a defendant is charged with a debt in an action for work and labor as a partner in a mining company, but is not shown to have either contracted such debt personally or represented himself to the plaintiff as a partner, the fact of his having been partner may nevertheless be shown by evidence short of strict proof that he had executed a deed of copartnership, or was legally interested in the mine. The fact may be proved by his admission made before or after the debt was incurred. (Ralph v. Harvey, 1 Q. B. 845.) One of several co-adventurers in a mine has not, as such, any authority to pledge the credit of the general body for money borrowed for the purposes of the concern. And the fact of his having the general management of the mine makes no difference, in the absence of circumstances from which an implied authority for that purpose can be inferred. (Ricketts v. Burnett, 4 Q. B. 686.)

Such is the uncertainty of mining operations that few are willing to risk all their means in such undertakings; and it is therefore customary for a number of persons to unite in the enterprise; and often the interests owned by each differ greatly in amount, according as each is able to furnish means, or is willing to take the risk. As a general rule, it is impracticable for each proprietor to work his interest in the mine separate from the others; hence arises the necessity for an organization of some kind to work the mine, such as a corporation, joint stock company, or mining partnership. The company in the present case is one of the latter class. As each owner has a right to sell and convey his interest at any time, and as, in ordinary partnerships, such sale would dissolve the partnership, and compel a winding up and settlement of the business, which would be most disastrous to a mining enterprise, it has become an established principle that such sale does not dissolve a mining partnership, but it continues on as before. Such a radical change in the law of partnership necessitates other changes. One result is, that new members are thus introduced into the company without the consent, and often against the wishes, of the other members; and it would be most unjust to subject each proprietor to personal liabilities, which might sweep away all his property, created against his consent, by those who became members against his wishes. Hence arises the necessity of establishing new rules for such partnerships, differing from those regulating ordinary partnerships, especially those relating to the power of any one member, or a majority of the members, or of the Superintendent or managing agent, to make contracts binding upon the company or its members, and also regulating the extent and nature of the liability of each proprietor for the company debts, as between themselves and third persons. The rules regulating ordinary partnerships will, to some extent, form a proper guide, but do not necessarily determine these questions. It is impossible to lay down a perfect code of rules upon this subject; but, like other legal rules, they must be settled as they arise in cases requiring their determination. Such rules must be governed by the peculiar condition and circumstances of the country, and must be founded upon sound principles of justice, and such as will protect the rights of individual proprietors against the unauthorized acts of others, and at the same time properly secure the claims of creditors and insure the successful working of the mine.

In the present case it appears that the defendant Lachman, for a long time prior and up to June 25th, 1858, held a mortgage on the interest in the mine of one Prior; that on that day he took a conveyance of that interest in satisfaction of the mortgage, and conveyed the same interest to one of the defendants, Sprout, on the twenty-eighth day of June, and received a mortgage on Sprout's interest in the mine to secure the payment of the purchase money. This appears to be, in fact, all the interest he had; but it was proved that both prior to and after the date of the note, which was dated June 20th, he admitted to two persons, one of whom was a brother of the plaintiff, and who delivered most of the lumber, that he owned an interest in the mine. It does not appear that any of these statements of Lachman were the means of inducing the plaintiff to sell or deliver the lumber. These statements of the defendant Lachman do not operate as an estoppel upon him, unless it appears that the plaintiff was induced thereby to sell and deliver the lumber to the company. Neither the evidence nor the findings of the Court contain any facts or evidence establishing this point.

But there is still a more important objection to the findings and judgment in this case. There was no evidence of any authority having been given by the company, or Lachman, to Sprout, a member of the company and the managing agent or foreman, to execute a promissory note in the name of and binding the company for the indebtedness due the plaintiff, or any general authority to that effect. In fact, several members, including Lachman, testified that they never gave him any such authority. It is clear that the law does not, in the case of mining partnerships, imply any such authority either to a member of such partnership or to its managing agent. In this respect the rule of law is different from that of ordinary commercial partnerships. It was clearly the duty of the plaintiff to prove that the person executing the note in the name of the company had power and authority to do so. He might have had power to purchase the lumber for the use of the mine, but that is very different from authorizing him to execute a note in the name of the company, bearing interest at the rate of three per cent. per month. In this case the County Court failed to draw the proper distinction between the liability of members of a mining partnership and ordinary trading partnerships, and in this it erred.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

COPE, C. J.—I think the conclusion arrived at by the Justice, CROCKER, is correct, and I therefore concur in the judgment.

TIBBETTS v. MOORE et al.

A MECHANIC'S lien which describes the property as a "quartz mill, being at or near the town of Scottsville, in Amador County, known as 'Moore's New Quartz Mill,'" contains a sufficient description to hold the property, where there is no evidence that there was any other quartz mill at the place so designated as to render it uncertain which was intended.

Where the lien describes the land around the building, on which a lien is claimed. In these words, "with such convenient space of land around the same as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof," the description is also sufficient; but it is proper for the Court by its decree to define the amount and extent of the land connected with the building which is properly subject to the lien; and if the decree follows the description in the lien, it is doubtful whether the purchaser will acquire any land beyond that covered by the building.

The lien of a material man accrues at the time he has the materials, which he has contracted to furnish, ready for delivery at the place where he has agreed to deliver them.

When a mechanic or material man commences proceedings to foreclose a lien, and publishes notice in accordance with the statute, for all persons holding and claiming liens to appear in Court and exhibit the same with their proofs, the exhibit of proofs of liens by lienholders, coming in under the notice, is not governed by the sections of the Practice Act relating to interventions, and the papers filed by them are not governed by the strict rules relating to pleadings in ordinary actions.

Where the notice of lien states that the materials were furnished to A. & Co., when in fact they were furnished to A, this does not invalidate the lien, for the material fact is, whether the materials were furnished for and used in the construction of the building on which the lien is claimed.

Tibbetts v. Moore.

a, the owner of a quartz mill in Amador County, executed a mortgage on the same to B. Afterwards, A purchased at Sacramento a steam engine and boiler, and, to secure the purchase money, executed to C a chattel mortgage on the same, and then transported them to Amador and placed them in the quartz mill, so that they became a part of the realty: held, that C's mortgage on the steam engine and boiler had priority over the mortgage of B.

APPEAL from the Sixteenth Judicial District, Amador County.

Moore, the mortgagor, purchased the steam engine spoken of in the opinion, of Lambard, its manufacturer, in Sacramento City.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John W. Armstrong, for Appellants.

The notice of lien did not correctly describe the property to be charged with the lien.

The law requires that the premises on which the building is situated should be described correctly (Wood's Dig. 1059, Sec. 2), with certainty and particularity. (Nott's N. Y. Lien Law, 137.)

It is true that the premises are described in the notice as Moore's New Quartz Mill, at or near Scottsville, but this is not sufficient notice of a mechanic's lien (Montrose v. Conner, 8 Cal. 346); yet even if it were sufficient, there is no evidence in the record, nor was there any given at the trial, that the property in controversy was so known at the time the lien was filed, or at any other time.

Premises in a deed must be described by a well known name, and if it is at all sufficient to describe it by name in a notice of lien, it must be done with as much particularity as in a deed — by a well known name. But I think that a description of the property by name is entirely insufficient, because the statute does not give a lien upon the building, and the whole tract of land on which the same is situated, but only on so much of the land as may be necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building (Wood's Dig. 1060, Sec. 4); otherwise third parties dealing with the property cannot know how much of the ground is affected by the lien; they could not know how much ground would be deemed necessary to the convenient use and occupation of the mill. It was evidently the intention of the Legislature to require lien claimants to designate by some means the quantity of land charged with the lien; for a condition precedent to the attaching of the lien is, that a notice of lien containing a correct description of the property to be charged with the lien, should be filed in the Recorder's office of the county where the same is located; and the statute states what quantity of land (and therefore what particular land) shall be charged with the lien. (Wood's Dig. 1060, Sec. 4.)

On the facts as disclosed by the record, was defendant, O. D. Lambard, entitled to a decree that the boiler, engine, etc., should be segregated from the mill and sold separately to satisfy his mortgage, and thus destroy the security of the appellants?

I think not; the record of appellants' mortgage gave notice to all the world from the twenty-second day of October, 1860, that the assignor of the appellants had a lien by mortgage on the mill, land, and machinery in, and to be put into the mill; and therefore, Lambard took his mortgage with notice of the mortgage of appellants and subject thereto. (Wood's Dig. 103, Sec. 25.)

Did not defendant Lambard, lose his lien when he allowed the engine, boiler, etc., to be put into the mill, and become a necessary part of it? I think, as against appellants, he did.

They became fixtures when they were attached to the mill with the consent of Lambard; and if he ever had a lien upon them, he lost it.

It would destroy the whole property to segregate the boiler, engine, etc., and this the law will not allow.

The case of Sands v. Pfeiffer (10 Cal. 263), establishes the doctrine that a boiler, engine, etc., though not in the mill at the time of the execution of the mortgage, but put in soon after, are fixtures and pass to the mortgagee.

The case of Merritt v. Judd (14 Cal. 60), shows that such machinery in a quartz mill are fixtures.

In Winslow v. Merchants' Insurance Co., (4 Met. 306), it is held, that as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, fixtures for trade cannot be removed by mortgagor though put up by mortgagor after the execution of the mortgage.

On examination of the case of Winslow v. Merchants' Insurance Co. (4 Met. 306, 316), it will be seen that the controversy was between a prior mortgagee who had a mortgage on the land and building, and a subsequent mortgagee who had a mortgage on the boiler, engine, etc., which were put into the building after the execution of the first mortgage, as in this case, and there the lien on the boiler, engine, etc., was adjudged in favor of the first mortgage. This case was followed in the case of Butler v. Pope (7 Met. 40), and in the case of Colins v. McLagin (29 Maine, 115.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, notice of which was filed in the Recorder's office, November 24th, 1860, on a quartz mill owned by the defendant Moore, in Amador County, for machinery used in the construction of the mill. Morgan and Weatherwax came in under the published notice, and filed liens on the same property for lumber furnished and labor performed on the mill. Brown and Andrews were made parties, they claiming a lien thereon under a chattel mortgage, executed by Moore to one Mosick, and by Mosick assigned to them. This mortgage bears date October 22d, 1860, was recorded the same day, and includes the quartz lode and the quartz mill then in process of erection, with the boiler, engine, and other machinery used in the mill. Lambard is also made a defendant, he claiming a lien under a chattel mortgage on the boiler, engine, and fixtures connected therewith, executed by Moore on the sixteenth day of November, 1860. The property described in this mortgage was then in Sacramento, where the mortgage was executed, but was afterwards removed to and put up as a part of the fixtures and machinery of the quartz mill. This mortgage was duly recorded in Sacramento County, November 17th, and in Amador County, November 19th. The case was tried by the Court, and a decree rendered that the claim of Lambard was a valid, subsisting lien upon the property described in his mortgage for the sum of eight hundred and twenty-two dollars and five cents; that the mortgage of Brown & Andrews was a valid lien against the property described therein for three thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight dollars and sixty-six cents, and that they have a further lien for two hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-six cents for money paid by them for taxes and other expenses about the property. It was further decreed that the property mentioned in the Lambard mortgage be sold, and out of the proceeds the Sheriff to pay—first, the costs and expenses of the sale; second, the costs and expenses of the action, and the two hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-six cents advanced by Brown & Andrews, if sufficient to pay them and the debt due Lambard; third, to pay the amount due said Lambard; fourth, the overplus, if any, to be added to the proceeds of the sale of the property described in the mechanics' liens. It also decreed that the property described in the mechanics' liens should then be sold, subject to the rights of the purchaser under the Lambard mortgage, and from the proceeds, with any overplus from the first sale, after deducting costs and expenses of sale, to pay to the holders of the mechanics' liens the respective amounts due them under the decree, and if sufficient, to be divided pro rata among them; but if there should be a surplus, the same to be added to the proceeds of the sale of the property described in the Brown & Andrews mortgage. It also decreed, that the property described in the Brown & Andrews mortgage should then be sold, subject to the rights of the purchasers at the two prior sales; and out of the proceeds to pay the amount due on that mortgage, and the overplus, if any, to the defendant Moore; and in case of a deficiency in the payment of said several debts, judgment to be entered for such deficiency against him, and that executions issue thereon. From this decree Brown & Andrews alone appeal.

The first point urged is, that the notice of lien filed by the plaintiff Tibbetts, does not correctly or sufficiently describe the property sought to be charged with the lien. It is described as a "Quartz mill, being at or near the Town of Scottsville in Amador County, known as Moore's New Quartz Mill." There was no evidence that there was any other quartz mill at that place so designated as to render it uncertain which was intended. The description we deem sufficient to identify the property and uphold the lien. (Hotaling v. Cronise, 2 Cal. 63.)

The land around the mill is described in the complaint and notice of lien as follows: "With such convenient space of land around the same as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof." It is objected that this description is also insufficient. Sec. 4 of the Mechanics' Lien Law (Wood's Digest, 538) provides that "the land upon which any building or superstructure shall be erected, together with convenient space around the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation of the premises, shall also be subject to the lien," etc. The notice and the complaint in this case follow the terms of the statute, and are sufficient as a matter of description. In cases of this kind it is proper for the Court, by its decree, to define the amount and extent of the land connected with the mill which is properly subject to the lien. The decree in this case, however, does not do so; and this is also urged as an objection. Such an omission will not invalidate the decree; but it renders it doubtful whether a purchaser under it will acquire any land beyond that covered by the buildings. That question, however, is not properly before us; and it is not necessary to determine it. No objection of this kind seems to have been raised in the Court below by demurrer or otherwise; nor does it appear that the appellants requested the Court to define in its decree the extent of space around the mill to be subjected to the lien. Under such circumstances, they will be deemed to have waived such objections.

The next point is, that none of the materials furnished by the plaintiffs had been delivered at the mill at the time of the mortgage held by the appellants was executed and recorded, and it is contended, therefore, that the plaintiff's lien did not attach to the property until after the mortgage. The statute then in force provided that "the liens created by this act shall be preferred to every other lien or incumbrance which shall have attached upon the said property subsequent to the time at which the work was commenced, or the first of the materials were furnished; and also to all mortgages and other encumbrances unrecorded at the time such work was commenced, or the first of such materials were furnished." The Court found, among other things, "that the plaintiff, on the twenty-fifth day of September, 1860, commenced to furnish, for the construction of the quartz mill described in the plaintiff's complaint, certain necessary castings," etc. The mortgage held by Brown & Andrews was dated October 22d. The question is, whether or not the word "furnished," as used in the statute, means "delivered at the building" in the construction of which the materials are furnished. We think that such is not its reasonable construction. The material man is properly said to have "furnished" the materials, when he has delivered, or has them ready for delivery, at the place where he has agreed to deliver them under the contract; which, in this case was at the plaintiff's foundry, some distance from the quartz mill. This point, therefore, is not tenable.

The next questions to consider are those relating to the lien of Morgan, one of the parties to the action. It is insisted that the petition filed by him, asserting his claim and lien, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and therefore the Court erred in admitting any evidence in support of the claim over the objection of the appellants. The proceedings in actions to enforce mechanics' liens are special, and peculiar in their character. Under the seventh section of the act in force at the time this action was commenced (Wood's Dig. 538, 539), it was not necessary for the lienholder who commenced the action to make other holders of liens under the statute, parties by name, but they were brought in by a published notice, "notifying all persons holding or claiming liens on said premises, to be and appear in said Court, on a day to be therein specified, and to exhibit then and there the proof of said liens." "On the day appointed, the Court shall proceed to hear and determine the said claims, in a summary way, or may refer the same," etc. It will be seen that the proceedings are summary in their character, and differ entirely from ordinary actions. The exhibit of proof of liens by lienholders coming in under the notice, is not governed by the sections of the Practice Act relating to interventions; and the papers filed by them, exhibiting their claims, are not governed by the strict rules relating to pleadings in ordinary actions. In this case, the lienholder, Morgan, presented his claim in the form of a petition duly filed in the action, in which his demand and lien were set forth. It is objected that it does not state that the lumber was furnished to be used in the construction of the mill, or that it was used in that manner. This objection, if a valid one under the statute referred to, should have been taken by demurrer, and not by objection to the evidence which showed that it was thus furnished and used.

The notice of lien filed by Morgan sets forth that the lumber was furnished to "Moore & Co.," and it is objected that the lien cannot be enforced against property owned by Moore, and not Moore & Co. The material facts to sustain the lien are, that the materials were furnished for, and were actually used in the construction of the building on which the lien is claimed. Whether the owner purchased the materials in his own name or in the name of a firm of which he was a member, can make no difference so far as relates to the lien, which is the only matter the appellants have a right to contest.

The notice filed by Morgan includes claims for lumber furnished for the construction of the quartz mill, and also a blacksmith shop, and a building erected over the shaft of the mine. It is contended that by filing his notice in this form, he loses all lien on either. Whether, in a case like this, where all the buildings, though separated from each other, form one establishment, and are all used, and are necessary in conducting the one business carried on, the lien of the mechanic or material man can be held to include all the buildings in one claim and lien, it is unnecessary to determine. The Court, in this case, in its findings separated the amount due for the materials furnished for the construction of the quartz mill proper from that for the other buildings, and rendered its decree accordingly. In this, no error was committed to the injury of the appellants.

The next class of objections to be noticed are those which relate to the Lambard mortgage. The mortgage held by the appellants is dated October 22d, 1860, and was recorded in Amador County the same day. It was executed under the Chattel Mortgage Act (Wood's Dig. 108), and the property mortgaged is described as follows: "All that certain piece or parcel of land or lot of ground, and the improvements thereon, known as Sidores Quartz Lode or Ledge, situate in Amador County and State of California, about one mile south from the town of Jackson, near the head of Hunt's Gulch, commencing about one hundred and fifty feet south of Howard's Garden, running thence south-east one thousand feet, said range running in a south-east and north-west direction, and being of sufficient width to cover said lode, with all the surface widths, dips, angles, and branches, and all things pertaining to the same, and being the same lode now worked by Albert Moore; also the quartz mill, being at this time in the course of erection upon or near the said lode, together with the boiler, engine, stamps, and machinery of all kinds and descriptions in or about said mill now, and when the same shall have been completed, and all fixtures, furniture, and implements used in or about said mill or quartz lode, and also all quartz rock taken from said quartz lode that may be at or near said mill and lode at the time of foreclosure of this mortgage," etc.

The Lambard mortgage is dated November 16th, 1860, and was duly recorded in Sacramento County, where the property then was, November 17th, and in Amador County on the nineteenth of November. It was executed in pursuance of the provisions of the same Chattel Mortgage Act, and the property mortgaged is described as follows: "One steam engine of the following description: twelve-inch cylinder, twenty-four inch stroke; one heater, one force-pump, one wheel and pinion, and one steam-gauge. Also, one steam boiler of the following description: twenty feet long, and forty inches in diameter, having five nine-inch flues." Soon after this mortgage was given, the property described therein was removed from Sacramento to the quartz mill, and put up therein, for the purpose of running the machinery thereof. The appellants claim that when this property was put up in the quartz mill it became a fixture and part of the realty; that it became thereby a portion of the property covered by their mortgage; that their mortgage, being prior in time to that of Lambard, it became a lien thereon prior to that claimed by Lambard; therefore the proceeds of the sale thereof should be applied first to the satisfaction of their debt, and that the Court below erred in giving priority to the lien of Lambard.

Tibbets v. Moore.

It is not pretended that the appellants' mortgage was any lien upon this boiler and engine at any time before the same was attached to the realty. At the time the Lambard mortgage was executed, there was no lien or incumbrance upon this property. Their mortgage was duly executed and recorded, in compliance with the statute, and at its date it was the prior and in fact only lien thereon. After the execution of the Lambard mortgage, the mortgagor took possession of the property, removed it, and set it up in the quartz mill. Did this act of the mortgagor, even though done with the knowledge and consent of the mortgagee, divest the latter of a valid lien, fully vested, and subject it to a prior lien on the mill? Treating the property described in the appellants' mortgage as real estate, there is no doubt that, when the boiler and engine were attached to the realty, they became subject to his mortgage. (Ferguson v. Miller, 6 Cal. 402; Sands v. Pfeiffer, 10 Id. 258; Union Water Company v. Murphy's Flat Company, 22 Id. 620.)

But it is equally clear that their mortgage was no lien thereon before the property was so attached. We are not aware of any rule of law or equity which will divest the defendant Lambard of the priority of lien lawfully acquired by him upon the property described in his mortgage, by any such means as are shown in this case. The cases referred to by the appellant merely sustain the principles above referred to as already decided by this Court, but they have no application to the present case. The cases of Winslow v. The Merchants' Insurance Company (4 Metcalf, 306), and The Union Water Company v. Murphy's Flat Company (22 Cal. 620), were very similar in principle. In both cases, fixtures and improvements had been put on the real estate after the first mortgage, but before the second had been executed. In both cases the real estate itself was the subject of the mortgages, and it was held in both cases that the fixtures became subject to the first mortgage as soon as they were attached to the realty, and therefore the first mortgage was a prior lien. But those cases differ from the present in this: that here there was a valid subsisting mortgage upon the engine and boiler before the appellants' mortgage became a lien thereon; and although the Lambard mortgage bears a later date than the other, yet it was a lien upon this property before that had attached. We think it more consistent with the rules of equity to hold that the lien of appellants' mortgage upon the engine and boiler dates only from the time they became attached to the realty; and that time being subsequent to the date of the Lambard mortgage, it is subject to the lien of the latter. Ordinarily, the lien in such case would be construed to relate back to the date of the mortgage; but this doctrine of relation will not be so applied as to defeat or divest intermediate rights and liens lawfully acquired. In a case like the present, it should not be construed to relate back beyond the time the property was affixed to the realty, as against the Lambard mortgage.

Both mortgages are executed and recorded as chattel mortgages, under the statute; and treating them in that character, there can be no doubt that the Lambard mortgage has priority over the other so far as relates to the property included in it. The provision in Sec. 2 of that act, respecting the recording of the mortgage in the county where the mortgagor resides, and the property is located, and the proviso respecting the removal of the property to "a location for use," and the time allowed for recording by Sec. 7, clearly contemplate that property of the kind described in the act is to still remain subject to the mortgage lien, though its location be changed, and it be put to use in connection with other property. Much of the property covered by the act, such as saw mill and grist mill machinery, steam boilers, steam engines, machinery, and buildings connected with quartz claims, etc., are of such a character that they are of little or no practical use until they are secured by attachment to real estate in the nature of fixtures, and the evident object and intent of the statute, to protect the mortgagees of such property, would be entirely defeated by holding that a mortgage lien thereon, before becoming fixtures, would be defeated and divested, or subordinated to another mortgage upon becoming a fixture. The separation and removal of the boiler and engine from the realty will leave the latter in no worse condition than it was before they were put up; so that affords no just ground for a different rule. There is no ground for saying that there has been a confusion of goods by attaching the property to the realty.

Antoine Company v. Ridge Company.

There is no difficulty in distinguishing and separating the several articles named in the Lambard mortgage.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE ANTOINE COMPANY v. THE RIDGE COMPANY.

WHEREAS the evidence is conflicting, a new trial will not be granted; and where, in such case, a motion is made for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence and overruled by the Court below, the presumption is that the verdict fairly accords with the conviction of the Judge who tried the cause, as well as the jury.

In an action for damages, for taking gold from a mining claim, the plaintiffs labor under great difficulty in proving the exact amount of damages they have sustained, and the defendants have the means in their power of showing the correct amount of gold taken out; and if they neglect to do so, they cannot complain that the jury by their verdict have fixed a large estimate upon the damages.

It is not necessary to prove the transfer of title of a mining claim by a written conveyance, but a parol transfer with delivery of possession is sufficient.

Since the amendment of the Practice Act, in 1861, the Clerk may insert the amount of the costs, within two days after they shall have been taxed or ascertained, in a blank left in the judgment for that purpose.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. D. Wheeler, for Appellant.

Henry K. Mitchell, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of certain mining ground and damages caused by the working of the same. The plaintiffs recovered judgment for the possession of the property, for damages in the sum of $2,500, and costs amounting to $2,952.75. The defendants moved for a new trial, and to retax the bill of costs, which were denied, and they thereupon took this appeal.

The parties are the owners of certain mining claims on opposite sides of a ridge or hill; and the main question in controversy was how far back upon the ridge or hill their respective claims extended. The first two points of error assigned by the appellants are, that the evidence as to the location of the claims does not sustain the verdict of the jury. The third point is, that the evidence does not show that the defendants trespassed upon the ground, even as claimed by the plaintiffs. The fourth point is, that the damages are excessive, and the verdict in this respect is not sustained by the evidence. The transcript in this case is very voluminous, containing five hundred and forty-seven pages, the greater part of which is made up of the evidence given on the trial which it seems occupied about twenty days of the time of the Court below. The evidence, as is usual in such cases, is very conflicting—especially upon the principal questions involved in the controversy. It is not claimed that the Court below erred in its instructions to the jury, or that any error of law occurred during the trial prejudicial to the defendants. Even if we should come to the conclusion, from a full and careful reading of the evidence in the record, that the testimony preponderated against the verdict of the jury upon these points, we would not be justified in setting it aside. We could not possibly obtain from a mere reading of the evidence, as full and clear a view of the true facts of the case as the Court and jury who tried it. The appellants insist that the jury were governed by passion and prejudice in the action; but it is not charged that the Judge who tried the case was governed by any such feelings. He heard all the testimony of the witnesses as it was given to the jury, and the law has vested him with the power to grant a party, against whom a verdict has been rendered, a new trial, in all cases where, in his opinion, the verdict is against law, or the evidence is insufficient to justify it, or where the damages are excessive and appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. This power is a very important one in the protection of the rights of parties litigating in Court. Courts should be liberal in granting new trials in all cases where the Judge who tried the case is satisfied that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence, or that the jury were influenced by passion or prejudice. The law has vested this power in the nisi prius Courts, to be exercised discreetly, in order to secure the rights of all parties. Thus, the verdict should fairly accord with the judgment and convictions of the Judge, as well as the jury, before the judgment rendered thereon should be allowed to stand. When a motion for a new trial has been made and overruled by the Court below, the presumption is that the opinions of the Judge and jury harmonize in support of the verdict. It is for that reason, and the fact that it is impossible for this Court to form as correct a judgment and conclusion of the proper weight to be given to the evidence of the witnesses, that we decline, as a general rule, to set aside, upon such grounds, a verdict thus acted upon. The record in this action does not present a case which would justify us in departing from this salutary and established rule. As to the question of damages, the plaintiffs, as is usual in mining cases of this kind, labor under great difficulty in proving the exact amount of damages they have sustained, as the evidence of the amount of gold taken out by the defendants from the ground claimed by the plaintiffs is necessarily almost exclusively confined to or under the control of the defendants. The plaintiffs were compelled to rely to a great extent upon the judgment and estimates of men who were not fully acquainted with the facts. If this resulted in causing the jury to return too large a verdict of damages, the defendants are themselves principally to blame; for they had the means in their own power of showing the correct amount of gold taken out by them, or at least of making the most accurate estimate of the amount.

The fifth point assigned as error by the appellants is, that the plaintiffs failed to connect themselves with the title of the original locators of their claim. They allege in their complaint the location of their claim in 1852 by certain persons, and that they have acquired the title of such original locators. They also allege that they were the owners and in possession of the mining ground at the time of the entry by the defendants. The defendants in their answer deny these allegations, and thus issue was taken upon them by the parties. If the plaintiffs proved by competent evidence that they were the owners and in possession of the mining ground at the time of the defendants' entry, they did all that was necessary to sustain their title and right of action. The presumption is that the verdict of the jury is correct, and that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdict. This presumption is not rebutted by showing that the plaintiffs failed to deraign a title from the original locators to themselves, even though that kind of title was alleged in the complaint. The particular kind or character of title claimed by the plaintiffs was immaterial, so that they proved a better and superior right and title to the possession of the premises than that of the defendants. It was only necessary for them to prove by competent evidence that they were entitled to the possession of the premises in controversy, as against the defendants, to enable them to maintain the action. To do so it might, or might not become necessary to trace their title back to the original locators of the claim. They introduced evidence sufficient to establish their right to the possession, and that is sufficient to sustain the verdict and judgment. It was not necessary to prove a transfer of the title by written conveyances; but a parol transfer, with a delivery of the possession, was sufficient, as has been repeatedly decided by this Court. (14 Cal. 22; 20 Id. 198.) The point therefore is not tenable.

The sixth point is, that the item of costs inserted in the judgment should be stricken out, on the alleged ground that the bill of costs was not filed until after the judgment was entered, and after the Court had adjourned for the term. The appellants referred to the case of Chapin v. Broder (16 Cal. 419) to sustain their position. The record does not show that the bill of costs was filed after the entry of the judgment, or after the adjournment of the Court for the term. From the record, it would appear that the alleged grounds of this motion do not exist. But even if they did exist, they would not be sufficient to sustain the motion of the appellants. After the decision in the case of Chapin v. Broder, the Legislature, in 1861 (Stat. 1861, 494), amended Sec. 511, thereby authorizing the Clerk to insert the amount of the costs within two days after they shall have been taxed or ascertained in a blank left in the judgment for that purpose. This point is therefore overruled.

These are all the points assigned by the appellants; and as no error appears in the proceedings in the Court below, the judgment is affirmed.

Banks v. Marshall.

BANKS v. MARSHALL.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The second count of the complaint was for four hundred and sixty-six dollars and forty-five cents, alleged to have been received by the defendant on the first day of July, 1861, to and for the use of plaintiff. The remainder of the facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover a balance alleged to be due upon a promissory note, executed by the defendant, bearing date March 17th, 1857, for seven hundred and twenty-five dollars, payable six months after date, to the plaintiff, with interest at two per cent. per month. The complaint avers that six hundred dollars was paid thereon, April 17th, 1860; and three hundred and eighty-six dollars July 1st, 1861; and that there was a balance of four hundred and sixty-six dollars and forty-five cents still due and unpaid. There is also a count for the same amount for money had and received. The defendant demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it showed that the action on the note was barred by the Statute of Limitations, the action having been commenced May 9th, 1862, more than four years after the right of action accrued. The Court sustained the demurrer as to the note. A final judgment was rendered for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

On the trial, the evidence showed that the note described in the complaint, was sent from New York through Wells, Fargo & Co.'s Express office for collection, with instructions to receive the amount of the principal and interest thereon, at ten per cent. per annum, in satisfaction of the note; that the agent of Wells, Fargo & Co., at Suisun, collected the principal and interest at that rate, according to instructions, in the payments stated in the complaint, and surrendered the note to the defendant. Afterwards, Wells, Fargo & Co.'s agent was advised that a mistake had been made in instructing him to collect only ten per cent. per annum interest; and that he should have collected the full amount of interest specified in the note. He then demanded payment of the balance claimed to be due on the note, and the defendant refused to pay it, saying there was an agreement that he was to pay only the ten per cent. interest. This action was thereupon commenced. If there was no valid agreement that interest was to be paid at any other rate than that specified in the note, then the money paid was not a full payment or discharge of the note; and although the note was surrendered up by mistake, under the supposition that it was fully paid, yet the defendant, under such circumstances, would still remain liable for the balance of the note remaining unpaid. His liability, however, was upon the note, and the action to enforce that liability should have been brought within the time fixed by the Statute of Limitations; and failing to do so, it was barred. The facts, as shown, will not sustain an action for money had and received, as was correctly ruled by the Court below.

It follows, that there was no error in the judgment rendered, and it is therefore affirmed.

Everett v. Hydraulic Flume Tunnel Company.

EVERETT et al. v. THE HYDRAULIC FLUME TUNNEL COMPANY.

IF the owners of a ditch or flume for the conveyance of water erect a dam above mining claims, and the claims are afterwards damaged by reason of the breaking of the dam, its owners are not liable for the damages, if it was constructed with that reasonable care which prudent men would use, and no negligence is shown in its care and management.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

McRae & Beatty, for Appellants.

C. F. Lott, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages caused by the breaking of a dam owned by the defendants. The plaintiffs are the owners of mining claims and sluice-boxes below the defendants' dam, which broke at a high stage of water, and, as is alleged, injured the plaintiffs' property below. The case was tried by the Court, who found for the defendants, and the plaintiffs appeal. The Court found that the dam was "well built, and constructed in a good and workmanlike manner, and of sufficient strength and capacity to contain the amount of water within it;" that no negligence on the part of the defendants was shown, and that they used that reasonable care and diligence which prudent men would have used, in the erection and care of the dam. Under these findings, the Court properly rendered judgment for the defendants, as the case comes clearly within the rule laid down in Hoffman v. The Tuolumne Water Company (10 Cal. 413), and Wolf v. The St. Louis Independent Water Company (Id. 541). But the appellant insists that the findings upon these points are not sustained by the evidence. We have carefully examined the record, and see no error in these findings. They are fairly sustained by the evidence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Boles v. Johnston.

BOLES et al. v. JOHNSTON.

A Court of Equity will not set aside a Sheriff's sale and a deed executed under it in a collateral action commenced for that purpose, by reason of irregularities in the conduct of the officer in making the levy and sale. If parties have any remedy under such circumstances, it is by motion properly made in the Court where the judgment was rendered, to set aside the sale.

APPEAL from the District Court, Ninth Judicial District, Siskiyou County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. A. Fletcher, for Appellants.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a house and lot in Siskiyou County. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are the owners of the property in question, and that the defendant claims title to it under and by virtue of a Sheriff's sale and deed, under an execution issued upon a judgment against the plaintiff Boles and one Martin. The complaint sets forth numerous irregularities in the conduct of the officer in making the levy and sale, and avers that he and the surities on his official bond are either insolvent or have left the State, taking their property with them. There is no averment that the defendant had notice of these irregularities, or that he in any way participated therein. The case was submitted to the Court below upon the facts stated in the complaint, and the exhibits of the judgment and execution attached thereto, and the Court dismissed the case, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

Whether a Court of Equity might not grant relief in a proper case showing fraud in the conduct of the Sheriff in selling property in violation of the rights of the parties and the requirements of the statute, of which the purchaser and those claiming under him had notice, or in which they may have participated, is a question unnecessary to determine in this case, as it is not founded upon any such state of facts. If the plaintiffs have any remedy at all under the facts stated, it is by motion properly made in the Court where the judgment was rendered to set aside the sale, and not in this collateral action. The right of action here is founded solely upon these irregularities, and the Court below committed no error in dismissing the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHILLING v. HOLMES et al.

AN under tenant, who takes a lease and receives possession from the tenant, becomes the tenant of the landlord, subject to all the duties and liabilities of a tenant to the landlord.

One of the most important duties of a tenant is to peaceably and quietly surrender the premises to the landlord as soon as the tenancy has expired.

If a stranger intrudes upon the premises and takes possession, either forcibly or otherwise, it is the duty of the tenant to take proper legal proceedings to regain the possession, so that he may surrender the same to the landlord.

The tenant is liable to pay rent until he has restored full and complete possession to the landlord, and his liability to pay the rent is not discharged by an eviction, unless under a title superior to the landlord's, or by some agency of the landlord.

If the tenant is evicted by a wrong-doer, the landlord is not bound to indemnify him.

When the notice to quit, in order to enable the landlord to determine the tenancy, is served on the original lessee, that notice binds the under tenants who acquire possession from the tenant after its service.

Those who lease from the tenant, after the landlord has served on him notice to quit, are liable to the landlord for double the monthly value of the premises.

APPEAL from the County Court of the County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John Reynolds, for Appellant and Respondent Schilling.

Is the tenant who is ousted by a stranger released from liability to his landlord for rent? The landlord is not bound to protect his tenant against trespassers. (Smith's Landlord and Tenant, 211, and cases there cited.) A trespass by the lessor does not operate as a suspension of the rent. (Wm. Saund. 204.) Nor does a trespass by a stranger. (Paradine v. Jane, Alleyne, 26.)

W. W. Chipman, for Holmes, Appellant and Respondent.

The allegation of the complaint is, that defendant Holmes held and occupied under the superior tenant, Becker, and not from the plaintiff; if so, this holding over of this superior tenant by his agent or subordinate Holmes, and a dismissal of the action against the head, dismissed the whole. The Court should have dismissed as to Holmes for want of jurisdiction. (6 Johns. B. 272; 3 Id. 422; 10 B. & C. 816.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

The complaint in this case avers that, on the first day of May, 1861, the plaintiff, being the owner of a certain building in the City of San Francisco, leased the lower story of the same to the defendant Becker, for one month, for the monthly rent of seventy-five dollars; that Becker underlet portions thereof to Holmes and the other defendants; that Becker paid the rent up to September 1st; that on the first day of August, the plaintiff served on Becker a written notice, to quit and surrender the premises, on the first day of September, 1861; that a similar notice was also served on Becker, September 3d, requiring him to immediately surrender the possession; that on the fourth day of September, Becker removed from the premises, and left the other defendants in possession; and the latter have been in possession ever since; and that on the seventeenth day of September, he served a written notice on said other defendants, requiring them to quit and surrender the premises to him. He prays to be restored to the possession, and for damages and costs. The action was commenced before a Justice of the Peace, on the twenty-first day of September. The case was twice transferred, on the application of the defendants, from one Justice's Court to another; and on the ninth day of October, the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendants Holmes and Kent, from which they appealed to the County Court. The Justice dismissed the action as against Becker, and all the other defendants except Holmes and Kent.

In the County Court, a jury was waived, and the cause was tried by the Court, who filed its findings of facts, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant Holmes, on the sixth day of October, 1862, for the possession of the premises, and one hundred and fifty dollars—trebled damages, for rents and costs. From this judgment both parties have appealed to this Court.

The Court below found that on the nineteenth day of September, 1861, Kent removed from the premises, leaving Holmes in the possession of the whole; that Holmes continued in possession until October 11th, when he was forcibly ejected therefrom by one Horber; that on the same day he commenced an action of forcible entry against Horber and the plaintiff in this action, Schilling, and on the nineteenth of October, recovered judgment therein against Horber and Schilling; that an appeal was taken from that judgment to the County Court, where Holmes recovered judgment against Horber for the restitution of the premises, and for treble the value of one and one-third month's rent, at seventy-five dollars per month, and Schilling recovered judgment therein against Holmes; that Horber was the agent of Schilling at the time of said forcible entry, "for the purpose of letting the said premises and collecting the rents thereof; and had general supervision of the premises." As a conclusion of law, the Court found that the plaintiff was entitled to the restitution of the premises, and the value of two-thirds of a month's rent, at seventy-five dollars per month.

The plaintiff contends that he is entitled to recover the rent of the premises against Holmes, as well after, as before, the forcible entry of Horber; and that the Court below erred in not rendering judgment for the rent which accrued subsequent to that time. When Becker removed from the premises, and Holmes, his under tenant, continued in possession, the latter became the tenant of Schilling, subject to all the duties and liabilities of a tenant to a landlord. One of the most important duties of a tenant is to peaceably and quietly surrender the premises to the landlord as soon as the tenancy has expired; and a failure or refusal to thus surrender, subjects the tenant to the penalties of the statute relating to tenants holding over after the expiration of their terms.

Schilling v. Holmes.

The entire possession must be delivered up, or the tenant's responsibility will not cease. If a stranger has intruded upon the premises, and has wrongfully taken the possession from the tenant, either forcibly or otherwise, it is the duty of the tenant to take proper legal proceedings to regain the possession, that he may perform the duty imposed on him by law, of surrendering the possession to his landlord. But until the tenant has performed this duty of restoring full and complete possession to his landlord, he still remains liable to the latter for the rent. His liability to pay the rent is not discharged by an eviction, unless under a title superior to the landlord's, or by some agency of the landlord. (Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, Sec. 378.)

If he is evicted by a wrong-doer, the landlord is not bound to indemnify him against it; but if the tenant is evicted or disturbed by the act of the landlord, or the acts of those who claim under or paramount to him, the landlord is bound to indemnify him; "but not against the tortious acts of third persons, for which the law affords the tenant a direct remedy against those who commit it." (Smith's Landlord and Tenant, 211 and notes.) It follows, that if the defendant was evicted by the act of the plaintiff, or any person claiming under him, or acting as his agent therein, then the defendant is not liable to pay the rent from the date of such eviction; but if Horber was a wrong-doer, or was not acting as the agent of the plaintiff in evicting the defendant, then the defendant still continues liable for the rent, until he prosecutes his remedy against the wrong-doer, and regains the possession from him and restores it to the plaintiff.

The defendant has treated Horber as a wrong-doer, and attempted to implicate the plaintiff in the act of eviction, by instituting proper legal proceedings against Horber, and his landlord, Schilling. He succeeded in that action against Horber, but failed to implicate Schilling in the act; and the latter therefore recovered judgment against him in the forcible entry proceeding. The Court found that Horber was Schilling's agent for certain purposes, but it found, also, that "there was no testimony that said Horber had direction from the plaintiff to make such forcible entry, or any unlawful entry, or to do any unlawful act." This shows that the eviction was not by the plaintiff, or any one authorized by him; and the defendant therefore still continued liable for the rent. It was his duty, upon obtaining judgment for the restitution of the premises, to procure the proper writ, and upon being reinstated in the possession, to immediately surrender the premises to the plaintiff, and thus discharge himself from the liability for the rent. If he has not done so, that is his fault. It follows that the Court erred in failing to include in its judgment the rent which accrued subsequent to the date of the forcible entry.

The defendant, under his appeal, assigns for error that the Court should have dismissed the action, because the notice to quit, served August 1st, 1861, was not served on him, but on Becker, under whom he claimed; and he contends that he was entitled to a personal notice to enable the plaintiff to determine the tenancy. The service of the notice to quit upon the original lessee, Becker, was sufficient; and that notice bound the under tenants, and especially Holmes, as to the possession acquired by him after the notice was served on Becker. The statute would be liable to continued evasions if any other rule were to be adopted. It would only be necessary for the tenant, after service of a notice, to sub-let to another, transfer the possession to him, and thus defeat the rights of the landlord, by successive transfers of this kind, for an indefinite period of time. (Birdsall v. Phillips, 17 Wend. 464.)

The defendant, however, contends that the fifth section of the Act of 1861, relating to landlords and tenants (Stat. 1861, 514), requires that in such case the notice must be served on the person who comes in under the tenant, before the plaintiff is entitled to recover more than single damages under the statute. The first and second sections prescribe upon whom, and how, this notice to determine the tenancy must be served; and the notice, in this case, was properly served, under the provisions of that act. Sec. 5 then provides, substantially, that if after such notice has been duly served, the "tenant or any other person who may have come into the possession of lands or tenements, under or by collusion with such tenant, shall willfully hold over," etc., he shall pay double the monthly value of the premises. This provision evidently accords with the rule which we have laid down upon this subject, and treats the after-occupying tenant as bound by the notice previously served.

The defendant also contends that the Court erred in trebling the value of the monthly rents, in rendering judgment. The Statute of 1861, being the latest law upon the subject, governs in such case, and that statute provides only for doubling the value of the monthly rents; and the Court below therefore erred in this respect. We see no abuse of the discretion vested in the Court below in its refusal to permit the defendant to file an amended answer.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

LADD v. RUGGLES.

A COMMENCED an action against B on a money demand and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure his debt. On motion of A's attorney the prayer for foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the property was stricken out and a money judgment taken: held, that this was an abandonment and waiver of A's right to a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged property.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellant.

Harris & Burt, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to enter a decree of foreclosure of a mortgage. It appears that on the thirty-first day of December, 1856, an action was commenced for the foreclosure of a mortgage, the parties appeared, a trial was had by the Court (a jury having been waived), and on the trial the plaintiffs moved to amend their complaint by striking out the prayer for the sale of the property, which was granted. The Court found for the plaintiff, the amount of the debt, and a personal money judgment therefor was accordingly rendered against the defendant on the twenty-third day of February, 1857. On the twenty-first day of April, 1863, the surviving plaintiff moved the Court, on notice, to enter a decree of foreclosure of the mortgage, which was refused, and he thereupon takes this appeal.

The appellant contends that although the prayer for the sale of the property was stricken out of the complaint, yet as there was a prayer for general relief, he was then and still is entitled under it to a decree of foreclosure and for a sale of the property. After having stricken out, on his own motion, the prayer for a sale of the mortgaged property, he could not ask that relief, as he had thus openly abandoned and waived that portion of his claim to relief. But even if that was not the effect of his motion and the order granting it, and even if he could have claimed that kind of decree under his prayer for general relief, he should have required the Court at the time of rendition of the judgment to grant him that further relief; or, before the expiration of the term, moved the Court to amend the judgment in that respect. Having failed to do so, it is too late afterwards to do it. If such application had been made and refused, his remedy would have been by an appeal, within the statutory time, to correct the error, if error it had been.

The order of the Court below is affirmed.

SWINFORD et al. v. ROGERS et al.

A CONVEYANCE of property made and received with intent to defraud creditors is void, though there may have been a full and valuable consideration paid therefor. The fraud taints and vitiates it, and it will not be allowed to stand even as security for advances actually made.

Where the fraudulent vendee has held the property, or converted the same to his own use, the Court will compel him to account for the value thereof, and direct the proceeds to be paid over to the creditors of the vendor.

APPEAL from the District Court, Ninth Judicial District, Shasta County.

Swinford v. Rogers.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. Carter, for Appellants.

The appellants, Smith & Rogers, maintain: 1st. That the conveyance of all the property (the sale of all being one transaction) is honest, and valid in law, whether viewed as a conditional sale which had become absolute, as the Court decided it to be with reference to the ranch, or as a mortgage given to secure the payment of the $2,600 and interest, etc.; and the transaction cannot be held to be fraudulent as against creditors. (Dana v. Stanfords, 10 Cal. 269; Randall v. Buffington and Wife, Id. 491; St. John v. Northup, 23 Bar. 30; Burnham v. DeBevourse, 8 How. Pr. 159.)

2d. The complaint does not support the judgment. (White v. Pratt, 13 Cal. 525; Green v. Covillaud, 10 Id. 317.) There is no allegation in the complaint to sustain a general money judgment against Smith & Rogers. (Harris v. Taylor, 15 Cal. 348; Kinder v. Macy, 7 Id. 206; Meeker v. Harris, 19 Id. 288, and cases cited; McMahon v. Harrison, 12 How. Pr.)

This sale was either a mortgage to secure the payment of the $2,600, or it was a conditional sale which became absolute by forfeiture; but if the transaction was intended to create a trust for the benefit of creditors, as the Court below seemed to view it, it was void under the thirty-ninth section of the statute for the relief of insolvents, and could not create a trust or contract on which the creditors could obtain a money judgment against Smith & Rogers; the only remedy of the creditors in such case would be to seek the property, notwithstanding the assignment. (Grachen v. Page, 6 Cal. 138; Cheever v. Hays, 3 Id. 471.)

R. T. Sprague, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action, in the nature of a suit in equity, brought by a judgment creditor to reach the property of his debtor, fraudulently conveyed, and to apply the same upon his judgment. The case was tried by the Court, who found in favor of the plaintiffs, and a judgment was rendered against the fraudulent vendors for the amount due on the plaintiffs' judgments; that a certain portion of the property fraudulently conveyed be sold, and the proceeds be applied upon the judgment; and that execution for the balance of the judgment issue against their property. The defendants appeal from this judgment.

It appears from the record that on the thirtieth day of March, 1861, one of the defendants, J. P. Lane, who is the plaintiffs' judgment debtor, with his wife, and one W. R. Lane, executed to the defendants Smith & Rogers, a deed for the conveyance of a certain ranch in Shasta County, and certain ditch property, and also executed a bill of sale for certain personal property on the ranch. The Court found that the sale of the ranch was made in good faith, as a conditional sale, to become absolute, unless J. P. Lane redeemed the same by the payment of a sum of about $2,650, due to Smith & Rogers, upon demands held by them, and some other debts of J. P. Lane, which they had agreed to pay; and that Lane had not redeemed the ranch from this sale. The Court also found that the sale and conveyance of the balance of the property to Smith & Rogers was without consideration, and made for the purpose of hindering, delaying and defrauding the creditors of J. P. Lane; that they agreed that Lane might dispose of the personal property conveyed, and the growing crops on the land, for the benefit of his creditors; that they violated this agreement, and appropriated the growing crops, and sold the personal property, and converted the same to their own use; and that they have received therefrom and hold money more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff's judgment. The Court ordered that the conveyance of the mining ditches be canceled, and that the said ditches be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the plaintiffs' debt.

The appellants contend that as the Court found that the sale as to a portion of the property was made for a valuable consideration, and in good faith, they should have so found as to all the property—it being all one transaction. It may be that the Court below considered it their duty to uphold the sale as to the ranch, because it was made upon a valuable consideration; but the law is well settled, that a conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors is void, though there may have been a full and valuable consideration paid therefor. The fraud taints and vitiates it. (1 Story's Eq. Sec. 369.) And it will not be allowed to stand even as security for advances actually made. (Goodwin v. Hammond, 13 Cal. 170.) The sale and conveyance of all this property being but one transaction, and it being found that the sale as to a part of the property was made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, the Court below would have been justified in holding the whole transaction fraudulent and void. The fraud would taint the whole. (McKenty v. Gladwin, 10 Cal. 228; Seales v. Scott, 13 Cal. 78.) The finding, then, is more favorable to the defendants than it should have been; and they cannot, therefore, complain of it, or ask this Court to reverse the judgment on that ground.

The appellants also contend that the Court erred in rendering a personal money judgment against the fraudulent vendees, Smith & Rogers, and that the allegations of the complaint are not sufficient to sustain such a judgment. As a general rule, a Court of Equity declares the fraudulent conveyance void, and directs that the property be sold for the satisfaction of the creditors' debt; but where a fraudulent vendee sells the property, or converts the same to his own use, that kind of relief is rendered impracticable, and he is clearly liable to account for the value thereof, and pay the same to the creditors of the vendor. (Ludlow v. Kidd, 4 Ham. 244; Sparrow v. Chester, 19 Me. 79; Jones v. Henry, 3 Littell, 428.) In this case, the complaint avers the facts of such sale and conversion, and the Court found these averments to be true; and that the value of the property, thus sold and converted, greatly exceeded the amount due to the plaintiffs on their judgment. Under these circumstances, there was no error in rendering a judgment against the fraudulent vendees, in the form of a personal money judgment, for the amount due the plaintiffs. We see no error in the record prejudicial to the appellants.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Tustin v. Faught.

TUSTIN v. FAUGHT et al.

WHERE the grantor named in the body of a deed signs a different name from that recited in the body of the deed, it is not entitled to be admitted in evidence, until it has been shown by parol proof that the person who executed the deed was the same one whose name is recited in the body.

Where real estate is conveyed to a married woman by a deed which recites a consideration of money paid, as well as love and affection, the land conveyed becomes the common property of the husband and wife, and the deed of the husband alone is sufficient to convey it.

A defendant in an action of ejectment may show in defense a title to the demanded property acquired by him after the commencement of the action.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

John Currey, for Appellants.

If the Court below refused to consider the title of the appellants, of which they gave evidence at the trial, because they did not show that they had title at the commencement of the action, then we contend that the Court erred, because the defendants, who were in the possession of the demanded premises at the commencement of the action must, in the absence of direct proof to the contrary, be presumed to have been in such possession lawfully and rightfully.

In Hill v. Draper (10 Barb. 458), the Court say: "The defendants in possession of the disputed premises, are presumed to have a valid title thereto, and the plaintiffs, to entitle themselves to recover, must overcome that presumption by proving title out of the defendants and in themselves." (Jayne v. Price, 5 Taunt. 329; Carpenter v. Weeks, 2 Hill, 341; 10 Johns. 339; 11 Id. 504; Best on Presumptions, 87.) This rule is the doctrine of the common law, of which our statute (Wood's Dig. 46, Sec. 9) is only declaratory. This statute says, in effect, that the occupation of real property by any other person than the real owner, shall be deemed to be under and in subordination to the legal title, unless it shall appear that such premises have been held adversely to such legal title. As to the rule at common law, see 3 Johns. Cases, 109, 124; 2 Ind. 125.

That the possession of the occupant is adverse to the true title

will never be presumed from the mere act of possession; and if relied on as in opposition to the real title, its adverse character must be plainly and positively proved. (1 Wash. C. C. 78-80; 6 Cow. 125; 2 Wend. 13, 140; 2 Har. & John. 112-125; 7 Wheat. 59-109; 4 Wash. C. C. 38; 4 Wend. 423, 672.)

If we are right in respect to the position of the defendants, from two of whom the intervenors derived title, then such intervenors had the same rights of defense as their grantors had, with whose rights their own were connected as successors in interest.

F. D. Colton and M. M. Estee, for Respondent.

If it should be held that some or all of the appellants took an interest in the premises from their deeds, then we contend that, as it was acquired after the commencement of the action, it cannot avail the appellants. But they contend that being in possession at the commencement of the action, the presumption would be, that they were in possession under those tenants in common, from whom plaintiff did not derive title. We reply:

1st. They endeavored to show title, and failed. The presumption is, that they proved all the right to possession which they had.

2d. In their answers they claim title; they do not claim or pretend that they ever had license to enter.

3d. Appellants in their answers do not deny the possession of plaintiff, and their ouster of him. If they entered under a title, they should show it. If one tenant in common ousts another, the presumption would be, that he had another and paramount title.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover possession of a tract of land in Sonoma County—a portion of the Rancho “Laguna de San Antonio.” Both parties claim title under Bartolome Bojorques, the grantee of the Mexican Government. The Court rendered a judgment against all the defendants except Gaston, from which, and from an order overruling a motion for a new trial, they appeal.

The plaintiff, to maintain the action, introduced in evidence a deed of conveyance, dated December 8th, 1855, executed by Bar-tolome Bojorques and eleven others. The defendants made several objections to this deed, one of which was that it was an unexecuted instrument. It appears, from an examination of the record, that the names of twelve persons, mostly Spanish names, are described as the grantors in the body of the conveyance, and that the names and seals of twelve persons, mostly Spanish, are attached as signatures to the deed, but these vary from each other; some of the names in the body of the deed do not appear in the same terms among the signatures, while several signatures do not appear in the same words among the names in the body of the deed. Whether they were in fact all the same persons, under different names, it is unnecessary to determine; for this objection of the defendants is untenable. The deed shows clearly, upon inspection, that several of the persons named in the body of the instrument signed their names to it; and to that extent, at least, it was executed, and properly admissible in evidence. This objection was made to a similar deed in the case of Colton v. Seavey et al. (22 Cal. 496), and was overruled.

It was also objected to this deed, that its execution was not so proved as to entitle it to be received in evidence. This objection is also untenable. The execution of the conveyance appears to have been acknowledged, by all the parties who signed the deed, before a Notary Public, who was also the subscribing witness to it — except as to one grantor, whose acknowledgment was taken before the County Clerk — and duly certified to by him.

The defendants introduced in evidence a deed from Bartolome Bojorques to Pedro Bojorques and seven others, his children, for the undivided eight-ninths of the rancho, dated November 20th, 1851. These grantees are the same persons under whom the plaintiff claims title, and by whom, with their husbands, he claims his deed was executed. One of the grantees in this deed was Marcella Lopez, whose name appears in the body of the plaintiff's deed as Maria Marcella Lopez, but her name does not appear among the signatures, at least not in either of those terms; and if it appears in another name, that fact should have been proved. On the second day of February, 1857, Marcella Lopez and her husband executed to Richardson & Hunt a conveyance of the undivided one-ninth of the rancho. On the 12th day of June, 1857, Richardson & Hunt conveyed to the defendant Freeman the tract of land described in the complaint; and afterwards, on the third day of April, 1858, Hunt conveyed to Freeman the undivided one-fourth of all his then interest in the rancho. These two last deeds were not executed, however, until after April 15th, 1857, the date of the commencement of this action. It appears, therefore, that at the time of the commencement of this action, the plaintiff was the owner, as tenant in common with others, of an undivided interest in the rancho, including the premises in controversy, the extent of that interest depending upon the number of the grantees named in the deed of November 20th, 1851, who signed the deed to him. It also appears, that, at the time of the commencement of this action, the defendant Freeman was a stranger to the title, but that he afterward acquired an interest to the extent of the undivided one-ninth in the premises in controversy, and from that time, to wit: June 12th, 1857, he was a tenant in common therein with the plaintiff.

It further appears from the record that Howe and his wife, Angela de la Luce Howe, daughter of Bartolome Bojorques, executed a deed to Hopkins & Bennett, dated July 22d, 1857, conveying the undivided one-ninth of the rancho. Also, that Richardson executed a deed to Hopkins & Bennett, dated July 23d, 1857, conveying the undivided one-eighteenth of the rancho. To the first of these deeds it is objected that it conveyed no title or interest in the premises, because the grantors, Howe and his wife, had previously, by the deed of December 8th, 1855, conveyed all their interest in the premises in controversy to the plaintiff. An examination of this latter deed shows that Henry Howe is properly named in the body of the deed, and his name duly appears among the signatures thereto. The name of Angela de la Luce Howe appears in the body of the deed, and Maria de la Luce Howe among the signatures; and it is evident that these different names refer to the same person. But it is urged that the certificate of the acknowledgment to the deed to the plaintiff, so far as it relates to the wives of the several grantors, is defective. This part of the certificate is in these words: After naming the wives, it proceeds "being examined by me, separate and apart from their husbands, acknowledged to me that they signed the same without fear or compulsion from them." This is clearly defective, because it does not show that they were made acquainted with the contents of the conveyance, or that the examination was "without the hearing" of their husbands, or that they executed the same without "undue influence" of their husbands, or that they did "not wish to retract the execution of the same." To this objection it is replied, that the conveyance from Bartolome Bojorques to his children is not a deed of gift, but of bargain and sale upon the consideration of four hundred and sixty-one dollars, money paid, as well as love and affection, and therefore the title vested in Henry Howe, the husband, and the wife acquired no separate estate therein, but it became and was the common property of the husband and wife, and the deed of the husband alone was sufficient to convey it. The deed being one of bargain and sale, founded upon a money consideration, and not a deed of gift, the property conveyed became common property, and the deed of the husband was sufficient without the signature of the wife. (Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 253.) It follows that no title or estate was conveyed by this deed to Hopkins & Bennett, dated July 22d, 1857, and it is not necessary therefore to follow out the title claimed under it.

It will also be found that the other deed from Richardson to Hopkins & Bennett, conveyed no title or interest in or to the premises in controversy to the grantees. This deed is dated July 23d, 1857, and it was not recorded until August 5th, 1857; but prior to those dates, to wit: the twelfth day of June, 1857, Richardson & Hunt had conveyed their interest in the premises in controversy, to Freeman, and this deed was duly recorded August 3d, 1857. It was therefore both dated and recorded first. It follows that no title or estate passed by this deed, and it is not necessary to trace out the title claimed under it.

This examination shows that none of the defendants or intervenors who appeal, except Freeman, had any title to the premises, either at the commencement of the action or at the time of trial. The Court, among other findings, found as follows: "That the defendants in said action and intervenors therein, excepting the defendant Martin Gaston" (who is not a party to the appeal), "proved no valid title in themselves, or either of them, in or to said lands described in plaintiff's complaint, or any part thereof; that previous to the commencement of this action the said defendants entered upon the said lands described in plaintiff's complaint and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and ever since said time have been in possession thereof." The Court also found that the plaintiff was the owner of the undivided two-thirds of the premises in controversy, and that he was entitled to the possession of the land against all the defendants and intervenors, except Gaston, and entitled to a judgment against them for the restitution of the premises and for costs, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

The finding as to want of title in the defendants and intervenors who appeal is correct as to all of them, except as to Freeman, who, as we have already shown, became the owner, on the twelfth day of June, 1857, of the undivided one-ninth of the premises. The Court below probably held that a defendant could not show a title acquired since the commencement of the action; and as Freeman's title was acquired since, it was probably for that reason excluded. But there is no good reason why a defendant may not show such after-acquiring title. (Moore v. Tice, 22 Cal. 513; Smith v. Billett, 15 Id. 26.) By that title Freeman became the tenant in common with the plaintiff. Whether he did any act, after he became such tenant in common, which would amount to an ouster of the plaintiff, does not appear in the record, except in the general finding of the Court that, previous to the commencement of the action, all the defendants entered and ousted the plaintiff. But this does not show any ouster after Freeman became tenant in common. From that time he may have acknowledged the plaintiff's title, and have avoided any act or declaration which would constitute an ouster of the plaintiff. We have recently laid down the rules which govern the rights of tenants in common, and what will constitute an ouster in such cases. (Carpentier v. Webster, decided at the July Term, 1863.) No judgment for damages was claimed or rendered, and the question is one, therefore, merely of the right of possession. The plaintiff is clearly entitled to the possession of the premises to the extent of the interest acquired by him by the deed of December 8th, 1855, which the Court finds was the undivided two-thirds, the correctness of which we have no certain means of determining from the record before us. The defendant Freeman is entitled only to the possession of the undivided one-ninth of the premises in controversy, and it will be necessary to ascertain the extent of his possession, and whether he has ousted the plaintiff, his co-tenant, for which purpose a new trial as to Freeman will be necessary.

The judgment is therefore affirmed with the costs of appeal, as to all the defendants and intervenors, except as to the defendant Freeman, and the judgment against the said Freeman is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial as to him.

In the case of Carpentier v. Webster, a rehearing was granted, and the case is still pending.— REPORTER.

O'BRIEN v. BRADY.

When the motion for a new trial is based upon newly-discovered evidence, or that the verdict is against evidence, an enlarged discretion is vested in the Court below; and the Supreme Court will rarely interfere with the action of the Court below, in granting a new trial.

When a new trial is granted by the Court below, entirely upon alleged errors of law, the Supreme Court will review the action of the Court below, as in other cases.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Henry K. Mitchell, for Appellant.

Rowe & Goodwin, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The grounds of the motion for a new trial were, newly-discovered evidence, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, and that the verdict is contrary to law and the instructions of the Court.

Brady v. O'Brien.

The appellant contends that the affidavits of newly-discovered evidence do not make out such a case as entitles the defendant to a new trial. Where the motion is founded upon newly-discovered evidence, or that the verdict is against the evidence, an enlarged discretion is vested in the Court below in the granting of new trials; and this Court will rarely interfere with their action in granting the motion on such grounds. This case comes within this rule, and we do not find any abuse of this discretion to justify a reversal of the order. Where the motion for a new trial is founded entirely upon alleged errors of law, in the proceedings of the Court below, and the order for a new trial is granted solely upon that ground, this Court will review such action of the Court, as in other cases, where questions of law and not matters of mere discretion are involved. This case, however, does not come within this exception to the general rule.

The order is affirmed.

BRADY v. O'BRIEN.

If the statement and notice of motion for new trial are defective, in not setting forth, specifically, the grounds of the motion, an objection should be made on this ground, in the Court below, to enable the Supreme Court to review the action of the Court below.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Yuba County.

Henry K. Mitchell, for Appellant.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order granting a new trial. It is urged that the statement and notice of motion for a new trial are defective in not setting forth, specifically, the grounds of the motion. The record does not show that any objection was made on this ground in the Court below, which should have been done, to enable us to review the action of the Court. If the objection had been made there, probably the Court would have allowed an amendment in that respect; or the parties may have consented to waive that objection. Error will not be presumed, but must be clearly shown by the record. If the objection had been made on that ground, in a proper mode, and the Court had overruled it, then such action could have been reviewed by this Court on appeal.

The order is affirmed.

COLMAN et al. v. CLEMENTS et al.

IN an action of ejectment to recover possession of a mining claim, where the complaint alleges in general terms that the plaintiffs are the owners of the mining ground in controversy, they are entitled to show in evidence the rules and customs of the mining district in support of this alleged ownership without averring such rules and customs in the complaint.

The possession of one tenant in common is presumed to be the possession of all, and in order to rebut this presumption and make the possession adverse, it must be shown that the possession was with the intent to hold adversely, and such intent must be indicated by acts calculated to exclude the co-tenant. If written laws exist in a mining district, and the proof renders it doubtful whether they are in force, both the mining laws and parol proof of the mining customs may be offered in evidence.

Where a forfeiture is claimed under a mining regulation or custom, this regulation or custom will be most strictly construed against the claim of forfeiture. A judgment recovered in ejectment against a portion of several co-tenants will not to be reversed because all the co-tenants are not made parties defendant.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tod Robinson, for Appellants.

By the rules of pleading, no one can claim a benefit or a forfeiture under a private act of the Legislature, without setting forth the act in his declaration or answer. Our own Practice Act, Sec. 61 (Wood's Dig. 795), requires this to be done, but excuses the setting forth the act in full, and makes it sufficient to refer to its title and the date of its passage. (1 Chitty on Pl. 217.)

Colman v. Clements.

The possession of one tenant in common is the possession of a co-tenant only so long as the one holding recognizes the co-tenant. (Adams on Eject. 136; Humbert v. Trinity Church, 24 Wend. 587.)

Coffroth & Spaulding, for Respondents.

In ejectment, the only facts necessary to be alleged are: 1st. Plaintiff's seizin. 2d. Defendant in possession at commencement of suit. 3d. That defendant withholds possession thereof from plaintiff. We hold that the local customs are as susceptible of proof as any other style of evidence, without being set up in the complaint.

All persons holding as tenants in common, joint tenants, or coparceners, or any number less than all, may jointly or severally bring or defend any civil action for the enforcement or protection of the rights of such party. (Wood's Dig. 248, Art. 1375; Waring v. Crow, 11 Cal. 366; Pico v. Columbet, 12 Id. 419.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by four plaintiffs against eight defendants to recover the possession of the undivided five-thirtieths of a mining claim in Calaveras County. It appears that about the fifth of February, 1861, one Samuel Colman, with two others, took up and marked out 4,500 feet of a copper claim in the name of themselves and others, amounting to thirty persons in all. These names included the present plaintiffs and defendants. Some of these names were included without the previous knowledge or consent of the parties. Colman afterward sold out his interest to one of the plaintiffs, William Colman. Afterward, sometime about the first of June, 1861, twenty-three of the persons named in the original location, with seven others, formed a new company and relocated the same ground in their own names, and have continued in possession ever since, claiming that the original location had been abandoned by failure on the part of those left out of the new organization to perform the work required by the mining rules and customs. Only eight out of the thirty new locators are made defendants, and these eight were among the number named in the original location. The case was tried by a jury, who found for the plaintiffs, and a judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the defendants appeal.

On the trial, the plaintiffs offered to prove the mining laws and customs, to which the defendants objected that they had not been mentioned or set forth in the pleadings, and could not, therefore, be proved. The complaint alleges, in general terms, that the plaintiffs are the owners of the undivided five-thirtieths of the mining ground in controversy, which is denied in general terms by the answer. So far as the title of the plaintiffs depended upon mining rules and customs, or acts done in pursuance thereof, such proof tended to support such title, and it was not necessary to set forth such mining rules and customs in the pleadings. The Court below did not therefore err in overruling this objection of the defendants.

On the trial, the Court instructed the jury that the possession of one locator was the possession of all, and the defendants then asked that the following instructions be given: "That the possession of one tenant is the possession of his co-tenants only so long as the tenant in possession recognizes the co-tenants," which the Court refused to give, and this is assigned as error. The possession of one tenant in common is presumed to be the possession of all. But such possession may in fact be adverse to that of the co-tenant. The instruction asked for is founded upon the idea that the mere fact that the tenant in possession does not "recognize the co-tenant" constitutes an adverse possession; and the case of Humbert v. Trinity Church (24 Wend. 577), is cited in support of the position. An examination of the able opinion of Justice Cowen, in that case, shows that more is required than is stated in the instructions asked for. He holds that the possession of the tenant must be with the intent to hold adversely, and it must appear that such intent has been "indicated by acts calculated to exclude the complainants from all participation as tenants in common." In the case of Northrop v. Wright (24 Wend. 221), it was held that a possession by a tenant in common for twenty-seven years, during which he had not recognized the right of his co-tenant, was not sufficient to presume an ouster. There was, therefore, no error in refusing to give the instruction in the peculiar form in which it was worded.

Colman v. Clements.

Parol evidence had been given of the mining laws and customs. The written laws were afterwards introduced, and the defendants then moved to strike out the parol proof, which was refused by the Court, and this is assigned as error. When the parol evidence was offered, no objection was made that these mining laws were in writing or that the latter was the better evidence, and it is doubtful, therefore, whether the case does not come within the rule laid down in Kiler v. Kimball (10 Cal. 267). But it seems there was some question as to whether these written laws were in force at the time when they were sought to be applied to the facts in the case. There was, therefore, no impropriety in leaving both the parol and written evidence to the jury.

One of these mining laws was as follows: "There shall be one day's work done on each claim every thirty days from the first of May until the first of December in each year." The defendants asked the Court to instruct the jury as follows: "That under the mining laws, in evidence, it was necessary for one day's work to be done every thirty days after May until December, for each individual claim, and not one day's work for a company's claim, in order to avoid the presumption of abandonment; which was refused by the Court, and this is assigned as error. The claim in this case is a joint one; that is, four thousand five hundred feet located in the joint names of thirty persons. No location was made of any particular portion of the four thousand five hundred feet to any one locator, and it would therefore be impossible for each locator to do his day's work upon his own claim, if this section of the mining laws is to be construed as applying solely to each individual locator. The word "claim" is used, which is general in its character, and properly includes all kinds of claims; joint, as well as separate. If it had been intended to include, or apply only to the claim of each locator, whether made jointly with others, or separately to himself alone, it should have been expressed in clear terms. As the parties claim a forfeiture under it, it is to be strictly construed against the claim of forfeiture. In other words, the parties who claim a forfeiture under it, must show that the case comes within the strict letter of the rule. (Von Schmidt v. Huntington, 1 Cal. 70; Waring v. Crow, 11 Id. 371.) This point is therefore overruled.

Pierson v. McCahill.

It is objected that all the co-tenants should have been made parties, that the adjudication is incomplete, and that the judgment cannot be enforced without them. We can readily see that difficulties may arise about the enforcement of the judgment, and that it would have been more advantageous to have made all the co-tenants parties; but it can hardly be deemed essential in cases of this kind, or that a judgment of this kind is erroneous because they are not all brought in. (Waring v. Crow, 11 Cal. 371.) If the action had been against them as a mining partnership, in the nature of a suit in equity, it would have been necessary to have made all persons interested in the claim or the subject matter parties, and no judgment could have been properly rendered until they had all been made parties. (1 Daniel's Ch. Pr. 315-318; Story's Eq. Pl. Secs. 166-168.)

We have thus disposed of all the material points raised by the defendants, and find no error prejudicial to the appellants in the action of the Court below.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PIERSON v. McCAHILL.

An appeal from an order refusing to change the venue of an action, operates as a stay of all further proceedings in the case in the Court below, until such appeal is determined.

An undertaking in the sum of three hundred dollars, as required by the three hundred and forty-eighth section of the Practice Act, is sufficient to perfect such appeal and stay proceedings.

If one of the terms of a written agreement is left out by mistake when the same is drafted, parol evidence of that fact may be received, and the agreement reformed and made to correspond with the intentions of the parties.

APPEAL from the Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts which do not appear in the opinion will be found stated in 21 Cal. 122.

Pierson v. McCahill.

George W. Tyler, for Appellant.

The Practice Act (Sec. 347) provides that an appeal may be taken from the District Court to the Supreme Court "from an order refusing to change the place of trial, after a motion is made therefor, in the cases provided by law."

Plaintiff moved for a change of venue, on the ground that "the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by the change," which is one of "the cases provided by law." (Pr. Act, Sec. 21.)

It will be seen that this is not one of the cases provided by the statute, in which it is necessary to file an additional bond, other than the bond for three hundred dollars, as provided in Sec. 348. Such being the case, it is plain that the appeal from the order of the Court refusing to change the place of trial was a "stay of all proceedings" in the case.

It is a well-established proposition of law, that a plea of payment of a smaller sum is not a good plea in bar of an action for a greater; and the only ground upon which Courts have sustained composition agreements is, that not to sustain them would work a fraud upon other creditors, or might work such fraud. They have therefore held, that the promise of one creditor was a good consideration for the promise of another.

The principle of the rule does not exist in this case. Here, all the balance of the creditors have been paid, and have given receipts in full of all demands to the defendant.

"When the reason of a rule no longer exists, the rule itself ceases," is a maxim too well known and recognized to be disregarded.

The Court will bear in mind that this is in effect a bill for a specific performance of the contract, as well as a bill to reform a mistake in the instrument itself; and the findings of the Chancellor, and the decree entered, is for a reformation of the instrument, and then for a specific performance of the contract.

I lay down the proposition, without fear of successful contradiction, that the weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine that Courts of Equity never interfere in cases of this kind. (Com.

Dig. Chancery, 2 C. 16; Jaynes v. Statham, 3 Atk. 388; Garrard v. Grenling, 2 Swanst. 257; Pitcairne v. Oubourne, 2 Ves. 375; Mason v. Armitage, 13 Id. 25; Clark v. Grant, 14 Id. 519; Hepburn v. Dunlap, 1 Wheat. 197; Clowes v. Higginson, 1 Ves. & B. 524; Winch v. Winchester, 1 Id. 375; Ramsbottom v. Golden, 1 Id. 165; Flood v. Finley, 2 Ball & B. 53; Townsend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. 325; Price v. Dyer.) The foregoing authorities as to the point that Courts are not bound to interfere, but that it is merely a matter of discretion; and the following, as to whether they will exercise that discretion in a case of this kind, deciding that they will not. (Woolam v. Hiam, 7 Ves. 211; Higginson v. Clowes, 15 Id. 516; Clinan v. Cook, 1 Sch. & Lef. 38, 39; Clowes v. Higginson, 1 Ves. & B. 524; Rich v. Jackson, 6 Ves. 335, 4 Bro. Ch. 514; Ogilvie v. Foljambe, 3 Meriv. 53, 63; Jeremy on Eq. Jur. B. 3, Pt. 2, Ch. 4, Sec. 1, 432.)

I do not contend but what an equitable defense to an action at law may be plead and determined in the same suit; but I do contend that they must be tried separately, and this Court has so decided in several cases. (See Weber v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 447; Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Id. 159.) The only question then that could be passed upon by the Court, was the one raised by the amended answer, setting up a mistake in the written agreement. This was an equitable defense to only a part of the amount sued for, in case the Judge, sitting as a Chancellor, should decree a reformation of the instrument. As to the amount due us, providing a reformation was ordered; and as to whether there was a tender of amount due before suit was brought; and as to whether the one hundred dollars had been garnisheed prior to the commencement of this suit; are questions for a jury to pass upon, and the Chancellor has nothing to do with them. We had no right to claim a trial by jury on the equitable defense, but we had a right on the legal, and we have never waived that right. Under the old practice, a party would have been driven to his bill in equity to reform the instrument. Our practice has, perhaps, changed it so that the defense may be set up in an action at law; but in a case of that kind, the equitable issue should be first tried by the Court, sitting as a Chancellor, and if a reformation is decreed, then the case is ready for trial, by a jury, unless a jury is waived, upon the legal issues raised by the pleadings. (Weber v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 447.)

The Court erred in ordering a reformation of the agreement upon the evidence offered in this case.

Hall & Scaniker, for Respondent.

The power of the Court to hear and determine the cause, was not suspended by the appeal from the order refusing change of venue, under the operation of Sec. 353 of the Practice Act. That section has reference to the "preceding sections" (Secs. 346-352), wherein a stay is provided for, of judgments or orders, commanding some act or thing to be done; and the section restricts the stay, in general terms, to "the matter embraced therein;" saving the right of the Court to proceed "upon any other matter." But the section in question clearly was not intended to give to an undertaking, under Sec. 348, the effect of a stay in any case, for the latter section purports only to provide an indemnity against costs and to render the appeal complete, whilst the implication arising from the express directions of the next succeeding section deny to Sec. 348 any greater effect.

Besides, the order of refusal was not an order commanding the plaintiff to do any act or thing; it merely denied to the plaintiff the claim which he made, which was, that he should not be required to go to trial in that Court.

The trial was proceeded with, not by operation of the order, but under provisions of law, and the practice of the Court. (Practice Act, Sec. 356; Merced Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Hicks v. Michael, 15 Id. 108.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This case has been previously before this Court on two separate appeals. One will be found reported in 21 Cal. 122, and the other in 22 Id. 127. In the first appeal the judgment for the defendant was reversed. The second case was an appeal from interlocutory orders, one of which was a denial of a motion to change the venue, in which the action of the Court below was affirmed. While this second appeal was pending, the action was brought on for trial by the defendant, and the plaintiff applied to the Court for a continuance, upon the ground, among others, that the appeal from the order refusing to change the place of trial was still pending. The Court refused the continuance, and compelled the plaintiff to go to trial, which he now assigns as error.

The plaintiff contends that, having filed the undertaking on this appeal in the sum of three hundred dollars, required by Sec. 348 of the Practice Act, the appeal was perfected, and it operated as a stay of all further proceedings in the case in the Court below until such appeal was determined, under the provisions of Sec. 353. We think such is the proper construction of the statute upon the subject. In cases of appeal from an order refusing a change of venue, the statute has required no other or further undertaking than that prescribed by Sec. 348. The necessity that there should be a stay of proceedings in an appeal from such an order is apparent; as otherwise the party appealing might be forced to a trial in the wrong county, before the appeal was determined, and thus he would lose all benefit from his appeal in case the order should be reversed; or else we would be compelled to hold that such reversal would operate as a reversal of any judgment which might in the meantime have been rendered against the appellant.

Sec. 353 was evidently intended to provide for a stay of proceedings in cases of this kind. It is true that that section provides that "the Court below may proceed upon any other matter included in the action, and not affected by the judgment, or order appealed from." But the very matter affected by the order appealed from in this case was the right of the Court below to try the case, and whether the trial should not be had in some other county, before another Court. It was a matter affecting the trial of the case, and no trial could properly be had until the appeal from the order relating to the proper place for that trial had been determined. All other matters, except the trial of the case, could be properly proceeded with during the pendency of the appeal. It follows that the Court erred in refusing the continuance.

The defendant's witnesses testified that Henderson was the agent selected by the creditors to receive the proceeds of the goods for the creditors, and that the William Higgins mentioned in the agreement was but a sub-agent of Henderson; and this was objected to by the plaintiff, on the ground that it was allowing parol testimony to vary the written agreement as to who was to take charge of and sell the goods. We do not consider this objection tenable. It was merely explanatory of the relation of one of the parties to the agent named; Henderson being one of the creditors who signed the agreement. If the creditors saw fit, after the agreement was executed, to change their agent, and put Henderson instead of Higgins to sell the goods, they had a right so to do; and parol proof of that fact was not varying the agreement, but merely showed a subsequent change therein.

The appellant further contends that the Court below erred in finding that there was a mistake in the agreement as alleged in the answer, and erred in correcting the mistake, and in rendering judgment according to the agreement, as thus corrected. The simple question to be determined was, whether one of the terms of the agreement had been omitted by mistake in drafting the contract. It was purely a question of fact, to be determined from all the evidence and all the circumstances of the case. It appears that an agreement had been drawn up by an attorney; but, it being quite voluminous, the parties requested Miller, one of the creditors, to shorten it. He undertook to do so, but by mistake left out one of the terms of the agreement, as drawn up by the attorney, to wit: that the defendant was to be released upon the payment of fifty per cent. upon his debts. It does not appear to be disputed that this was one of the terms of the first instrument drawn by the attorney, and that that instrument embodied the contract of the parties. Although the parol evidence is conflicting, yet this fact is a very strong circumstance to sustain the finding of the Court. We see no more reason for disturbing this finding of the Court in this case than in other cases. The weight of testimony, we think, is in favor of the finding. The judgment should not, therefore, be disturbed on this ground; but as the Court erred in refusing the continuance of the cause, for the reason above given, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

NORTHAM et al. v. GORDON.

THE purchaser of a judgment entered by default, takes it subject to the right of the defendant upon showing sufficient grounds, to have the default and judgment set aside, and to be let in to defend the action; and in this respect stands in no better position than his assignor.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tompkins & Belknap, for Appellants.

Hepburn & Dwinelle, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

A judgment was duly entered against the defendant in this case by default, on the twenty-third day of September, 1862, and immediately, upon the same day, the plaintiffs assigned the judgment to one Kahman. The defendant, a few days afterward, applied to the Court, upon good and sufficient grounds, to set aside the default and judgment, and let him in to defend the action. The assignee of the judgment opposed the motion, on the ground that he was a bona fide purchaser, and that the defendant had no right to such relief, as against him. The Court granted the motion, set aside the default and judgment, and the assignee has taken this appeal. The assignee stands in no better position in this matter than the assignor, as was held by this Court in Wright v. Levy (12 Cal. 262); Fore v. Manlove (18 Id. 436). In purchasing the judgment, he took it subject to the right of the defendant to have the default and judgment set aside upon a proper showing.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action against the defendant as indorser upon a promissory note executed by one H. Davis. The complaint avers that the defendant waived demand, notice, and protest; that he agreed to pay the note, and that the plaintiff might look to him solely for such payment. The case was tried by the Court and a judgment was rendered for the plaintiff; from which, and from an order overruling a motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

On the trial, the plaintiff offered evidence to prove that at the time the note was executed the defendant agreed to pay the note, or that he would see it paid, and that he might look to him for the pay; to which the defendant objected that the agreement of the parties was in writing, consisting of the defendant's signature as indorser of the note, and that his liability under the written indorsement could not be varied by any parol evidence of what occurred before or at the time of the execution of the note and its indorsement; but the Court overruled the objection, and this is assigned as error. The Court clearly erred in this ruling, as it was an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract, and change it from a conditional liability, depending upon a proper demand and notice to the indorser being given to render him liable, to an unconditional promise, by parol evidence of statements made before and at the time of the execution of the written contract. The law deems all such stipulations merged in the writing, which, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, is treated as the exclusive medium of ascertaining the agreement to which the parties bound themselves. (Hoare v. Graham, 8 Camp. 57; Free v. Hawkins, 8 Taunt. 92; Bayley on Bills, Chap. 12, 521-523, and notes.)

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

LATHROP v. MIDDLETON.

A FERRYBOAT used for the transportation of passengers, teams, etc., across a stream is not exempt from execution because the ferry is on the mail route, and the boat is used also to convey the United States mail across the stream. To levy on and sell such boat by virtue of an execution is not an obstruction to the passage of the mail within the meaning of the Act of Congress making it a penal offense to "knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail or of any driver or carrier, or of any horse or carriage carrying the same."

APPEAL from the Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The plaintiff, at the time of the levy of the executions, was and had been for five years a regularly licensed ferryman, having a ferry across Feather River, near the town of Oroville, on the main traveled route from Oroville to Red Bluff.

J. E. N. Lewis, for Appellant.

Smith & Rosenbaum, for Respondent.

By Sec. 21, Wood's Digest, 462, a ferryman is bound to keep good and safe boats at all times, for the crossing of passengers, etc. By Sec. 20, same act, it is provided that all ferrymen shall carry, free of charge, all expresses and dispatches sent by military commanders in time of war or insurrection. Secs. 8 and 9 of Act of Congress of March 3d, 1825, imposes a heavy penalty on a ferryman who neglects to keep a proper ferry, or who refuses or neglects to transport the mails.

Lathrop v. Middleton.

The fact that the boat was not actually in use at the time of levy can make no difference, as a ferryman is bound to keep on hand as many boats as are necessary (Wood's Dig. 562), and complaint clearly shows that said boat was absolutely necessary. To say that nothing is exempt from forced sale unless it is so by express statute, is not supported by the decisions. The money in the hands of the treasurer is not so exempt in an execution against the county; yet this Court held, in Gilman v. Contra Costa County (8 Cal. 52), that such funds are not subject to levy.

By the Statutes of New York, professional, literary, and surgical instruments are not expressly exempt; yet it was held in the Robinson Case (3 Abbott, 466) that such are not subject to levy. A wagon is nowhere exempt by the statute of that State; yet it was held in Eastman v. Coswell (8 How. 75) that a one-horse wagon used by a physician in making his professional visits is not subject to levy, although the same Court had previously decided, in Morse v. Keyes (6 How. 18), that a lumber wagon is not exempt; and the distinction is placed on the ground of public policy. In that case the Court says exemption laws are not only to operate in favor of the debtor, but also in favor of the public.

There is no express statute exempting a Judge's library in this State; yet no one will contend that such a library would be liable to levy. If there is any such rule as exempting property from forced sale from public policy, this case at bar is certainly one of them. When property is of such a nature that an attachment of it would produce a sacrifice and great injury to the defendant, without benefiting the plaintiff, it is not subject to levy. (Drake on Attachment, Sec. 249.) Thus it was held in Wallace v. Parker (8 Vermont, 440) and in Pelthallow v. Dwight (7 Mass. 38), that corn in the field is not subject to levy on execution. So in Worris v. Watson (2 Foster, 364), it was held that a growing crop of grass cannot be attached.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to enjoin the defendant, the Sheriff of Butte County, from selling a ferryboat belonging to the plaintiff under an execution against him, and to require him to release the levy thereon. It appears that the Sheriff, having two executions against the plaintiff, levied the same upon the ferryboat, which was at the time in an unfinished condition, and had never been used at the ferry. The plaintiff contends that the United States mail from Oroville to Shasta crosses the river at his ferry, and therefore his ferryboats are exempt from forced sale on execution. The statute of this State provides what property shall be exempt from sale on execution; but ferryboats, even on mail routes, are not included in the list. Nor is there any Act of Congress which exempts such property.

In Parker v. Porter (6 Louisiana, 169) a levy of an attachment was made on a steamboat used to carry the United States mails; but no mails were on the boat at the time, though they were brought on soon after, and it was held that the levy was valid, and was not an obstruction to the passage of the mail within the Act of Congress making it a penal offense to "knowingly and willfully obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of any driver or carrier, or of any horse or carriage carrying the same;" held, further, that this act must be strictly construed when under its provisions it is sought to protect property used in the transportation of the mails from the pursuit of creditors, in derogation of a right recognized by the laws of the State.

The property in this case was clearly liable to the levy, and the Court erred in enjoining the sale and ordering the defendant to release the levy.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

ROBERTS v. CHAN TIN PEN et al.

THE rule that a party must particularly specify his objections to evidence when offered, applies only to those objections which relate to the question whether the evidence is admissible or not, and does not relate to the question as to the weight to be given to the evidence after it is admitted, or to matters tending to overthrow, contradict, or invalidate it.

Roberts v. Chan Tin Paa.

When the complaint in ejectment is general in its terms, and makes no mention of deeds, and the answer is equally general in its denials, and on the trial plaintiff relies on tax deeds to recover, the defendant has a right to introduce any evidence allowed by the statute, to show the invalidity of the tax deeds, or the title acquired under them.

If the plaintiff relies on tax deeds to recover, the defendant has a right to show that the land assessed to him included a tract in which he had no right, title, interest, or claim.

When the assessment is not of an undivided interest in, but of an entire tract or parcel of land, the Tax Collector has no power or authority to sell an undivided interest therein for the non-payment of taxes.

The owner of the property assessed, and in default of his doing so, the Tax Collector has a right to designate at or before the time of sale any portion less than the whole tract which will be sold; but when this designation is made, the parcel sold must be particularly located by metes and bounds in the general tract, so that the purchaser may know its exact boundaries and what part of the tract remains unsold.

If the description of the tract sold at the time of the sale is general, as "fourteen feet" in a certain lot, the sale is void for uncertainty, and the defect cannot be cured by inserting a proper description in the certificate of purchase or collector's deed.

APPEAL from the Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

S. H. Brodie, for Appellants.

The assessments were void, because the property of the See Yup Company was wrongly assessed, in that an alley eight feet front on Pine Street by one hundred and thirty-seven and one-half feet deep was added to it, which was neither owned, possessed, nor claimed by said company, nor by these defendants; but over it they had the right of way only, and their recorded deed showed it. (3 Kent's Com. 419.)

The Assessor has no power to join in one assessment two pieces of land owned by different persons. (Stat. 1859, 346, Sec. 3; Terrill v. Graves et al., 18 Cal. 149; Barker v. Blake, 36 Me., 433; Blackwell on Tax Titles, 175, 176.)

1st. By such an assessment A would be made to pay B's debt.

2d. Such an assessment is beyond the Assessor's power, because it might deprive the property owner of his right to designate to the collector the piece he wishes sold, should less than the whole suffice to pay the taxes, which right the statute secures to him. (Stat. 1857, 332, Sec. 17.)

3d. An assessment joining A's land with that of B, would be void further, because if A should designate to the collector B's land as the piece to be sold, if less than the whole be taken, and B should designate A's land, the collector could not sell at all, because it is only when the owner fails to designate that the Tax Collector has any power to designate what portion shall be bid upon. (Id.)

The deed of Hunt following the sale of one-eighth was void, because it is only when "an undivided interest is assessed" — which was not the case here — that the Tax Collector can sell an undivided interest. (Id.; Black. on Tax T. 332.)

Again, both deeds were void, because:

1st. Uncertainty of the land sold ("one-eighth" and "fourteen feet"). (Kelsey v. Abbott, 13 Cal. 619.)

2d. Variance between the piece bid on and that described in the said deeds respectively.

3d. The pieces mentioned in and intended to be conveyed by said deeds were not sold at auction, but only at private sale; for only "one-eighth" and "fourteen feet" were knocked off at auction, and the officer had no power to make a private sale. (Black. on Tax T. 313.)

4th. The Tax Collector's act, in conveying by metes and bounds, amounted to an attempted exercise of the power to partition the land between the owner assessed and the supposed purchaser of part.

A partition can only be had by agreement of parties, or else by decree of a Court. Of course, the Tax Collector has no such power given him by law. It would be monstrous if the law should confer such a power; for if the officer may sell a certain number of feet without locating them, and then convey by metes and bounds what portion of the property he pleases, it is easy to see that if an enemy should purchase, the officer might convey to him the least valuable portion; while if a friend was the successful bidder, he would obtain that part of the land which was best located, most valuable, and covered, perhaps, with costly improvements. (Id. 338.)

J. J. Papy, for Respondent.

The defendant objected to the introduction of both these deeds upon the ground that they were null and void upon their faces. The defendant did not offer to show in what the deeds were null and void; therefore, the ruling of the Court was correct. (Kiler et al. v. Kimball et al., 10 Cal. 267; Martin v. Travers, 12 Id. 243.)

The deeds being admitted as evidence without legal objection, or without objection at all, they are "declared to be all the requisites essential to the validity of the sale made for taxes, or assessments." (Stat. 1859, 349, Sec. 23.)

And the deed conveys to the purchaser the absolute title to the lands described in the deed, clear of all encumbrances, etc. (Id.)

And such deed shall be conclusive proof of the matters by it set forth; except, that the Court may examine only in regard to such deed, and may hear any testimony in relation thereto, as follows, etc. (Id.)

The Court has already decided that a defendant is limited to the defenses authorized by statute. (Mills v. Tukey, 22 Cal. 373.)

If the defendants failed to present their objections at the time of the offer of the deeds in evidence, and also failed to allege any one of them as defenses in their answer, then they are estopped from controverting any one of the allegations of the deeds. They are conclusive, so far as they can convey title; and nothing but a superior outstanding title can avail the defendants. This they have not. (For the meaning of the word "conclusive," see Bouvier's Law Dictionary, Burrill, Webster, etc.)

The statute finally determines that all the statements in the deed are true—not to be rebutted. When matters are pronounced "conclusive," they are rendered effectually so, by not permitting the party to give any evidence against them. (Greenl. 204.)

The answer of the defendants, being a simple general denial, they could not avail themselves of any testimony. They could not contradict the plaintiff's evidence, except to show a superior outstanding title in a third party. "Matters in avoidance must be specially pleaded. They cannot be used under an answer which is a simple denial of the allegations of the bill." (Gaskill v. Moore, 4 Cal. 233; Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Id. 22.) In which the Court say: "If the onus of proof is thrown upon defendant, it is new matter." (Payne & Dewey v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 244.)

The first two exceptions in the statute, and the only ones upon which defendants can rely, are:

1st. "That the property, or a larger part of which it is a portion, was not assessed or equalized according to law."

2d. "That the taxes, or a portion of them, were not levied by law, or by some person or body under authority of law."

Plaintiff insists that under these exceptions, the defendants cannot give any evidence relative to the manner of conducting the sale, because the sale, or act of the Tax Collector, is no part of the assessment or equalization; nor is it levying the tax. The assessment, equalization, and unlawful levy of the tax, can alone be examined into, under a proper averment in the answer. Everything else not allowed by statute is excluded, and the deed made conclusive.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover possession of a lot in the City of San Francisco, the plaintiff claiming title thereto under two tax deeds. He recovered judgment, from which the defendants appeal.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence the two tax deeds—one executed by J. Hunt as Tax Collector, under a sale for delinquent taxes for the year 1859–1860, conveying a portion of the premises described in the complaint; and another executed by E. H. Washburn as Tax Collector, under a sale for delinquent taxes for the year 1860–1861, conveying the remainder of the premises.

After the plaintiff had closed his testimony, the defendants introduced in evidence a deed, under which they claimed title, which showed that a lane or alley, eight feet wide, on the west side of the premises deeded to them, was not included therein; and they also offered to prove by a witness, that this alley was not possessed or owned by the defendants, but that it was an open alley, over which the owners of the adjoining property had a right of way only. The Court excluded the testimony, and this ruling is assigned as error. When the tax deeds were offered in evidence, the defendants objected to their introduction, on the ground, first, that no preliminary evidence, laying the basis for their introduction, had been offered; second, that they were void on their face; which objections were overruled by the Court. The complaint in this case is general in its terms, making no reference to the tax deeds, or the peculiar character of the title under which the plaintiff claimed. The answer is equally general in its denials and averments. The respondent insists that the Court properly overruled this objection, because, first, the point it was sought to sustain by the evidence was not specifically made as an objection to the introduction of the tax deeds, citing 10 Cal. 267; 12 Id. 243; second, the matter was not specifically set forth as a defense in the answer. These objections of the respondent also apply to the other evidence offered by defendants attacking the tax deeds, which was ruled out by the Court. The rule that a party must specify his objections to evidence when offered, applies only to those objections which relate to the question whether the evidence is admissible or not, and does not relate to the question as to the weight to be given to the evidence after it is admitted, or to matters tending to contradict, overthrow, or invalidate it. It, therefore, has no application to the present case. The objection that these matters are not set forth in the answer is equally untenable. Under the general denials of the answer, the defendants had a clear right to introduce any evidence allowed by the statute, to show the invalidity of the tax deeds, or the title acquired under them. The respondent also insists, that, as the statute only permits a tax deed to be attacked upon certain points, therefore these points must be specifically stated in the answer. But this is also untenable. The statute expressly declares, that Courts of Law and Equity may examine in regard to such deed, and may hear any testimony in relation thereto to show the points on which the permitted objections are founded. It is a matter, therefore, of evidence, and not of pleading. Besides, as the complaint makes no reference to a tax deed or title, the defendants were not bound to make any reference to it in their answer.

The statute authorized the Court to hear testimony to show "that the property, or a larger parcel, of which it is a portion, was not assessed or equalized, as required by law," and under this the defendants had a right to show that the lot or portion of a lot assessed to them included a tract in which they had no right, title, interest, or claim, and which was not in their possession, charge, or control; and if this eight-foot alley was thus improperly included in the assessment, the defendant had a right to prove those facts. We think, however, that the exclusion of the parol evidence worked no injury in this respect to the defendants; as the deed introduced by them shows that they had an interest in this alley to the extent of a right of way over it, as appurtenant to adjoining property conveyed by the deed. The alley does not appear to have been a public highway. The fact that it was included in the assessment with such adjoining property was not, therefore, sufficient to invalidate the assessment.

The property assessed in 1859, and which is the same as that described in the deed to the defendants, except that it includes the alley, was offered for sale by the Tax Collector in December, 1859, and at that sale plaintiff bought "one-eighth" of the whole premises. The evidence shows that there was no statement or designation made, before or at the time of the sale, to the bidder, of the particular portion or location of the part he should bid on, should less than the whole be taken; nor was any designation thereof made until the certificates of purchase were made out, which was from two weeks to two months after the sale.

The property assessed in 1860 is also the same as that described in defendant's deed, except that it includes the alley; and it was offered for sale by the Tax Collector in December, 1860, when the plaintiff purchased "fourteen feet" of the premises. No designation was made, at the time of the sale, of the particular portion to be taken by the purchaser, when less than the whole property was bid for. The evidence shows that this fourteen feet was not located or specifically designated until some time after the sale.

The deeds made in pursuance of these sales do not conform to the purchases made in any respect. The Hunt deed, instead of conveying the "one-eighth" of the premises assessed, describes an irregular tract, three feet one and one-quarter inches wide at one end, and eight feet seven and one-eighth inches at the other, and running across the premises one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches in length. The Washburn deed conveys a strip fourteen feet wide at each end, and running across the premises one hundred and thirty-seven feet six inches in length, and includes a portion of the premises conveyed by the Hunt deed.

The statute under which the sale was made (Wood's Dig. 619, Sec. 17) authorized the owner of the property to designate, prior to the commencement of the sale, what portion of the property he wishes bid on; but, if he did not so designate, "then the Tax Collector shall designate; and the person who will take the least quantity or smallest part of the land; or, in case an undivided interest is assessed, then the smallest portion of such interest, etc., etc., shall be declared to be the purchaser." It will be noticed that it is only in case that an "undivided interest is assessed," that a portion of such interest can be bid for. In this case, no undivided interest in the property was assessed; and the Tax Collector had no power or authority to sell an undivided interest therein to the plaintiff. It is clear also, that the intention of the statute is, that, when there is a sale of a less portion than the whole, and the owner has not designated the portion he wishes sold, and the Tax Collector is thus authorized to designate, such designation must be made before or at the time of the sale of the particular tract put up for sale, and that such designation cannot be made afterward. By the terms used in the statute, it is evident that the designation, whether by the owner or by the Tax Collector, must precede the actual sale to the purchaser. And, independent of these terms, if the statute had left it ambiguous, the necessity of such designation before the property is sold is apparent. It is important that the purchaser shall know what portion of the premises he is purchasing, that he may be able to bid understandingly; and it is of the greatest importance to the owner, as thereby the competition will be closer among the bidders. Besides, if the designation is not made until afterward, a door is left open for the grossest frauds. It follows, that there was not, in fact, any sale of the particular tracts described in the tax deeds. The property really sold was not sufficiently described to enable it to be located, or to render the sale valid. If the tax deeds had correctly described the tracts really sold according to the facts; that is, "one-eighth" and "fourteen feet" of the assessed premises—they would have been clearly void for uncertainty of description. It does not show whether the "fourteen feet" are fourteen square feet or fourteen feet square, or in what portion of the premises it was intended to be located—whether on any side or in the center; and the same difficulty exists as to the "one-eighth." This uncertainty of description could not be remedied after the sale by the Tax Collector; for that would be virtually attempting to make a new sale, not at public auction, but in the most private manner. This objection to the title claimed under the tax deeds is properly included within the statutory provision upon this subject, which permits proof "that, at a proper time and place, the property was not sold at public auction, by a proper officer or by a person acting de facto as such officer." It in fact shows, that the property attempted to be conveyed by the tax deeds was never sold at all. It follows, that the tax deeds conveyed no title to the purchaser.

Sec. 32 of the Revenue Law in force at the time these taxes were levied and sales were made (Wood's Digest, 623), provides, that every tax levied under the provisions of that act shall be a judgment against the person and a lien upon the property assessed, "which judgment shall not be satisfied or the lien be removed, until the taxes are all paid or the property has absolutely vested in a purchaser under a sale for taxes." Sec. 20 also provides that this lien of the State is transferred to and vested in the purchaser at the tax sale, upon filing the certificate of purchase with the County Recorder; and it can only be divested by payment of the taxes and a per centage. No title having vested in the purchaser under this sale for taxes, it is a question whether this lien for taxes does not still exist upon the property; and also whether, under Sec. 20, the purchaser cannot in equity be subrogated to the rights of the State, and enforce this lien accordingly. But, as these questions have not been discussed by the counsel for the parties, and were not raised in the Court below, it is unnecessary to determine them at the present time.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Holmes v. Ohm.

HOLMES v. OHM et al.

IN an action on an undertaking on appeal, it is a sufficient averment of the delivery of the undertaking, if the complaint show that it was filed in the Clerk's office.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

John Reynolds, for Appellant.

W. W. Chipman, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon an undertaking on appeal. The defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not aver any delivery. The complaint avers that the defendants executed the undertaking sued on, copying the same in full into the complaint, with the indorsement thereon, showing that the undertaking was filed in the Clerk's office on the twenty-seventh day of March, 1862. This is clearly sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover thereon. These undertakings are not required by the statute to be delivered to the obligee when executed, but to be filed in the Clerk's office, for the use and benefit of the parties entitled to them.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

JACKSON et al. v. THE SACRAMENTO VALLEY RAIL-ROAD COMPANY.

THE liability of a railroad company, as common carriers, differs from their liability as warehousemen.

As common carriers, they are bound to safely transport and deliver goods to the point of their destination, unless the same are lost by the act of God or the public enemy; and the burden of proving that they are thus lost, rests upon the company.

When the goods arrive at the point of destination, and are placed in the warehouse of the company, its liability as warehousemen commences, and from that time it is bound only to use ordinary care and diligence in safely keeping and delivering the goods; and the burden of proof in case of loss is on the bailor. In an action against a railroad company for loss of goods as common carriers, where the proofs render it uncertain whether the goods are lost while being transported, or after being deposited in the warehouse, and there is no proof of want of ordinary care, the judgment will be reversed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

William S. Wood, for Appellants.

The transportation of goods, and the storage of goods, are contracts of a different character; and though one person or company may render both services, yet the two contracts are not to be confounded, or blended, because the legal liabilities attending the two are different. (Thomas v. Boston & Prov. B. Corp., 10 Met. 476.)

And where such suitable warehouses are provided, and the goods which are not called for on their arrival at their places of destination are unloaded and separated from the goods of other persons, and stored safely in such warehouses or depots, the duty of the proprietors, as common carriers, is in our judgment terminated. They have done all they agreed to do, etc. (Thomas v. Boston & Prov. B. Corp., 10 Met. 477.)

If for any cause the consignee is not at the place to receive his goods from the cars, as unladen, and in consequence of this they are placed in the depot, the transit ceases. (Norway Plains Co. v. Boston & M. R., 1 Gray, 276; Rowe v. Pickford, 8 Taunt. 83; In re Webb, Id. 443; Foster v. Frampton, 6 Barn. & Cres. 107.)

When goods were conveyed by a carrier by water, and deposited in the carrier's warehouse for the convenience of the vendor, to be delivered out as he should want: held, that the transit was at an end, etc. (Allan v. Grippen, 6 Crompt. & Jerv. 218.) As a common carrier, defendant was responsible for the goods, at all events, and plaintiffs were only required to show that they never received the goods; while as a warehouseman, defendant is only liable for ordinary negligence, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to show that defendant failed to exercise that care of the goods which prudent men ordinarily exercise in the care of their own property. With certain exceptions, which will hereafter be taken notice of, as to innkeepers and common carriers, it would seem that the burden of proof of negligence is on the bailor, and proof merely of loss is not sufficient to put the bailee on his defense. (Story on Bail. Sec. 410; Tompkins v. Saltmarsh, 14 Sergt. & Rawle, 272.) When the loss is shown, the proof of negligence or want of due care is thrown upon the bailor, and the bailee is not bound to prove affirmatively that he used reasonable care. (2 Kent's Com. 791; Bunyan v. Caldwell, 7 Humph. 134.)

A warehouseman not chargeable with negligence is not responsible for goods intrusted to him, when stolen or embezzled by his storekeeper or servant, and the onus of showing negligence is on the owners. (Schmidt v. Blood, 9 Wend. 268; Finnucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 319.)

H. O. Beatty, for Respondents.

This case is reduced to a single proposition. A warehouseman takes goods to store for hire. The depositor demands them, and he cannot or will not account for them. Is this not sufficient evidence of carelessness? If not, it would always be in the power of a warehouseman to eat, to burn, or otherwise consume all such articles as were suitable for food, fuel, or other consumption, and the depositor could never make proof of his losses.

The common law never made any such foolish rules. He who takes an article to keep for hire, must return it or account for its loss. When the keeper has shown the loss by fire, by theft, or robbery, then the burden of proof as to negligence may be thrown on the depositor; but not until then. This rule is clearly laid down in a note to a case in 7 Cow. 501, 3d Ed.: "The distinction would seem to be, that when there is a total default to deliver the goods bailed, on demand, the onus of accounting for the default lies with the bailee; otherwise he shall be deemed to have converted the goods to his own use, and trover will lie (2 Salt. 655); but when he has shown a loss, or where the goods are injured, the law will not intend negligence. The onus is then shifted upon the plaintiff." None of the authorities cited by the appellants contradict this rule. Appellants' counsel first quotes part of a section from Story on

Jackson v. Sacramento Valley Railroad Co.

Bailments. It is only necessary to read the balance of the section, to show how limited and inapplicable to this case is the rule laid down.

The quotation from Kent is in conformity to respondents' views: "When the loss is shown," that is, theft, robbery, etc., "then the burden of proving negligence is shifted to the plaintiff." So in the case from 9 Wendell. The embezzlement by the storekeeper's servant being shown, the negligence of the master must be proved. In the case of Schmidt v. Blood (9 Wend. 271), the Court uses this expression: "The onus of showing negligence seems to be on the plaintiff, unless there is a total fault in delivering or accounting for the goods." Here is the case in a nutshell — there was a total failure to account for the goods in dispute. Not having accounted for them, the presumption is, the bailee, either negligently or intentionally, converted them. But whatever the legal presumption might be, there was some evidence tending to show negligence. The inability of the bailees to give any account of the goods was at least some evidence of carelessness. It satisfied the jury and the Court below. It is not a case for the interference of this Court.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action against the defendants, as common carriers, for the value of certain goods received by them as such, and which it is alleged they failed to deliver to the plaintiff. The case was tried by a jury, who, under the direction of the Court, found the following special verdict: "1st. Were the packages of goods in question in this suit, at the depôt of defendant, among other packages of the plaintiffs at the time the agent of plaintiffs signed the receipts for the same? Answer: No. 2d. Were the packages in question delivered to and received by the agent of plaintiffs? Answer: No. 3d. Were the said packages lost to plaintiffs by the carelessness, want of ordinary care, or ordinary negligence of defendants or their agents? Answer: Yes." On this verdict the Court rendered a judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum of two hundred and five dollars and costs of suit; from which defendants appeal.

One important question involved in this case is the extent of liability incurred by railroad companies engaged in the transportation of goods. There is no doubt that after they receive goods, and while the same are being transported from the place of receipt, and until they arrive at the depôt or warehouse of the company where they are to be delivered, the latter are bound to perform all the duties and incur all the liabilities and responsibilities of common carriers. Although the general rule is, that goods received by a common carrier must be actually delivered to the consignee at his residence or place of business, yet this rule is varied by well established customs and usages. Thus, it does not apply to railroad companies, whose well-established custom is to receive and deliver goods at regular stations and depôts or warehouses, and who do not assume any obligations to receive or deliver goods at any other places. After goods are received, and while they are in transitu from the station or depôt where they are received to the station or depôt where they are to be delivered, they are acting as common carriers, and are liable as such accordingly; but when the goods arrive at the proper depôt for delivery, if the consignee or his agent is not present ready to receive them, it is the duty of the company to deposit them in their warehouse for safe keeping until the consignee is ready to receive them, or at least to keep them a reasonable time for that purpose. But their liability as common carriers ceases in such cases when the goods are deposited in the warehouse; and from that time their liability as warehousemen commences, and continues until they deliver the goods to the consignee, or in case of his unreasonable delay, they place them in charge of some other warehouseman, to keep for the consignee. (Angell on Carriers, Secs. 301-305; Story on Bailments, Sec. 448.)

If the goods are lost, injured, or destroyed while they are in the custody of the railroad company as common carriers, or if they fail to deliver them at the proper place, either to the consignee or in their warehouse, they are liable to the owner as common carriers, under the rules of law relating thereto; but if they are safely delivered in the proper warehouse of the company and afterwards lost, injured, destroyed, or not delivered to the proper person, then their liability is that of warehousemen, and not of common carriers. The liabilities of these two classes of persons is entirely different, and it is, therefore, important that the point of change of liability should be clearly defined. In this respect the special verdict is fatally defective, as it does not find whether or not the goods in question were deposited in the warehouse of the company; but it merely finds that they were not in the depôt "among other packages of plaintiffs at the time the agent of plaintiffs signed the receipt for the same," which the evidence shows was not given until several days afterwards. This finding is merely to the effect that they were not with a particular lot of goods in the depôt; but it leaves the important facts whether they had not been deposited in the depôt, and whether they were not at some other place in the depôt at that time, uncertain and undetermined.

It was the duty of the defendants, as common carriers, to safely deliver the goods at Folsom, the termination of their road, at all events, unless the goods were lost by the act of God, or the public enemy; and the burden of proof to show that the goods were so lost was upon them. But as warehousemen, they were bound only to use ordinary care and diligence in safely keeping and delivering the goods; and the burden of proof, in case of loss, to show that such loss occurred for want of ordinary care and diligence on their part, is upon the plaintiff. (Story on Bail. Secs. 444-451, 454.)

But the plaintiff contends that it can make no difference in what character the defendants are to be held liable, as the jury found, by their special verdict, that the goods were lost by the carelessness and want of ordinary care, or negligence of the defendants. On the other hand, the defendants insist that the complaint charges them as common carriers, and not as warehousemen; and that the plaintiff is therefore bound to prove that the loss occurred before the goods reached the depot at Folsom. We do not think this objection of the defendants to the complaint sufficient to justify us in reversing the judgment on that ground. Although the complaint is very specific in charging the defendants as common carriers; yet we do not see that they have been taken by surprise in any way, or misled thereby, or prevented from setting up every defense they may have had to the action. In this class of cases, there is certainly great propriety in stating the two characters in which the defendants acted; but it is not, perhaps, essential to the sufficiency of the complaint.

Jackson v. Sacramento Valley Railroad Co.

The defendants also insist, that this third finding of the special verdict is contrary to the evidence, and that the evidence showed clearly that the goods in question were safely deposited in the warehouse of the defendants at Folsom; and that the plaintiff, on whom the burden of proof lay, failed to produce any evidence of carelessness or negligence on their part; but on the contrary, the defendants proved the greatest degree of care in the matter. We have examined the evidence, and these positions of the defendants are fully sustained by the record. It is not a case of conflict of testimony, where the jury are the sole judges; but there is a total want of proof by the plaintiff, of negligence on the part of the defendants as warehousemen.

The proof of care on the part of the defendants is full and ample; and these facts, in connection with the failure to find whether the loss occurred before, or after, the arrival of the cars at Folsom, leave the questions involved in this case in such a state of uncertainty as to render a new trial necessary, in order that all the questions involved in the case may be fully and properly determined under the rules of law applicable to such cases.

It seems that when the plaintiff's agent called at the defendants' depôt at Folsom, for the goods, he signed a receipt for all the plaintiff's goods; which receipt included not only the goods in controversy, but a large number of packages of other goods received at the depôt at about the same time. A question arose as to the effect of this receipt. The receipt thus given is prima facie, but not conclusive, evidence of the delivery of the goods to the plaintiff. It was open to explanation and proof, to show that although the delivery of the goods was acknowledged, yet that in fact they were not thus delivered. (Hawley v. Bader, 15 Cal. 46.) But the burden of proof in such case is upon the plaintiff, to show any error or mistake in the receipt.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Whitney v. Stone.

WHITNEY v. STONE.

WHEN an agreement in writing is entered into under the three hundred and eightieth section of the Practice Act, to submit questions of difference relative to the partition of lands to the award of arbitrators, and the arbitrators meet and make their award, a Court of Equity will decree a specific performance of the award.

The fact that such agreement contains a clause by which each party binds himself to the other in a sum certain, as a penalty, in case he refuses to abide by and perform the award, does not deprive a Court of Equity of its power to decree a specific performance, even though the party refusing to perform should offer to pay the penalty agreed upon.

APPEAL from the District Court, Ninth Judicial District, Siskiyou County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

E. Steele, for Appellants.

J. Berry, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action for the specific performance of an award made by arbitrators, under and in pursuance of an agreement made by the parties. The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The Court sustained the demurrer, holding that the remedy of the plaintiff was not by a suit for a specific performance, but an action to recover the penalty of five hundred dollars stipulated in the agreement, submitting the matters in controversy to the arbitrators, and agreeing to abide by and perform the award. A final judgment was rendered against the plaintiff, from which he appeals.

The complaint avers that the defendant, on the thirty-first day of October, 1860, conveyed to the plaintiff the undivided one-half of certain tracts of land in Siskiyou County, and that they then entered into a partnership and farmed the land as copartners until the twenty-second of March, 1862, when differences and misunder-

Whitney v. Stone.

standings having arisen between them relative to the farm and the business, they entered into an agreement to submit the same to arbitrators. This agreement is set out in the complaint, and recites that a controversy existed between the parties relative to the control and management of their partnership farm, and they therein agreed "to submit the controversy to be settled by a division of the said farm, together with all the improvements and appurtenances thereunto belonging," to certain persons therein named as arbitrators; and they further agreed therein to abide by, keep, and perform the award made by such arbitrators; and they also bound themselves each to the other in the sum of five hundred dollars, "to be due and subject to immediate collection by either one at the time and after the other shall have refused to abide by, keep, and perform toward the other according to the award of said arbitrators." The complaint further avers that the arbitrators duly met and made their award, by which they divided the ranch between the parties, specifying the lines of division, providing for the removal of fences to the partition lines by the parties, each to bear half the expense of such removal; and it was further awarded that the plaintiff should give to the defendant his two promissory notes for one hundred and fifty dollars each; that the parties should cancel all bonds and obligations in reference to the purchase money of the ranch; that the defendant should give to the plaintiff a new bond for the south half of the ranch, which they had awarded to the latter, for a warranty deed to be given, as soon as the defendant should have perfected his title; that the plaintiff should give a new obligation for the payment of the purchase money of the land; and other awards about the use of the water on the ranch; and a division of the personal property between the parties, which division was then made, and the property as divided delivered to the parties. The complaint avers that the plaintiff has performed in part, and is ready and willing to perform all the award required of him; that he duly executed and delivered the two promissory notes as required by the award, but the defendant has refused to execute any bond, covenant, or assurance as required by the award, though requested so to do; that all of the award has been complied with by both parties, except as to the conveyance of the real estate and the removal of the fences; that the defendant is in the possession of the premises and refuses to let the plaintiff enjoy the exclusive possession of the premises partitioned to him by the award; and that he has tendered to the defendant the proper releases and bonds, duly executed, and also tendered a proper deed for the defendant to execute, which he refused to do.

Under Sec. 380 of the Practice Act, the parties had a right to submit the question relating to the partition of the land to the award of the arbitrators. The Court erred in holding that the plaintiff could not maintain a suit for a specific performance of the award, and that he was confined to an action to recover the penalty stipulated in the articles of submission. Courts of Equity have, in numerous cases, decreed the specific performance of awards, though not made rules or orders of Court for the performance of some specific thing, such as the conveyance of an estate, an assignment of securities, and the like. (Fry on Specific Performance, Sec. 974.) It makes no difference that the agreement contains a stipulation to pay a certain sum as a penalty in case of a non-compliance with or refusal to perform the award. A Court of Equity looks to the substance of the agreement, and not to its form, and will afford the party a remedy by decreeing a specific performance, where such relief is proper; and it will not suffer the party to escape from a specific performance, even if he should offer to pay the penalty agreed upon. (Chamberlain v. Blue, 6 Blackf. 491; 2 Story's Eq. Secs. 715, 751.) It follows that the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the defendant is ordered to answer the complaint within ten days after service of notice of the filing of the remittitur in the Court below.

BARTHOLOMEW v. HOOK AND WIFE.

A JUDGMENT recovered against the husband, after the first day of June, 1862, and before the filing of a declaration of homestead, becomes a lien on the homestead property, and renders it liable to be sold under the execution issued on the judgment.

Bartholomew v. Hook.

If, however, after the judgment is docketed, the wife file a declaration of homestead, she acquires thereby such an interest in the homestead, as to enable her to maintain an action against the Sheriff to compel him to exhaust the husband's personal property, before proceeding to sell the homestead.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John B. Hall, for Appellant.

Tod Robinson, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by a wife against the Sheriff of San Joaquin County and others, to enjoin him from selling a certain lot which she claims as a homestead, on an execution against her husband, and to require him to levy upon the personal property of her husband for the satisfaction of the execution. The case was tried by the Court, and a judgment was rendered for the defendants, from which she appeals.

It appears that the house and lot in question has been occupied by the plaintiff and her husband as their homestead ever since June, 1859; but no declaration of homestead was made and filed until the plaintiff did so on the eleventh day of June, 1862. On the sixth day of June, 1862, the husband confessed a judgment for $1,000, in favor of the defendant Huffman, on which an execution issued June 7th, which was levied upon the lot in question; and the Sheriff was about to sell the property when this action was commenced, and a temporary injunction granted. It appears that the husband has a large amount of personal property liable to levy and sale on execution, valued at about $5,000, as well as other assets, which the wife contends should be first levied upon and sold, before the real estate can be sold; and also claims that the property levied upon is her homestead, and therefore not liable to sale on execution. The plaintiff notified the Sheriff, that she claimed the property as her homestead, and also gave him notice of the personal property liable to execution, and required him to first levy on and sell the same. It also appears that the defendant Huffman holds a mortgage for $4,000 on a portion of the personal property.

Under the provisions of the Homestead Law, as amended in 1862 (Stats. 1862, 519, 520), the time for the filing the declaration of homestead was extended to June 1st, 1862; and Sec. 6, as amended, provides that the filing of such declaration, after that date, shall not "affect or impair any alienation, sale, mortgage, or other contract or lien lawfully executed or obtained prior to the time of the filing for record of such declaration." The declaration of homestead not having been filed, in this case, until after the first day of June, and after the judgment lien had attached, it follows that the homestead is liable to be sold under the execution issued on the judgment.

But the first clause of the two hundred and tenth section of the Practice Act requires that an execution of this kind against the property of the debtor "shall require the Sheriff to satisfy the judgment, with interest, out of the personal property of such debtor, and if sufficient personal property cannot be procured, then out of his real property." Under this law, it was clearly the duty of the Sheriff to levy upon and first sell the personal property of the execution debtor; and then, if the proceeds of the same proved insufficient, he should have proceeded and sold the real property of the debtor. Especially was this his duty, when notified by the plaintiff, and required to levy upon the personal property.

There may be cases in which the execution debtor would have the right to direct the sale of his real estate, in preference to his personal property (Maybury v. Jones, 4 Yeates, 21); but that right cannot be exercised so as to prejudice the rights of other persons. The plaintiff had such an interest in the homestead that the husband could not direct that property to be sold, before exhausting his personal property, without her consent, or contrary to her wishes. The Sheriff disobeyed the command of his writ, and exceeded his authority, in refusing to levy upon and first sell the personal property. The Court therefore erred in rendering a judgment in favor of the defendants.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

People v. Smith.

THE PEOPLE v. SMITH.

WHERE the bailee of property obtains possession of it from the owner, with the intent of stealing it, and carries out that intent, he is guilty of larceny, and should be indicted for that crime.

If, however, the intent to steal did not exist at the time of taking possession of the property by the bailee, but was conceived afterwards, the indictment should be laid under the seventy-first section of the Act concerning Crimes and Punishments.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions, of the County of Sacramento.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Rodgers and McConnell, for Appellant.

F. M. Pixley, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

The defendant was indicted and convicted of the crime of grand larceny, in stealing a horse. The evidence showed that the defendant hired the horse of the keepers of a livery stable, and in that way obtained the possession. The defendant insists that the Court below erred in admitting evidence of these facts, under the indictment, claiming that it showed that the defendant had committed an offense indictable under the seventy-first section of the act relating to crimes and punishments. This objection is not well taken. If the defendant, at the time he hired the horse, intended to steal it, he was properly indicted for grand larceny; and the evidence was therefore admissible, without averring the alleged bailment in the indictment. (People v. Jersey, 18 Cal. 337.) If, however, the intent to steal did not exist at the time of taking the possession of the property by the bailee, but was conceived afterwards, then the indictment should have been laid under Sec. 71, and should have averred the facts necessary to show that the defendant was the bailee of the property. (People v. Poggi, 19 Cal. 600.)

The defendant asked the Court to instruct the jury as follows: "If the jury find that the defendant hired the horse of the persons named in the indictment as the owners thereof, and converted the same, of which he was bailee, to his own use, with intent to steal the same, he cannot be convicted under the indictment as charged, and must be acquitted." He also asked for another instruction subsequently to the same effect, both of which the Court refused; and this is assigned as error. The instructions, as asked by the defendant, were correctly refused. As has been already shown, the defendant could properly be convicted under the indictment, if the intent to steal existed at the time he obtained possession of the horse; and this point is entirely ignored in the instructions asked for.

The Court, after fully and correctly charging the jury that the "intent to steal" and the "felonious intent" must have existed at the time he acquired possession of the property, in reiterating it used the word "fraudulent" instead of the word "felonious," in several places; and this is assigned for error. Although the word "fraudulent" was thus improperly used instead of "felonious," yet it is evident that the jury were not misled thereby, and the defendant suffered no injury in consequence of it. The Court had repeatedly used the word "felonious," and terms of equivalent import, in the charge, in explaining this very point; and taking the whole charge together, as given by the Court, the jury could not have misunderstood the meaning of the Court. The evidence is sufficient to show that the defendant acquired possession of the property with the felonious intent of stealing the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

THE PEOPLE v. O'CONNELL et al.

A judgment by default should not be set aside by the Court, unless the defendant shows by competent proof, that the judgment was entered through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect on his part; and the payment of costs should be imposed as a condition of setting aside the judgment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

People v. O'Connell.

Mark Shepard, for Appellants.

E. W. F. Sloan, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order setting aside a judgment by default, entered in an action for delinquent taxes. The judgment was rendered on the twenty-fifth day of March, 1862, against the defendant O'Connell and the real estate described in the complaint, for the amount of taxes, per centage, and costs. The record shows that the summons was duly served on the defendant O'Connell and the real estate in the manner prescribed by the statute, on the thirtieth day of January, 1862, and that defaults were duly entered on the seventeenth day of February and the twenty-fifth day of March. On the ninth day of June, 1862, the defendants, without any affidavit or other showing, moved the Court to vacate the judgment, which was granted, and an order was entered accordingly, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

Sec. 68 of the Practice Act authorizes the Court, "upon such terms as may be just, and upon payment of costs, to relieve any party or his legal representatives from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." The order itself is erroneous, in not imposing the payment of costs, as a condition of setting aside the judgment. But the Court also erred in making the order in the absence of any showing or proof on the part of the defendant, that the judgment was entered through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect on his part. The facts should be made to appear by affidavit, or other proper proof, showing that the case is one provided for by said section to authorize the Court to make the order.

The order is reversed.

Kittredge v. Stevens.

KITTREDGE v. STEVENS.

AN order made by a Court on a motion is a final adjudication upon the subject matter, unless appealed from within the statutory time; nor can the statutory time for appeal be extended by subsequent renewal of the motion, even if it be varied in its terms, provided it is substantially the same motion.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Spencer & Reichert, for Appellants.

Brown & Whitman, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action for the recovery of a debt due on a promissory note, and to enforce an alleged lien upon certain real estate purchased by the defendant with the money for which the note was executed. The case has been previously before this Court, and will be found reported in 16 Cal. 381. That was an appeal from a judgment for the equitable relief claimed in the complaint, rendered subsequent to a personal judgment for the amount of the debt; and this Court held that such second judgment, for the additional relief, was improperly granted, and therefore reversed the decree. When the case went back to the Court below, the plaintiff moved to set aside the personal money judgment entered by the Clerk upon the default, which motion was sustained by the Court, and the order entered accordingly on the seventeenth day of May, 1861. To this motion the defendant objected, and filed his bill of exceptions. The plaintiff also moved the Court for a new decree against the defendant, which was heard on testimony reported by one Theobald, and on file in the cause, and on the pleadings and papers on file, and the Court, on the eighteenth day of May, 1861, denied the motion for a decree. Afterward, on the fourteenth day of January, 1862, the plaintiff again made the same motion for a decree, in conformity with the prayer for relief contained in the complaint, which was denied by the Court, and an appeal was taken from this last order refusing to enter a decree, which it appears, was afterwards dismissed. On the twenty-fifth day of April, 1862, the plaintiff applied to the Clerk to enter a decree upon the original default, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, which the Clerk declined to do; and the plaintiff, then, on the twentieth day of January, 1863, moved the Court for an order directing the Clerk to enter in the judgment book a decree which had been signed by the Judge of the Court, and filed on the twenty-first day of January, 1860, in vacation; and that upon such entry the Clerk issue an order of sale, which motion was denied, and this appeal is taken from this order denying said motion.

The decree, signed and filed by the Judge, January 21st, 1860, is the same in terms as the decree rendered May 10th, 1860, and from which the defendant appealed to this Court, and which this Court reversed on such appeal. The validity of that judgment or decree has therefore been adjudicated and determined by this Court. The mere fact that the plaintiff has since, on his own motion, had the previous money judgment set aside, does not avoid the effect of this final adjudication. Nor can its effect be avoided by this motion to enter a judgment in the judgment book upon a decree signed and filed by the Judge, previous to the one appealed from, and which is the same in its terms. The decree rendered May 10th, 1860, was reversed, because there had been a final judgment previously rendered in the action; and this objection applies equally to the decree filed January 21st, 1860, and which the plaintiff sought by his motion appealed from to have entered in the judgment book.

Further, the plaintiff, on the eighteenth day of May, 1861, and again, on the fourteenth day of January, 1862, moved the Court for substantially the same relief sought by this motion of January 20th, 1863, from which this appeal is taken. The first two motions were made for the entry of a decree, and the last one, that the Clerk enter the decree in the judgment book; and though they thus differ in terms, yet they are substantially the same. If the Court erred in its action on these motions, the error was committed on the eighteenth day of May, 1861, and the appeal should have been from the order then entered, and within the time required by the statute. This limitation of the statutory time for an appeal cannot be evaded by subsequent renewals of the motion, even though they be varied in their terms, provided they are substantially the same.

We do not consider that the original money judgment entered by the Clerk upon default was absolutely void. The plaintiff, if he saw proper, had a clear right to waive this claim to relief by sale of the property demanded in his complaint, and rely upon a money judgment alone; and that was substantially the effect of his taking such a judgment, and especially when he took out execution thereon to enforce it. The right of a Clerk to enter a mere money judgment upon a default cannot be denied. When the plaintiff elected to take a money judgment, he waived his right to any further relief.

For these reasons, there was no error in the refusal of the Court to make the order, and it is therefore affirmed.

MEEKER et al. v. HARRIS.

THE Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review the action of the District Court on appeal from an order recalling an execution for costs or refusing to issue one, when the amount of costs exceeds two hundred dollars.

If items are included in the bill of costs which are not properly taxable, it affords no just ground for refusing to issue an execution or recalling one; but the remedy is by motion to retax.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. H. Gass, for Appellants.

Hereford & Williams, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

Meeker v. Harris.

This is an appeal from an order made by the Court below after judgment, directing the return of an execution issued on the judgment for the costs, and also from an order refusing to issue an execution on the same judgment for the costs. The respondent objects that this Court has no jurisdiction of the appeal, because the matter in dispute relates entirely to the costs. It is true that the matter in dispute relates to the costs, but as those costs exceed the sum of two hundred dollars, the case is within the jurisdiction of this Court. In the cases of Dumphy v. Guindon (13 Cal. 28) and Votan v. Reese (20 Cal. 89), referred to by the respondent, the matter in dispute related entirely to the subsequent matter of the action; and it was held that the costs were merely incidental to the action, and could not therefore be added to the demand sued for in order to give this Court jurisdiction. Those cases differ essentially from the present, as the alleged error in the action of the Court below affected not the subject matter of the action, but only the incidental matter of costs. The costs of an action may become a matter in dispute, as much so as the principal subject of the action; and when they amount to a sum sufficient to bring the case within the jurisdiction of this Court, its jurisdiction attaches. This objection of the respondent is therefore overruled.

The plaintiffs are entitled to an execution for the costs due on the judgment in accordance with the decree of the District Court, as modified, on appeal, by this Court. If they have included in their bills of costs items to which they are not legally entitled, the remedy of the defendants is by motion to retax the costs and to strike out the objectionable items, and the Court, under its general power over its own process and writs, could order a stay of proceedings on the execution until such motion could be heard and determined. But the mere fact that some of the items of costs are not legally chargeable against the defendants, affords no just ground for recalling the execution or denying another.

The orders of the Court below, appealed from, are therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

The above decision relates to the Constitution as it existed before the recent amendments.—REPORTER.

O'Grady v. Barnhisel.

O'GRADY v. BARNHISEL.

A ~~sale~~ executed by a collector of taxes for property sold for non-payment of taxes, which recites generally that the property was duly assessed, and that the taxes were levied upon it according to law, is prima facie evidence of title in the grantee, and is entitled to be received in evidence as such without any further proofs.

It is not necessary that a deed for taxes recite each act of the officers in making the assessment and levying the tax, etc., but a general recitation of the conclusions resulting from those acts is sufficient.

Such a deed is prima facie evidence that all the proceedings in relation to the tax were regular and in accordance with law, and the burden of showing that any irregularity occurred, is thrown upon the one asserting its invalidity.

An assessment of land to "A B, and all claimants, known and unknown," is valid and effectual as against the property, even if A B was neither the owner of, nor in possession of the property at the time of the assessment.

The tax law creates two remedies, one against the person and the other against the property, each having a distinct and separate existence; and a mistake in the name of the person to whom the property should have been assessed, does not affect the validity of the tax as against the property itself.

The expense of filing a certificate of sale in the Recorder's office, is not a proper item of costs to be charged by the collector at the sale.

A slight mistake made by the collector in computing the amount of taxes and costs, by which the property was sold for a small sum more than the amount actually due, does not invalidate the sale, particularly when it is not made to appear that the owner of the land suffered any injury by the mistake.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John Currey, for Appellant.

If the real estate to be assessed or listed has an owner, who is known to the Assessor (and who may in most cases be known to him, if he seeks by diligent inquiry and examination to ascertain his name), it should be assessed to him. Or if the owner be unknown to the Assessor, but the property is in the possession, charge, or control of a person, firm, or corporation, it should be so listed. If the owner be unknown to the Assessor, and the land is unoccupied, then, and not until then, can the Assessor lawfully assess or list the same as the property of an unknown owner.

The premises demanded in this case were listed and assessed, as appears by said certificate to "Joaquin Castro and wife, and all claimants and owners, known or unknown." Who, from this designation, could determine to whom the land was assessed? Was it assessed to Castro and wife, or to the claimants and owners known, or to the claimants and owners unknown? To which of the three classes of persons, and who were "all claimants and owners known?"

Again: Another objection to the certificate and tax deed, rendering the same radically insufficient as prima facie evidence of title to the premises in the purchaser at the tax sale, consists in the fact that the matters which the statute requires should be stated in the certificate (Sec. 18), and again stated in the deed (Sec. 22), are not stated except in general terms, following almost literally the language of the statute. The statute (Sec. 18) provides that the Tax Collector shall issue to the purchaser a certificate stating substantially the facts constitutive of the authority of the Tax Collector to sell and convey the premises, among which are, that the property was assessed, giving (when known) the name of the person to whom it was assessed; that taxes were levied upon it according to law; that these taxes had not been paid; that publication of the intention to sell for taxes was made, as provided by law, and describing the manner of said publication, etc. The Tax Collector seemed to content himself with a statement in his certificate and deed, that "Taxes for State and County purposes were duly levied by the Legislature, and by the Board of Supervisors of Contra Costa County, for the year 1858-1859, upon all property within said county, not exempt by law from execution;" also, that "all of said property was duly assessed by the Assessor of said county," and that the premises in controversy, according to the deuplicate assessment roll, "were assessed, as aforesaid, to 'Joaquin Castro and wife, and all claimants known or unknown,' and that the taxes thereon were not paid;" and also, "that on the Saturday next preceding the third Monday in November, 1858, I completed a list of all persons and property then owing any taxes, called the delinquent tax list; and on or before the fourth Monday in the said November, I caused said list to be published, giving, in said publication, the name of the owner (when known), and of all owners and claimants known or unknown."

O'Grady v. Barnhissel.

Perhaps no doctrine is better settled than that no intendment is to be made in favor of the regularity of proceedings of courts or officers of inferior or special jurisdiction. (Whitwell v. Barbier, 7 Cal. 64; Haynes v. Meek, 10 Id. 116; Foot v. Stevens, 17 Wend. 483; Hart v. Seixas, 21 Id. 40; Bloom v. Burdick, 1 Hill, 189; Sharp v. Spier, 4 Hill, 86; Striker v. Kelly, 7 Id. 25, 29; Borden v. Fitch, 15 Johns. 121; Mills v. Martin, 19 Id. 7; Bigelow v. Stearns, Id. 39; Jones v. Reed, 1 Johns. Cas. 20.)

The recitals in a tax deed are not, unless made so by statute, evidence against the owner of the property; but the facts recited must be proved by evidence aliunde, and the onus probandi rests upon the purchaser, or those claiming under him, to prove the facts upon which his alleged title depends. (See Sharp v. Spier and Striker v. Kelly, supra; Blackwell on Tax Titles, 93, 94, and the many cases there cited.) But it may be answered to the argument and authorities on this point, that our statute makes the tax deed which contains a substantial statement of the matters stated in the certificate, prima facie evidence of title in the grantee, and even conclusive evidence of the matters by it set forth. This may be even so; yet, nevertheless, it is not any the less necessary that the facts constitutive of the power to sell and convey, and on which the purchaser's right and title is made to depend, should be proved. The statute has not shifted the burden of proof from the party who would sustain such right and title; but has furnished a different mode of proof, by providing that a certificate shall be made by a certain officer, embodying a statement of essential facts, which, with others that must transpire subsequently, before a conveyance can be made, shall be, by the same officer, set forth in the tax-deed; and that this deed, containing therein a statement of the performance of the acts and the occurrence of the facts which operate to divest the owner of his estate, and transfer it to the purchaser, shall be the witness; or, in other words, the evidence of the performance of such prerequisite acts, and the occurrence of the essential facts. Such deed, bearing witness of the essential acts and circumstances, must be produced by the party relying upon it; otherwise, he must share the fate of all litigants who fail to prove what they allege.

Neither the certificate nor deed, under which plaintiff claims the land, shows that taxes were levied on it according to law. It is not enough for the Tax Collector to certify, in terms, that taxes were levied on the land according to law. He should state what was done and when done. If it was undertaken to be done after the first Monday of March, then taxes were not levied according to any law. (Act of 1857, 339, Sec. 42.)

Would any Court tolerate the assumption of an inferior officer in declaring that that was done according to law, which a Court of superior jurisdiction would not so determine without evidence of it? Unless taxes were levied on this land as required by the statute, the tax did not become a judgment against the person, or a lien against the property; because before them the tax must have been levied as provided by this act. By a line of decisions that have hitherto stood unbroken, the law has been firmly established, that in order to divest the owner of his land, and transfer it to another by means of sales for taxes, it is essential that every act and thing constitutive of the officer's authority to sell, must precede its exercise. (4 Wheat. 77; 6 Id. 119; 4 Hill, 86; 7 Id. 29; 1 Leigh, 250, 251; 10 Cal. 632; 13 Id. 618; Blackwell on Tax Titles, 45-60.) Otherwise the sale is coram non judice and void.

The twenty-third section of the act says the deed shall be conclusive proof of the matters by it set forth. Is the statement of the Tax Collector in the certificate and deed, that "by virtue and authority of law, and according thereto, taxes for State and county purposes were duly levied by the Legislature, and by the Board of Supervisors for Contra Costa County, for the years 1858-1859, upon all the property within said county not exempt by law from execution; that all said property was duly assessed by the Assessor of said county," the setting forth any matter of fact done and performed by the Supervisors or Assessor? An officer who certifies that a series of acts were done according to law, or duly or legally done, does not state any traversable fact. Such words in pleading have in general no effect. For such terms are not only indefinite, but offer matter of law instead of fact, and consequently are not traversable. (Gould's Plead. 182, Sec. 29.)

E. W. F. Sloan and George Cadwalader, for Respondent.

COPB, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action of ejectment, in which the plaintiff recovered upon a tax deed purporting to have been executed on a sale for taxes under the Revenue Act of 1857. The deed was admitted in evidence against the objection of the defendants, and various grounds are now urged in support of the objection thus taken. These grounds involve the construction of certain provisions of the act referred to, and attack the validity of the deed on account of a supposed non-compliance with these provisions. It is contended that the matters, a statement of which is required by the act in order to render the deed effectual, are insufficiently set forth, and that the deed is therefore inoperative. Sec. 18 of the act provides that "after receiving the taxes and costs for any property sold, the Tax Collector shall, as soon as practicable, issue to the purchaser a certificate in duplicate, stating substantially that the property was assessed," etc.; specifying particularly the matters to be stated. Sec. 22 provides that the deed shall state the same matters substantially as stated in the certificate; and Sec. 23 provides that a deed conforming to the requirements of the act shall be prima facie evidence of title in the grantee.

The deed in this case states that the property was duly assessed; and that the taxes were levied upon it according to law; and states in the same manner other matters required by the act. The defendants claim that this mode of statement is not sufficient, and that there is no authority in the act for a deed setting forth the matters necessary to be stated in the forms of legal conclusions. Their position is that the deed must state the facts, and that the existence of these matters must appear from the facts stated; and that a statement amounting merely to a conclusion of law is not within the meaning of the act. This view is urged with much earnestness and force of argument; but a careful consideration of the act leads us to a construction different from that adopted by the learned counsel. The act must be construed with reference to the objects intended to be accomplished by it, and it will hardly be claimed that an interpretation which defeats this object is admissible. Of course, the primary object was to provide revenue for the support of the Government, and the provisions in question constitute a part of the machinery devised for that purpose. The stringency of these provisions was intended to facilitate the collection, and to overcome as far as possible the difficulties which had always been experienced in enforcing payment. It had become proverbial, that a tax title was no title at all; and a sale for taxes was as near a mockery as any proceeding having the appearance of legal sanction could be. The principal cause was the difficulty in proving the various steps essential to the validity of such a sale; and the intention was to change to rule of evidence upon that subject, and throw the burden of proof upon the party asserting the invalidity. The view contended for would entirely defeat this intention; for if the facts are to be stated in the deed, the effect is precisely the same as to require them to be shown aliunde. The only difference is in the mode of proof, and the embarrassment is rather increased than diminished; for if any material fact be omitted, the deed is invalid, and cannot be given in evidence. The purchaser is subjected to the double risk of an error in the previous proceedings, and a mistake in setting these proceedings forth in the deed, either of which would be fatal. These results are plainly in contravention of the purpose intended, and the language of the act is no less conclusive. The general provision is, that the matter specified shall be stated; but in respect to the publication of the notice of sale, it is provided that the manner of publication shall be described. If it were intended that the same particularity should be observed in other respects, that intention would doubtless have been expressed; and the maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius applies. We regard the deed as conforming substantially to the requirements of the act; and our conclusion is, that no error was committed in allowing it to be given in evidence. It is true, some of the matters set forth are stated by way of recital; but as they distinctly appear, there is nothing in the manner of stating them, for which the deed could properly have been rejected. The point in regard to publication is more of a criticism than an objection, for the deed undoubtedly shows that the publication was made as provided in the act.

This disposes of the question arising upon the face of the deed, and brings us to the consideration of certain matters relied upon as invalidating the sale. The property was assessed to Joaquin Castro and wife, "and all claimants and owners known or unknown," and it is objected that Castro and wife were not the owners, and that the assessment was insufficient and void. The evidence shows that the property had belonged to the wife, and that she, together with her husband, had conveyed it to an infant daughter, who held it at the time of the assessment. The defendants, however, were in possession of it, and they contend that it was necessary to assess it either to them or to the owner, and that assessing it to Castro and wife was a fatal error. The act provides that property shall be assessed to the "person, firm, corporation, association, or company owning it, or having the possession, charge, or control of it, and to all owners and claimants known or unknown." The position taken ignores that portion of the assessment relating to "claimants and owners known or unknown," and counsel regards it as superfluous and nugatory in determining the effect of the assessment. As the defendants were in possession, he considers the assessment a mere nullity, and contends that an assessment to "owners and claimants known or unknown" is of no validity, unless the possession is vacant. This view is in conflict with what we understand to be the meaning of the act, and we think that counsel has mistaken the purport and object of the provision referred to. The words "and to all owners and claimants known or unknown," were intended to be incorporated in every assessment; and their effect is to bind the property, irrespective of the ownership or possession. The assessment is required to be made to the owner or possessor, and as against the person assessed it operates as a judgment, and has the force and effect of an execution upon all property owned by him in the county. It is also to be made to "owners and claimants known or unknown," and the intention was that it should be effectual as against the property regardless of the person, placing it in this respect upon the footing of a proceeding in rem. The counsel reads the act as requiring the assessment to be made to the owner, if known; if the owner is unknown, to the person in possession; or if the possession is vacant, to the owner as unknown. This clearly is not the proper reading, for the provision is that it shall be made to the owner or person in possession, "and to all owners and claimants known or unknown." Whether made to the owner himself, or to the person in possession, it is also to be made to "owners and claimants, known or unknown," and the provision as understood by counsel is inconsistent with itself. It may be claimed as resulting from this view, that the omission of these words would invalidate as assessment, though correctly made as to the person, and that a compliance with both conditions is necessary to render the assessment effectual. This, however, can hardly be considered a reasonable construction, for the additional clause was evidently intended as a precautionary requirement, the object being to avoid the consequences of an error in regard to the person. The language used is inconsistent with any other interpretation, for it includes owners and claimants that are known, as well as those that are unknown, and the effect upon them was intended to be the same. If the proper person is assessed, no advantage could be derived from assessing him again in a different form, and the assessment would not be affected by a failure to do so. It is only where a mistake is made in this respect that the general words of the provision are important; and the object in requiring them could only have been to provide a cure for the mistake, so far as to give validity to the assessment as against the property. We regard the act as creating two remedies; one against the person and the other against the property, each having a distinct and separate existence, and the efficiency of the one not depending upon that of the other. The object was to compel a prompt observance of the duty devolving upon the citizen to pay his taxes, and an assessment binding at once the person and the property was resorted to as the means best calculated to accomplish that object. It is no answer to say that the owner may be taken by surprise, and lose his property without any fault or negligence on his part, for he has an easy method of obtaining information, and nothing to do but to pay his taxes. He is as likely to be surprised by an assessment to the person in possession, as by an assessment to "owners and claimants known or unknown," and the argument applies with equal force to the two modes of assessment. It is our duty to construe the act in accordance with the intention of its framers, and the rule of strict construction so earnestly invoked would be grossly misapplied if used to defeat that intention. In the view taken by us, it is immaterial to whom the property is assessed; for an assessment, in the form required, binds the property itself, and is not vitiated by a mistake as to the person. It is true, the act provides that the Assessor shall make diligent inquiry to ascertain the owner; but a mere mistake as to the fact of ownership is not sufficient to invalidate the assessment. It is possible that a wilful omission, or even negligence in the performance of the duty enjoined, would render the assessment invalid; but where the assessment is made upon due inquiry and in good faith, a mistake of this character will not affect it. In the present case, it is evident that the error committed was not the result of negligence or design, and it is not pretended that any person was misled by the manner in which the assessment was made. There is no evidence that the Assessor was aware of the conveyance, and the presumption is that he did his duty, and used reasonable diligence to ascertain who the owner was. It is true, the records of the county would have furnished the necessary information, but these records were only notice to purchasers and incumbrancers, and no inference of actual notice can be drawn from them. Admitting, however, that he had full knowledge of the fact, it by no means follows that the error arose from neglect of duty or any improper conduct. The daughter receiving the conveyance was a minor, and attained her majority only a few months prior to the assessment, up to which time her father had the control and management of her property. During her nonage he was the proper person to assess it to, and no advantage would have resulted from the use of her name, nor the assessment have been more or less effectual on that account. The assessment to him three or four months after she became of age was a mistake, requiring unusual care in the Assessor to be avoided, and there is no doubt that it was innocently made.

A point is taken in regard to the figures in the assessment roll, but we are unable to discover anything amounting to a non-compliance with the law. It is claimed that the figures are not intelligible, and that the items of the tax are so stated as to render explanation necessary to ascertain the amount. It appears, however, that these items are set down in columns, and that each column is appropriately ruled for dollars and cents, and its meaning indicated by the proper heading. The proof upon this subject is derived from the testimony of the collector, but the record shows that he testified from the roll itself.

The counsel is mistaken in asserting that the property was sold for more than the amount due. He states that the items in the assessment roll foot up at fifty-one dollars, but the slightest care would have shown him that they are correctly fotted up at fifty-two dollars and fifty cents.

The only error disclosed by the record is in the award of damages, the amount awarded being greater than the amount claimed. For this error it would be necessary to reverse the judgment, but the plaintiff offers to remit the excess, and we shall order a modification to that extent. The judgment thus modified is correct, and must be affirmed.

Ordered accordingly.

After the foregoing opinion had been delivered, a rehearing was granted.

Upon the rehearing, CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

In this case a rehearing was granted, and it has again been submitted upon some additional questions not directly passed upon in the former opinion. We adhere to the principles there laid down, and it will therefore be considered as forming part of the present opinion.

Upon the rehearing, it was urged that the amount for which the property was sold exceeded the amount of taxes and costs actually due in the sum of five and one-half cents, which is estimated as follows: Amount of taxes, fifty-two dollars and fifty cents; five per cent. thereon for delinquency, two dollars and sixty-two and one-half cents; statute allowance for certificate of sale, two dollars; costs of advertising the property, fifty cents. Total amount the property should have been sold for, fifty-seven dollars and sixty-two and one-half cents; amount for which the property was sold, fifty-seven dollars and sixty-eight cents — making an overplus of five and one-half cents. But the respondent insists that there should be included in the estimate of taxes and costs the sum of fifty cents for filing the certificate of sale in the Recorder's office, as required under Secs. 20 and 21 of the Revenue Law of 1857, under which the property was sold, and that by adding this sum to the other amounts of taxes and costs, the result will be that the property sold for forty-four and one-half cents less than the amount really due. We do not think this item is a proper one to be included in the amount for which the property was to be sold. Sec. 17 of the act in question provides that the person who will take the least quantity of the tract or the smallest portion therein of the interest taxed, and "pay the taxes and costs due, including two dollars which the Tax Collector shall be entitled to receive for the duplicate certificate of sale, shall be declared to be the purchaser." The evident meaning is, that the purchaser shall pay the "costs due," at the time of the sale, as any other costs cannot properly be said to be "due;" and as it specially includes only the costs of the certificates, which accrued after the sale, it is clear that it was not intended to include any other subsequent costs. It follows that the fees of the Recorder for filing the certificate should not be included. Those fees are for the purchaser to pay when he files his duplicate certificate with the Recorder, as the filing is for his benefit.

The respondent insists, however, that the overplus in this case is so small that the sale should not be invalidated on that ground, and that the maxim de minimus non curat lex is properly applicable. We are satisfied that we ought not to treat the sale as void for this trifling excess. If we could in any way see that the owner of the land had suffered any injury by the mistake in the estimate by the Tax Collector of the amount due, it would be very different. The tract assessed for taxes, the whole of which was bid off by the purchaser at the tax sale, includes, it seems, about two hundred acres; and it can hardly be presumed that the purchaser would have bid for a less quantity had the amount been stated at the trifling sum of five and one-half cents less. The mistake may have occurred in the calculation, or it may have been occasioned by an error in making or copying the figures; but it is evident that it was unintentional, and without any design to injure the parties interested. If the owner of the property had offered to redeem it within the time prescribed by law, and had tendered the amount really due at the time of the tax sale, with the proper statutory allowances, his redemption would have been good, though he should have omitted in his tender this excess in the sale; but no such tender was made. If this had been a sale under an ordinary judgment and execution, it could not be pretended for a moment that the sale would have been void on this account. It is true, that the mode of selling property at a tax sale is different from an ordinary sale on execution; but that difference is not sufficient to hold a tax sale void for so trifling a matter. Sec. 32 of the Act of 1857 provides, that every tax levied under the provisions or authority of this act is hereby made a judgment against the person and a lien against the property assessed; which lien shall attach, and judgment date, as of the first Monday in March of each year, and shall have the full force and effect of an execution against all property of the delinquent," etc. It is evident that the Legislature intended by this provision to subject sales of property to the same legal rules as govern sales to enforce judgments and liens against property in the ordinary course of legal proceedings, although the mode of bidding is different. In New Hampshire, executions are extended upon the real estate by appointing appraisers, who set off to the judgment creditor a sufficient quantity of the land to pay the amount due on the execution at its appraised value, which operates as a conveyance of the property and a satisfaction of the judgment without any sale at public auction; and the Courts there hold that such extent is not void because the appraised value of the land thus set off exceeds by a trifling sum the amount due on the execution. (Burnham v. Aiken, 6 N. H. 307; Avery v. Bowman, 40 Id. 453.)

The judgment as modified by the previous opinion is affirmed.

Gassner v. Patterson.

GASSNER v. PATTERSON AND TIMSON.

~~Neither~~ the Chattel Mortgage Act of 1857, nor the amendment thereto in 1861, include furniture and fixtures of saloons among the property which may be mortgaged under its provisions.

A chattel mortgage made under the Act of 1857, and the amendment of 1861, is of no validity, except between the parties thereto, unless the provisions of the act are strictly complied with.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The mortgage which Gassner, the appellant, sought to foreclose in this action, was given for the purchase money of the billiard tables. The tables remained in Patterson's possession until purchased by Timson, when they were delivered to Timson, who was in possession when the suit was brought. The other facts appear in the opinion.

William S. Wood and Winans & Hyer, for Appellant.

Inadequacy of price, though a fact admissible in evidence to establish fraud, is never of itself sufficient to annul a sale under execution. (Cole v. White, 24 Wend. 125; Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 50.)

Henry Starr, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage, for eight hundred and twenty-four dollars and interest, on two billiard tables, executed by Patterson to the plaintiff, to secure the purchase money thereof. The tables had been sold by a Constable to the defendant Timson for twenty-five dollars each, on an execution against Patterson, and he claims to hold the property free of the mortgage. The evidence shows that Timson, before and after the time of his purchase, had full notice of the mortgage.

It appears that Patterson was the keeper of a saloon, and therefore it is contended that it is not such property as is subject to the provisions of the Chattel Mortgage Act of 1857, as amended in 1861. (Stat. of 1861, 197.) The mortgage does not set out the rate of interest to be paid on the sum secured, or when or where the mortgage debt is payable. In other respects, the Chattel Mortgage Act seems to have been complied with; but the defendant Timson claims that these defects render the mortgage invalid as against him. Sec. 17 of the Statute of Frauds provides that "No mortgage of personal property hereafter made shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee," with an exception in favor of growing crops, which it is not necessary to notice. This continued to be the law respecting chattel mortgages, up to 1857, when the stringency of its provisions were relaxed in favor of certain kinds of property, among which were "upholstery and furniture used in hotels and public boarding-houses, when mortgaged to secure the purchase money of the identical articles mortgaged, and not otherwise;" but neither this clause nor any other in the Act of 1857, or the amendment thereto of 1861, includes the furniture and fixtures of saloons among the property which may be mortgaged under that act. The first section of that act also provides that "No mortgage made by virtue of this act, shall have any legal force or effect (except between the parties thereto), unless the residence of the mortgagor and mortgagee, their profession, trade, or occupation, the sum to be secured, the rate of interest to be paid, when and where payable, shall be set out in the mortgage; and the mortgagor and mortgagee shall make affidavit that the mortgage is bona fide, and made without any design to defraud or delay creditors, which affidavit shall be attached to such mortgage." Sec. 3 also provides, that "No chattel mortgage shall be valid (except between the parties thereto), unless the same shall have been made, executed, and recorded, in conformity to the provisions of this act.

These provisions are plain, simple, and most imperative in their terms. The privilege of holding a lien upon certain kinds of personal property, in the possession of the mortgagor, is accorded to the mortgagee, in certain cases, upon the performance of certain conditions. These conditions are few, and easily performed, and there need be no difficulty, with ordinary care, in fully complying with them. But they are made essential to the validity of the mortgage. The Courts have no right, no power, to extend the statute by construction, so as to include property not mentioned in it, or to dispense with any of the conditions the Legislature has seen fit to impose. If we should once begin and attempt to relieve parties in cases of hardship, the law would be in danger of being frittered away, and its benefits entirely lost to the community. The present case is perhaps one of hardship upon the plaintiff, but it is a consequence of his own oversight and neglect. Statutes of a similar character in other States, have been so construed as to hold the parties to a strict performance of the conditions on which the validity of the mortgage depends. (Chenyworth v. Daily, 7 Ind. 284; Diover v. McLaughlin, 2 Wend. 596; Clayborn v. Hill, 1 Wash. 177; Meyer v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 322.)

But the respondent insists that the defendant Timson is not a "purchaser in good faith," and therefore he cannot hold the property free of the mortgage, and refers to Sec. 15 of the Statute of Frauds. That section, however, does not apply to this case, which is governed, as we have shown, by Sec. 17 of the Statute of Frauds, and the Chattel Mortgage Act, which make no exception of that kind. They declare the mortgage void, as "against any other person than the parties thereto." The case referred to by the respondent's counsel, were under statutes differing entirely from our own, and are not, therefore, proper guides.

It is urged that the Constable only sold the mortgagor's interest in the property, subject to the mortgage, and therefore the purchaser took subject to the mortgage. It appears that the Constable attempted to sell in that way; but, failing to get any bids, he put it up at last without saying anything about the mortgage. We do not consider that the mode of selling can make any essential difference, as the purchaser would be entitled to the property; and whether his title was subject to the lien of the mortgage, depends upon the fact whether the lien was valid or not. (Hull v. Camley, 1 Kern. 506.) So the sale to Timson cannot be held void on the ground of inadequacy of price. It seems it was the highest bid that could be obtained. It was apparent that the purchaser would be liable to a lawsuit with the mortgagee, which sufficiently accounts for the small sum bid. (Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 50; Cole v. White, 24 Wend. 141.) Besides, the plaintiff has not been injured in any way, by the inadequacy of price. It is the loss of the mortgagor, and not of the plaintiff.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

FALL et al. v. PAINE et al.

BOARDS of Supervisors have jurisdiction conferred upon them by statute, to determine whether the public convenience requires a bridge or ferry within one mile of any other regularly licensed bridge or ferry; and it is a question, whether their determination upon this point is not final and conclusive. If, however, their determination on such matter is not final, it must be reviewed by certiorari, and cannot be attacked in a collateral action.

APPEAL from the District Court, Tenth Judicial District, Sutter County.

The facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

F. B. Reardan, for Appellants.

The exercise of the power to determine whether another ferry is required by public convenience, is the exercise of a judicial power, and the Board of Supervisors cannot exercise it arbitrarily. (8 Cal. 61, 62; 13 Id. 12; 14 Id. 499-501; 10 Id. 345.)

O. Lindley, T. S. Belcher, and Z. Montgomery, for Respondents.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order refusing an injunction. The complaint avers that the plaintiffs are the owners of a toll-bridge over Feather River, between Yuba City and Marysville; that the defendants are running a ferry, within one mile of the bridge, under a license issued by the Board of Supervisors of Yuba County, who had improperly determined, upon the application for the ferry license, that the public convenience required a ferry within one mile of the bridge; and alleging numerous irregularities in the action of the Board of Supervisors in granting the ferry license, and also that they erred in deciding that the public convenience required a ferry at that place.

The plaintiffs have mistaken their remedy in this case. The Board of Supervisors is a special tribunal, with mixed powers, administrative and judicial; and it has full jurisdiction conferred upon it by the statute over all matters relating to bridges and ferries. Many questions of a judicial character come before it in determining such matters. Their decision in such cases is not final and conclusive, but their judgments and orders cannot be attacked in a collateral action, as is attempted in this case. (Waugh v. Chauncey, 13 Cal. 11; Thomas v. Armstrong, 7 Id. 287.) It is a question whether the judgment and determination of the board upon the point whether a ferry is demanded by public convenience within one mile of a regularly established ferry or bridge, is not final and conclusive, as a matter confided to their sound discretion. The judgments and orders of the board, in proper cases, where their action is not final and conclusive, can be reviewed by certiorari. (People v. El Dorado Co., 8 Cal. 58; People v. Marin Co., 10 Id. 344.) If the plaintiffs have any remedy to set aside the action of the board in granting the ferry license, it is by writ of certiorari, and not by the present action.

The order is therefore affirmed.

KALKMAN et al. v. BAYLIS et al.

The complaint contained three counts. The first, on a special contract for the erection of a warehouse; the second, for extra work on the building; and the third, for work and labor done, and materials furnished in its erection. The answer denied the allegations of the first two counts; but failed to deny the allegations of the third.

The parties stipulated that the evidence should be taken by a referee, and the cause tried before the Court on the evidence. The Court, instead of finding the facts from the evidence, found the allegations of the third count correct, because not denied.

Held, that this was error, and that the Court should have regarded the allegations of the third count as denied, and found the facts from the evidence.

W. H. Jones, Robinson, Beatty, and Heacock, for Appellants.

Wilkins & Temple, and J. B. Harmon, for Respondents.

NORTON, J. delivered the opinion of the Court.—COPB. C. J. and CROCKER, J. concurring.

In the complaint, the plaintiffs for the first cause of action, set forth a special agreement for the building of a warehouse by them for the defendants, and aver a performance on their part. For a second cause of action, they aver the performance of certain extra work on the said building. For a third cause of action, they aver that the defendants were, on a day specified, indebted to them in the sum of $1,360 for work and labor done, and materials furnished in the building of a warehouse, at the defendants' request, of which sum two hundred and fifty dollars have been paid, and that there is now due the sum of $1,110. The complaint is verified. A motion made to strike the third cause of action from the complaint was denied. The answer denies, specifically, all the allegations relating to the first and second causes of action. It then denies that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,110, or any other sum. This denial is not applied in explicit terms to the third cause of action; but that is the only one in which that sum was claimed to be due. After the answer was filed, the parties stipulated that a referee be appointed to take and report the evidence; and that the case be tried upon such evidence. The evidence was taken and reported to the Court, and the action tried, as is stated in the finding, "upon the pleadings and upon the evidence reported" by the referee. In its finding the Court says it "finds from the admission in said pleadings from the failure of the defendants to answer the third count in the plaintiffs' complaint, the following facts, to wit:" and then proceeds to set forth as facts found the matters which are alleged in that third count. From the judgment entered upon this finding, the defendants appeal.

Kalkman v. Bayls.

Under the old system of pleading and practice, if no issue was taken upon one of the counts of the declaration, no trial or verdict could be had upon it, and no judgment taken, as upon an issue tried. In this case, the Court below have made a finding, which is in the nature of a verdict rendered upon this third cause of action. This finding is based wholly upon the allegations of the third cause of action taken as true, because that count was not denied by the answer. If the action had been tried by a jury, and a general verdict rendered, it would have applied to the cause of action or counts upon which issues had been taken. And so we think the findings must be upon the issues joined. If there was an issue joined on the third cause of action, the evidence should, under the circumstances of this case, have been taken into consideration in making the finding. It was taken as applicable to the issues, and no objection made that the cause of action stood admitted; and it was for that reason immaterial. In the case of Baker v. Washington (5 Stew. & Porter, 142), in which, after verdict, an objection was taken that there was no plea filed, the Court say, instead of allowing the objection taken at that time to prevail: "We will rather presume that there was one which was dropped from the record, or that by mutual agreement, express or implied, the same was dispensed with." In this case there was an answer plainly intended to controvert the third cause of action, though it is liable to the objection that it only denied the conclusion of law, instead of the facts from which the conclusion resulted. The answer does not, specifically, deny the allegations of fact averred in this third cause of action; but if every material fact is for that reason taken to be true, then there was no issue to be tried as to this cause of action. The parties stipulated that the action should be tried on the evidence to be taken before the referee. After such a stipulation, and after a large mass of testimony was taken as upon an issue joined, it must be held that the parties have agreed to consider the third cause of action, or count, as being controverted. The findings, therefore, should have been based upon the evidence; and it was error to make a finding and render a judgment upon the third count as being confessed.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, and a new trial ordered.

Maye v. Yappen.

MAYE et al. v. YAPPEN et al.

WHEN two mining claims adjoin each other, and the owners of one claim work across the dividing line and take away gold-bearing earth from the other claim, the fact that they did so in ignorance of the location of the dividing line, is no excuse or justification, and it is error to admit evidence of such ignorance as an excuse for the trespass or in mitigation of damages.

In an action of trespass to recover damages for injury to a mining claim, the right of the plaintiffs to recover the damages which they have actually sustained, is not affected by the fact that the trespass was not willful in its character.

The fact that plaintiff tells defendant that he did not know where the line ran, but that defendant need not be uneasy, for he was not near the line, and had fifty feet still to run before he could reach it, does not amount to a license or permission from plaintiff for defendant to work on plaintiff's ground; nor does it estop plaintiff from recovering the damage he has actually sustained.

When a party has the means of ascertaining a boundary line, he is guilty of negligence in not ascertaining its location.

Where a trespass is committed by entering upon and taking away the gold-bearing earth from a mining claim, and the same is not done willfully or with a malicious intent, and the action is brought for an injury to the land itself, the true measure of damages is the value of the gold-bearing earth at the time it is separated from the surrounding soil, and becomes a chattel.

In estimating the damages, the expense of separating the earth from the gold after it is moved to the place of washing, is to be deducted from the value of the gold.

If, however, a demand is made for the possession of the gold after it is separated from the earth, and an action is then brought for the conversion of the chattel, the measure of damages would be the value of the gold detained.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Appellants.

P. L. Edwards and H. O. Beatty, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages, in the sum of $2,000, which the plaintiffs allege they sustained, by reason of the acts of the defendants, in entering upon the mining claim of the plaintiffs, and taking away gold and gold-bearing earth of that value. The case was tried by a jury, who found for the plaintiffs damages in the sum of fifty dollars, for which amount judgment was rendered, and the plaintiffs appeal therefrom, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The appellants contend that they were entitled to a judgment for the sum claimed in their complaint upon the pleadings. It does not appear, however, that they made any motion for judgment on the pleading in the Court below; and it is doubtful, therefore, whether the question can be raised in this Court for the first time. But the answer of the defendants was sufficient to raise issues for trial, and this objection, therefore, is not well taken.

It appears that the plaintiffs and defendants are the owners of adjoining mining claims, which are worked by deep under-ground tunnels. The fact that the defendants mined over the dividing line between the claims, and worked out a portion of the mining ground of the plaintiffs, is not disputed; but they contend that it was not done willfully or intentionally, but in ignorance of the locality of the dividing line, between the claims, under the surface; and that they were led to work over the line, by the representations of one of the plaintiffs, as to its locality, in relation to the tunnel and the place they were working. On the trial, the plaintiffs objected to all evidence showing that the defendants were ignorant of the location of this dividing line; but the Court overruled the objection, and permitted several of the defendants to testify to those facts, and this is assigned as error. The plaintiffs, in this action, were not entitled to vindictive or exemplary damages, but could only recover the damages they had actually sustained by being deprived of the gold or gold-bearing earth taken by the defendants from their mining ground. It follows, that the question whether the defendants acted willfully and maliciously, or ignorantly and innocently, in digging up and taking away the gold-bearing earth, is entirely immaterial. The defendants took property belonging to the plaintiffs, and have thereby injured them to a certain amount; and that amount is made no greater nor less by the fact that the act was done without any malicious intent. The right of the plaintiffs to recover damages, or the amount of the damages to which they may be entitled, is not affected by the fact that the trespass was not willful in its character. The ruling of the Court upon this question was therefore erroneous.

It appears, that when the defendants first commenced working in the vicinity of the ground belonging to the plaintiffs, one of the plaintiffs went into defendants' tunnel, where they were working, and he was asked if he knew where the line was, to which he replied that he did not know exactly. Afterwards, on the same day, the same plaintiff, Maye, stated to defendants that they need not be uneasy; that they were not near the line, and had forty or fifty feet still to run before they would reach it; and showed them a map of the plaintiffs' claim. The witness, who was one of the defendants, also stated that they only worked twenty-five feet further, and would not have done even that but for Maye's statement that they had fifty feet to go. Soon after this conversation, the defendants employed a surveyor to run the line, and they then learned that they had worked over on the plaintiffs' claim. This state of facts, the defendants claim, amounts to a license or permission from the plaintiffs to work the ground; or they estop the plaintiffs from recovering the damages caused by the working of the ground. It is clear that the facts do not show a license or permission to work the mining ground of the plaintiffs. They show mutual ignorance on the part of one of the plaintiffs, Maye, and the defendants, as to the location of the line in the tunnel; but they do not show any permission or consent, or even intention or willingness on his part, that the defendants might work the plaintiffs' mining ground. Whether or not the permission of one of the plaintiffs would bind the others, it is unnecessary to determine.

The rules relating to the doctrine of estoppel with respect to the title of property, laid down by this Court in Bogg v. Merced Mining Co. (14 Cal. 367), are as follows: 1st. That the party making the admission by his declarations or conduct was apprised of the true state of his own title. 2d. That he made the admission with express intention to deceive, or with such careless and culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud. 3d. That the other party was not only destitute of all knowledge, but of the means of acquiring such knowledge; and, 4th. That he relied directly upon such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved. It is evident that the facts of the present case do not bring it within the rules thus laid down. Maye, who made the statements, expressly stated that he did not know where the line ran in the tunnel; thus showing that he was not apprised of the true location of the plaintiffs' line under ground. His statements were, therefore, more in the nature of the expression of an opinion than an admission of facts. The location of the line on the surface of the ground was well known to both parties, or could have been readily ascertained; and the defendants, therefore, had the means of ascertaining, by means of a survey, the exact location of the line in the tunnel, and they were guilty of negligence in not informing themselves of this fact, especially when they knew that Maye did not himself know exactly where the line ran. The defendants had no right, therefore, to rely upon this statement of Maye's opinion, when he distinctly stated his own ignorance of the fact. They cannot therefore claim that it would operate as a fraud upon them to permit the plaintiffs to show the true location of the line, and to recover the damages caused by the trespass, that being the foundation of the doctrine of estoppel. It may be a question whether the relation of the plaintiffs to each other was such that the admissions of one would operate as an estoppel against the others; but that is a point not necessary to determine.

Upon these points, the Court gave the jury the following instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendants were ignorant of the boundary lines between the plaintiffs and defendants, and in such ignorance, if they entered upon the ground of the plaintiffs in good faith, believing it to be their own, and were induced to do so by the acts and representations of plaintiffs themselves, then they will find for the defendants." This instruction was clearly erroneous. It does not correctly state the law upon this subject, as has already been shown.

The Court also gave the following instruction, which the appellants assign as error: "If the jury believe, from the testimony, that defendants entered upon plaintiffs' ground in good faith, believing it to be their own ground, and were misled into so doing by the acts or declarations of plaintiffs, then if the plaintiffs recover at all, they can only recover the net sums taken from plaintiffs' ground, over and above the expense of extracting it." The plaintiffs claim that the rule of damages in such cases is the value of the property after it is separated from the freehold and becomes a chattel, or the value of the gold after it is extracted from the earth.

In the case of Martin v. Porter (5 M. & W. 352), which was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit, for entering a certain coal mine and carrying away the coal, and converting and disposing thereof to the use of the defendant, the plaintiff claimed that he had a right to hold the defendant liable for the value of the coal where gotten, and where it first existed as a chattel, without any deduction for the expense of getting it. The Judge at nisi prius held that in an action of trover, the plaintiff would have been entitled to the value of the coal as a chattel, either at the mouth of the pit or on the canal bank, if he had demanded it at either place; and the defendant had converted it, without allowing the latter anything for having worked and brought it there; but the action being trespass, he was entitled to the value of the coal as a chattel at the time when the defendant began to take it away, that is, as soon as it existed as a chattel, which value would be the sale price at the pit's mouth, after deducting the expense of carrying the coals from the place in the mine where they were got to the pit's mouth; and the jury found a verdict accordingly. The defendant moved the Court to reduce the damages to the average estimated value of the coal as lying undisturbed in its native bed. The Court refused the motion, holding that the rule had been correctly laid down by the Judge at the trial. The same rule was also adopted in Wild v. Holt (9 M. & W. 672), and Morgan v. Powell (3 Q. B. 278).

In Ward v. Morewood (cited in 3 Queen's Bench, 440), it was held by Parke, Baron, at nisi prius, that if there was fraud or negligence on the part of the defendant, they might give as damages, under the count in trover, the value of the coals at the time they first became chattels, on the principle laid down in Martin v. Porter; but if they thought that the defendant was not guilty of fraud or negligence, but acted fairly and honestly, in the full belief that he had a right to do what he did, they might give the fair value of the coal as if the coal field had been purchased from the plaintiff; and the jury adopted the latter estimate.

Maye v. Yappen.

The case of Cushing v. Longfellow (26 Maine, 306), was an action for trespass for cutting and removing mill logs. The plaintiff claimed the right to recover the value of the logs at a certain landing-place, and the defendant contended that the damages should be estimated according to the value of the timber when standing; but the Court held that the plaintiffs should recover the value of the logs as they were the moment after they were severed from the freehold. They also held, that the plaintiff might have demanded the logs at another place; and in an action of trover, have recovered the value of them there.

In Baker v. Wheeler (8 Wend. 505), which was an action of trover, it was held, that the party whose property has been tortiously taken, is entitled to the enhanced value until it has been so changed as to alter the title; and it was held to apply to saw logs converted into boards and plank; timber made into shingles, and wood converted into coal. (Brown v. Sax, 7 Cowen, 95; Babcock v. Gill, 10 J. R. 237; Curtis v. Groat, 7 Id. 168; 5 Id. 348.)

It will be noticed that the rule of damages in such cases depends, to some extent, upon the form of the action; whether the action is for an injury to the land itself, or for the conversion of a chattel which had been severed from the land. The complaint in this case alleges that the defendants, at divers times, wrongfully entered upon a portion of plaintiffs' mining claim, and extracted the gold and gold-bearing earth from a portion thereof, which gold and gold-bearing earth they wrongfully carried away and converted to their own use; and the value of the gold thus carried away is alleged to have been two thousand dollars. No demand of the possession of the gold after it was separated from the earth appears to have been made upon the defendants, and the gravamen of the action appears to be the injury done to the land itself by the acts of the defendants. The proper rule for damages, in a case like the present, is the value of the gold-bearing earth at the time it was separated from the surrounding soil and became a chattel. This seems to be a just and proper rule, and one established by the decisions upon this question. In estimating these damages, the expense of extracting the gold and separating it from the earth, after it is first moved from its original location, is to be deducted from the value of the gold taken out of the mining ground of the plaintiffs. The instruction of the Court upon this point is very nearly correct, but it is proper that the rule should be accurately stated to the jury. The difference in the amount of damages may or may not be great, but we have no means of determining whether it is large or small.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

GLUCKAUF v. BLIVEN et al.

A MORTGAGE, executed after the passage of the amendatory Homestead Act of 1860, by both husband and wife, upon the homestead, is valid, although given for borrowed money, provided a declaration of homestead had been made and recorded at the time of its execution.

The second section of the amendatory Homestead Act of 1860, applies only to such homesteads as are held under the declaration provided for in that act, and has no application to homesteads held under the Act of 1851.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellants.

James M. Burt, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by Bliven and wife, upon certain real estate claimed by them as a homestead. Thomas and Ashmore are made defendants, as holders of judgments which are liens upon the property, subsequent to the mortgage. The Court found for the plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which the defendants appeal.

Bliven and his wife filed a joint answer, in which they aver that at the time of the execution of the mortgage, they held and claimed the mortgaged premises as a homestead, and still continued to so hold and claim the same; that prior to the commencement of the action they duly selected said premises as a homestead, and duly made, acknowledged, and recorded their declaration of homestead; that the mortgage was not created by any laborer's or vendor's lien, but for borrowed money, and the interest thereon; and "that they are man and wife, and were, long before executing said mortgage, residing upon and occupying said premises with their family, of which plaintiff had full knowledge;" and they ask that their homestead claim be reserved and protected. The pleadings are sworn to, and the plaintiff, in his application, denies that before, or at the time of the execution of the mortgage, they held or claimed the premises as a homestead; but he does not deny that they were married, and resided upon and occupied the premises with their family, as specifically alleged in the answer. The replication also avers that they, at the time of the execution of the mortgage, disclaimed all intention of claiming the premises as a homestead, and that the declaration of homestead was not filed until October 10th, 1861. It also avers that a part of the debt secured by the mortgage was for the purchase money of certain undivided interest in the mortgaged property purchased by Bliven. No evidence was introduced by either party in relation to the homestead claim, and it therefore rests entirely upon the pleadings. The Court found that at the time of the execution of the mortgage, Bliven and wife had not dedicated the premises as a homestead; that they did not then claim it as a homestead; that the mortgage was duly executed and acknowledged by Bliven and wife, and duly recorded on the thirtieth day of November, 1860; and also found the amount of the indebtedness, but did not find that any part of it was for the purchase money of the premises, or any interest therein.

The mortgage was executed at a time when the amendments to the Homestead Law, adopted on the twenty-eighth day of April, 1860, were in force; by Sec. 2 of which it was declared that "no mortgage or alienation of any kind, made for the purpose of securing a loan or indebtedness upon the homestead property, shall be valid for any purpose whatsoever; provided, that a mortgage or alienation to secure the purchase money or pay the purchase money shall be valid if the signature of the wife be obtained to the same, and acknowledged by her, separate and apart from her husband." The mortgage in this case contains the following clause: "And the said parties of the first part do hereby abandon, renounce, and disclaim all homestead, as well as right of homestead, in and to said property." The declaration of homestead was not made, filed, or recorded in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1860, at the time of the execution of the mortgage. The case comes, therefore, fully within the principles announced by this Court in the case of Cohen v. Davis (20 Cal. 187), in which it was held that Sec. 2 only applied to those cases where the parties had duly established their homestead right, according to the provisions of the Act of 1860; and that where the parties claimed a homestead at the time of executing the mortgage, under the provisions of the Act of 1851, the Act of 1860 did not apply. In the present case, at the time of the execution of the mortgage, all the homestead right claimed by Bliven and wife was under the Act of 1851; and under that law, which governed the rights of the parties, the mortgage was a valid incumbrance upon the property.

After the case had been tried and submitted, and while the Court had the same under advisement, Mrs. Bliven applied to the Court for leave to file a separate answer, and the defendant Thomas also applied for leave to file an amended answer, both of which applications were denied by the Court; and this is assigned as error. The late period at which these applications were made, debarred these defendants from all claim to file such answers as a matter of right, and they were therefore subject to the discretion of the Court, and there was no abuse of that discretion to justify us in disturbing the judgment on that ground.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

SATTERLEE v. SAN FRANCISCO.

UNDER the charter of San Francisco in 1853, no ordinance could have any validity, unless it received the votes of a majority of all the members elected to the Board of Aldermen. The board consisted of eight members. One of the members elected that year was an alien, and ineligible, yet he was sworn in, and entered upon the discharge of his duties: Held, that there were eight members elected, and that it required five votes to pass an ordinance.

Satterlee v. San Francisco.

The validity of an election does not depend upon the eligibility of the candidates voted for, but upon its being held and conducted at the proper time and place, in the manner, and by the proper persons and officers as required by law. Although the person elected may not possess the necessary qualifications to entitle him to take or hold the office, yet if he enter upon the discharge of its duties, he becomes an officer de facto, and his right to hold the office can only be contested by direct proceedings for that purpose. The question of his eligibility or ineligibility can never be inquired into in a collateral action, and can only be raised in the Courts by a direct proceeding to contest the election or by a writ of quo warranto.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

At the sale of the city slip property in 1853, the plaintiff became the purchaser of two lots for the sum of $22,000, and paid $5,000 of the purchase money down, and in 1854 paid the further sum of $2,490 on the purchase money. This action was brought to recover back the sums thus paid, and legal interest thereon, by reason of the failure of title, owing to the invalidity of the ordinance under which the sale was made.

Plaintiff had judgment in the Court below, and defendant appealed.

Shafter, Heydenfeldt & Goold, for Appellants.

Seven members only were elected to the Board of Assistant Aldermen in the fall of 1853. It appears in the record, that Hyde (the eighth man) was a candidate; that he was certified to the Board of Assistants as having been elected; that he took the necessary oaths, and was installed in office. But it also appears that he was a native of Ireland, born in the allegiance of the British crown; that he came to this country at an early day, and that he was not naturalized until long after Ordinance 481 was finally passed upon by the board, on the fifth of December, 1853.

In order to ascertain whether, in view of the foregoing facts, Hyde was elected a member of the board in any known legal sense, a test must be found to which the question can be subjected. Two only can be suggested: the test de facto and the test de jure. Which of the twain should be adopted here? The test de facto should not be used for the following reasons:

1. That test is applied only to public officers, corporations, and governments—or, more largely stated, to persons natural or artificial—never to events. The books speak of “valid elections,” “legal elections,” and “colorable elections,” but nowhere of “elections de facto.”

2. The de facto rule, when applied to public officers, is not used by the law from choice, but from public necessity, or for the purpose of preserving the rights of third persons; and when used for or against corporations, it is on the ground of “good faith,” and then it is worked by way of estoppel.

As a further reason why the election of Hyde should not be tested by the rule de facto, we suggest that that rule is adopted with a view to conserve an act done: as in the case of a judgment rendered, or any other official act done under color of authority, or in case of a contract made by a private company, holding itself out to the world as a corporation, etc.

The question of whether Hyde was ever elected a member of the Board of Assistants, is to be determined by the rule de jure. Under that rule, as he obviously lacked capacity to hold the office under the limitations of the charter, he was never elected at all.

The question is not, whether, at some time prior to his resignation, Hyde did not become an officer de facto; nor is it whether some ordinance which he may have voted for, and which for its validity may have depended upon his vote, shall be held good on the ground that he was an officer de facto, or be held bad on the ground that he was not something better than an officer de facto; but it is, was his election a de facto election; or, on the other hand, was it a mere nullity? An utterly void election is legally possible. (Rex v. Mayor of Birmingham, 7 A. & E. 254; Dickey v. Hurlburt, 5 Cal. 343; People v. Porter, 6 Id. 28; People v. Johnson, Id. 673; People v. Weller, 11 Id. 49; People v. Martin, 12 Id. 409; People v. Westbrook, 14 Id. 180.)

Nathaniel Bennett, for Respondent.

We maintain that Hyde was a “member elected” of the Board of Assistant Aldermen. We have seen that an election was duly held; that such election was not only an election de facto, but de jure. It was conducted with all the formalities essential to make it an election de jure. The labored distinction of the counsel for appellants between an election de facto and an election de jure, falls to the ground. It appears to us, that the distinction between the terms de facto and de jure, as applicable to an election, is misapprehended. An election de jure is one which is held after all the necessary preliminary steps have been taken, such as proper notice, etc., and where it is held by the proper officers, and at the proper place and time. But there may be an election held, where all the circumstances required by law do not concur, and such would be an election de facto. The counsel confound the distinction between an election de facto, and an officer de facto. Now, Hyde was elected at an election held de jure; but, if he was destitute of the proper qualifications for a candidate, he became, after the election, an officer de facto; and being such officer de facto, all the results necessarily flow from his holding the office, whether they be of a positive or negative character — whether they be acts of commission or of omission — whether the enactment of ordinances, or the failure of ordinances proposed. If he was a “member elected” for any purpose, he was a “member elected” for all purposes, and as affecting all acts, as well negative as positive.

But what matters it whether Hyde was an “elected member” of the board or not? The result is the same. If he was not elected, his opponent was; and, whether the one or the other, eight Assistant Aldermen were elected; for no objection is raised that the candidate opposing Hyde had not the proper qualifications. That an election was held in September, 1853, is not denied. It is expressly admitted. At such election, one of the two candidates for the office of Assistant Alderman must be taken to have been elected — either Hyde or his opponent, Capt. H. S. Brown; and if either, the full number of eight Assistant Aldermen required by the charter, must be deemed to have been elected.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NOERON, J. concurring.

This is one of numerous cases arising out of the attempted sale in 1853, by the municipal authorities of the City of San Francisco, of property known as the City Slips; and depends entirely upon the validity of City Ordinance No. 481, which purported to authorize such sale. The charter of the City of San Francisco then in force, declared that no ordinance should be passed "unless by a majority of all the members elected to such Board." The Board by law consisted of eight members; but at the time this ordinance was passed, one of the members, Hyde, had resigned, leaving only seven in office, of whom four voted for the ordinance and three against it. It is contended that the charter required not less than five affirmative votes to pass an ordinance, and that as this ordinance received only four votes in its favor, it was not therefore legally passed; that it was no ordinance, and no right could be acquired under it. This construction of the charter has been sustained by repeated decisions of this Court. (San Francisco v. Hazen, 5 Cal. 169; Holland v. San Francisco, 7 Id. 361; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Id. 594; Grogan v. San Francisco, 18 Id. 590; Pimental v. San Francisco, 21 Id. 351.) The appellant contends, however, that some important questions were overlooked or not considered by the Court in those cases, and therefore asks that the whole subject be reviewed, and a new construction given to the clause of the charter in question; or that it be held inapplicable to the ordinance in question. Where a question involving pecuniary interests of such great value as the present one, has been fully adjudicated for a long period of time, and is sustained by numerous decisions; and where rights and interests of great value have been acquired under it, it ought not to be disturbed, except for the strongest reasons and under the most urgent necessity. It is with this general view of the subject that we propose to examine the questions raised by the appellants.

It is urged that in those cases it appeared to be an admitted fact that Hyde had been regularly elected a member of the Board, and that a few days before the passage of Ordinance 481, his place became vacant by voluntary resignation. It is claimed that the record in this case shows that he was not thus elected, because he was an alien, and not therefore eligible to the office; that the Board for that year consisted of seven members only, instead of eight, and therefore four constituted a "majority of all the members elected."

Satterlee v. San Francisco.

It is insisted that this is a new question, presented to the Court for the first time in this case; and that the decision in the cases above referred to are not decisive, even though the language of the opinions is broad enough to cover this question. In the Grogan case, it was stated that the clause of the charter in question was one "which this Court has held, required for the passage of an ordinance a majority of the votes of the entire number which the charter provided should be elected." And the opinions in the Hazen and McCracken cases are to the same effect. The proper construction of that clause of the charter was one of the matters to be adjudicated by the Court in those cases, and we cannot with propriety regard those decisions as mere obiter dicta.

It is not disputed that an election was duly held in the City of San Francisco in September, 1853; that Hyde was one of the candidates at that election; that he received a majority of all the votes cast for Assistant Alderman of the First Ward at such election; that he received a proper certificate of his election; that he took the required oath of office, and was duly installed into the office; that he was declared duly elected by the proper officers, and took his seat with the other members of the board, and acted as such from the time of his election to the date of his resignation, which was a few days before the passage of the ordinance in question. There is no question that the other seven members of the board were duly elected, and that they were eligible to the office. These facts show that there were eight "members elected," within the intent and meaning of the charter; and we hold that the number of "members elected" was not reduced from eight to seven by the mere fact that Hyde was not eligible to the office by reason of his alienage. The charter provides that each board should "judge of the qualifications of election of its own members." The board having declared him duly elected, his eligibility was so far determined by the body in which the power was vested by law, as that he became a member of the board, with the right to exercise the same powers and perform the same duties as other members, at least until his right to hold and retain the office had been duly adjudicated in a proper judicial proceeding instituted for that purpose. While he held the office he was an officer de facto, and his acts as such officer were entitled to credit accordingly.

It is urged that though there was an election de facto in the First Ward at that time, yet there was no election de jure, because the successful candidate was not eligible. We cannot subscribe to that view. The validity of an election does not depend upon the eligibility of the candidates, for if it did, it might be contended that an election would be invalid because an unsuccessful candidate was disqualified from holding the office voted for. The validity of an election depends upon its being held and conducted at the proper time and place, in the manner and by the proper persons and officers, as required by law. The election in this case was thus held, and it was therefore valid. The person receiving a majority of the votes at a valid election may not possess the necessary qualifications to entitle him to take or hold the office to which he is elected; but that is a question to be adjudicated by the proper tribunals.

In this case, the board to which Hyde was elected had the power to determine this question, and they are to be considered as having decided it when they declared him duly elected; but their action was not final. His right to take and hold the office might have been contested under the proceedings authorized by the election law, or by a writ of quo warranto. But the validity of the election, or his right to take and hold the office, cannot be inquired into in a collateral action or proceeding like the present. (Turner v. Maloney, 13 Cal. 621; People v. Olds, 3 Id. 174, 175; People v. Collins, 7 J. R. 549; Wilcox v. Smith, 5 Wend. 281; Hall v. Luther, 13 Id. 491; Shore v. Scott River Water Company, 17 Cal. 626.)

The case of Searcy v. Grow (15 Cal. 121), referred to by the appellant, does not conflict with this principle, as that was a proceeding under the election law contesting the election of the defendant, and was therefore a proceeding directly against the person claiming the office, to prevent him from taking or holding it. In the case of Turner v. Maloney (13 Cal. 621), it was directly held, that the question of eligibility of an officer could not be tried in a collateral proceeding. In that case it was an application for a mandamus to compel the Controller of State to draw his warrant for the plaintiff's salary as District Judge. It was opposed, on the ground that the plaintiff was ineligible because he held the office of Inspector of Customs, a lucrative office under the United States — a similar question to that raised in the case of Searcy v. Grow.

But if we are mistaken in our views of this question, we would not feel justified in overturning the previous decisions of this Court construing this clause of the charter. To do so, would clearly violate the rule of stare decisis. Under these circumstances it is not necessary to inquire whether that construction is correct or not.

The judgment is affirmed.

WENBORN v. BOSTON et al. — CALDERWOOD et al., INTERVENORS.

No APPEAL lies from an order denying a motion for leave to intervene.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

David Calderwood, for Appellants.

Crockett, Page, and Tevis, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order denying a motion for leave to intervene, made by Calderwood and wife. The respondents contend that no appeal lies from such an order. The appellants reply, that as to them it is a final judgment. Sec. 336 of the Practice Act specifies the cases in which an appeal may be taken, and an order of this kind is not included among them. Nor can it properly be said to be included in the terms "final judgment," used in that section. The remedy of the appellants is by an appeal from the final judgment when rendered.

The appeal is dismissed.

Frank Hereford, for Appellant.

George B. Moore, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORN, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon a promissory note executed by Allington & Parker. It appears that Allington had given the plaintiff a non-negotiable note for the same amount as the note sued on, executed by one Smith, not at the time due, and therefore the note sued on was surrendered up to Allington. Smith, it appears, had a note against Allington, of an amount sufficient, as a set-off to the note thus transferred by Allington to the plaintiff, and when the plaintiff demanded the money due on Smith's note, the latter claimed the set-off and refused to pay. The plaintiff then brought this action upon the original note, which had been surrendered at the time of the exchange.

The appellant contends that the plaintiff had no right of action upon the original note until he had instituted suit against Smith, or it was shown that Smith was insolvent, or had absconded from the State. This point is not well taken. It was held by this Court in Griffith v. Grogan (12 Cal. 317), that when a promissory note is received upon an antecedent debt, such debt is not extinguished thereby, unless the new note was, by express agreement, received in payment of the antecedent debt; that it only operated to extend, until the maturity of the note, the period for the payment of the debt. There is no evidence in this case of any express agreement that the new note was to be in payment of the old one, or that the debt due on the old note was to be extinguished by accepting the new one. The only fact tending that way was, that the old note was surrendered when the new note was received; but that was held insufficient to prove such an agreement in the case of Olcott v. Rathbone (5 Wend. 490). The law will not presume such an agreement, and it must be proved by the party relying upon it. The taking of the new note operated as an extension of the time of payment of the old note; and as soon as that extended time had expired, the plaintiff had a right to bring his action upon the old note, if the amount was not then paid; and he was under no obligation to sue on the note of Smith. His right of action upon the old note did not depend upon the contingency of an unsuccessful suit against Smith.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONTRA COSTA COAL MINES RAILROAD COMPANY
v. J. MORA MOSS et al., DEFENDANTS, AND MOUNT DIABLO RAILROAD COMPANY, INTERVENORS.

THE petition asking the Court to condemn land for railroad purposes under the Railroad Law of this State, in order to give the Court jurisdiction, should aver that petitioners have endeavored to contract for the land, sought to be acquired for the use of the railroad, and that they cannot contract for the purchase thereof.

The Court has full power to grant leave to amend such petition, whenever it shall be of opinion that justice may require it.

The question whether that clause of the Constitution prohibiting private property from being taken for public use without a just compensation, authorizes the Legislature to confer upon railroad companies the power of taking land from the owners upon the payment of a just compensation, has been fully put at rest, and the right and power firmly established by numerous decisions.

The question of the public character of railroads, and their necessity for public use, is one that partakes more of a political than a judicial character, and rests much, if not entirely, in the sound discretion of the Legislature; and when the political department of the Government has recognized the public character and necessity for public use of any particular proposed railroad, Courts will rarely, if ever, in a proceeding to condemn lands, investigate and determine this preliminary question.

Under the general Railroad Law, all railroads are compelled to act as common carriers for the conveyance of all passengers and property that may come to their road for that purpose.

The Courts are not authorized to condemn lands for railroad purposes, unless it is shown by evidence that the petitioners have endeavored to contract for the purchase of the same, but have been unable to do so.

The general Railroad Law has not given to any company organized under it, the right to condemn or use any lands owned or previously located and appropriated for railroad purposes by another railroad company, except where it may be necessary for one railroad to cross another. Land once located by a company, who are proceeding in good faith and with reasonable diligence in the construction of their road, cannot be taken from it and appropriated by another company.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John B. Felton and J. W. Stephenson, for Defendants and Intervenors, Appellants.

Pratt & Clarke, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPR, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is a proceeding under the general Railroad Law of this State to condemn land for railroad purposes. The defendants appeared and filed a demurrer to the petition of the railroad company, setting up various grounds. The Court sustained the demurrer and allowed the plaintiffs to amend their petition; and the granting leave to amend is now assigned as error. The principal grounds of the demurrer were, that the petition did not state that the land sought to be acquired was necessary for the purposes of the company; and that it did not show that the company could not contract for the purchase of the land. It is insisted that these averments were essential to give the Court jurisdiction of the proceedings; that the Court had no power to allow the plaintiffs to amend their petition; and that the Court could not acquire jurisdiction by the amended petition; and that it was the duty of the Court, upon sustaining the demurrer, to dismiss the proceeding. Sec. 23d of the general Railroad Law of 1861, under which these proceedings were prosecuted, contains this provision: "If such company cannot contract for the purchase of any real estate, or any right, title, or interest therein, necessary for any of the purposes aforesaid, from the person or persons owning the same, then such company may acquire the same, for the purposes in this section expressed, by means of the special proceedings prescribed in this act." Under a clause of the same character, though differently worded, it was held, by this Court, that the person applying for a condemnation must have first sought and failed to buy the land from the owner. (Gilmer v. Lime Point, 19 Cal. 47.) The Legislature of 1863 (Stat. 1863, 613) so amended Sec. 23 of the general Railroad Law as no longer to make this inability to contract a condition or ground of jurisdiction in proceedings to condemn land. The power of the Legislature to declare the terms and conditions upon which such proceedings might be instituted, was fully sustained in that case.

Sec. 33 of the general Railroad Law contains this provision: "The said Court or Judge may make all such orders as may be necessary or proper in the special proceedings provided for in this act, and shall cause the pleadings and proceeding to be amended whenever justice shall require it to be done, and shall direct the manner of the service of all orders and notices not herein specially provided for." It is clear that the Court had full power, under this provision, to grant leave to the plaintiffs to amend their petition. The mere fact that the matters to be amended related to the jurisdiction of the Court over the proceedings can make no difference. The power to cause amendments to be made is granted in general terms, unqualified by anything which would justify the Court in refusing leave to amend in the matters objected to in this case. This point is therefore overruled.

the public convenience; and it is therefore urged that they have no right to condemn the land in question, and that the Legislature has no power to authorize them to take private property for such uses. The Constitution contains this provision: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." It is clear that the Legislature has no power to take the property of one person and give it to another, nor have they the power to compel one person to part with his property for the mere private use or benefit of another. It is equally true that they have the right to take private property for public use, upon paying a just compensation. At the commencement of the construction of railroads in the United States, where these constitutional provisions exist, one question much discussed was, whether the use of land for railroad purposes was a "public use" within those terms as used in the various State Constitutions, so that the Legislature would be authorized to confer upon railroad companies the power of taking the land from the owners, upon the payment of a just compensation, in the mode prescribed by the various railroad charters. It is unnecessary to refer to the arguments used during this discussion; for the question has been fully put at rest, and the right and power firmly established by numerous decisions. Nor do the counsel for the appellants question the general result of these decisions. They, however, contend that the railroad the plaintiffs are about constructing is not of such a character as entitles them to take the private property of other persons for its use or construction.

On the twenty-ninth day of April, 1861, (Stat. 1861, 264), the Legislature passed a law granting the railroad franchise in question to William Fitzpatrick and others, who were required therein to organize themselves, their associates and assigns, into a corporation under the Railroad Corporation Law. It granted to them the right of way over the lands of the State, and authority to construct and maintain a railroad, with the necessary branches, from the coal mines in Contra Costa County, through what is known as "Kirk's Pass," to some point on the San Joaquin River or Suisun Bay that would admit of the delivery of the road freight directly into the vessels employed in its water transportation, and the right to construct a wharf at such termination; with power to collect such tolls and wharfage as might be allowed by the Board of Supervisors of Contra Costa County. In pursuance of this statute, the plaintiffs were organized as a railroad corporation under the general Railroad Law of 1861; and they by that, assumed, and are bound to perform all the duties and obligations imposed upon and required of other railroad corporations organized in this State. The necessity of the plaintiffs' railroad for public use is not only as fully established as that of any other railroad built by a corporation organized under the general Railroad Law, but its public character has received a special recognition by the passage of the special law above referred to. If the inquiry, whether the road is of "public use," can be gone into in the present case, it can in that of every railroad which may hereafter be constructed in the State; and in every proceeding to condemn land, the Courts could be called upon to investigate and determine this preliminary question. The question is one that partakes more of a political than a judicial character. It therefore rests much, if not entirely, in the sound discretion of the Legislature. (Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 251, 252.) It is their duty to define what kind of railroads shall be deemed of such a public character as to entitle them to take private property for the use of the road. There may possibly occur cases in which it might be the duty of the Courts to interfere to prevent the rights of private ownership of property from being invaded, under the pretense of an appropriation for public use; but we do not deem the present a case of that kind.

It is objected that the Act of 1861 does not make it obligatory upon a company formed under it to act as a common carrier for the expeditious conveyance of passengers and property, or make it a condition that the railroad shall be constructed between points of commercial importance, so that they can be used by the public as common carriers. And it is urged that the plaintiffs are constructing a railroad from a coal mine in the mountains through a desolate region to navigable waters, to enable it to get coal ready to market; that this is a mere private use; and therefore they have no right to appropriate the property of others to its purposes without their consent. The forty-fifth section of the general Railroad Law of 1861 provides that, "Every such company shall start and run their cars for the transportation of persons and property, at such regular times as they shall fix by public notice, and shall furnish sufficient accommodations for the transportation of all such passengers and property as shall, within a reasonable time previous thereto, offer, or be offered, for transportation, at the place of starting, and the junction of other railroads, and at siding and stopping places, established for receiving and discharging way passengers and freight; and shall take, transport, and discharge such passengers and property at, from, and to such places, on the due payment of tolls, freight, or fare therefor." And Sec. 46 provides that, "in case of refusal by such company or their agents so to take and transport any passengers or property, or to deliver the same at the regular appointed places, such company shall pay to the party aggrieved all damages which shall be sustained thereby, with costs of suit." The plaintiffs, in common with other railroad companies organized under this act, are bound by these provisions, which makes it obligatory upon them to act as common carriers for the conveyance of all passengers and property that may come to their road for that purpose. The fact that their road does not connect points of present commercial importance cannot affect the rights of the plaintiffs. Railroads often make commercial points by their construction, and a large and cheap supply of coal brought to a point connected with water navigation, is one of the great necessities of the State, and a matter in which the whole State is interested. If we were to enter into an investigation to determine what point were of sufficient "commercial importance" to justify the construction of railroads, we would find ourselves engaged in a difficult field, with very little to guide us.

The plaintiffs, by their amended petition, allege that they have endeavored to contract with the parties claiming the land sought to be acquired for the use of the railroad; and that they cannot contract for the purchase thereof; which averment is denied by the defendants in their answer filed to the amended petition. At the trial, the plaintiffs called one Cutter, as a witness, to prove this averment; who merely testified that, as agent of the company, he had endeavored to contract with one of the defendants, Pioche, for that portion included in the "New York Rancho," but showing no attempt to contract with any other of the defendants. The defendants contend that the proof was insufficient to sustain the allegation of the amended petition upon this point, or to show that the plaintiffs were entitled, under the law, to institute these proceedings to condemn the land. On the other hand, the plaintiffs insist that the averment was unnecessary and immaterial, and therefore not necessary to be proved; because Sec. 24 of the general Railroad Law prescribes what the petition shall set forth; and this averment is not among them. Although this averment is not, apparently, required by Sec. 24, yet it is clear that the right of the plaintiffs to institute these special proceedings depends, under Sec. 23 as it stood before the amendment of 1863, upon the fact that they could not contract for the purchase of the land sought to be condemned. It was necessary, therefore, to aver and prove this fact, to give the Court jurisdiction of the case. There was no evidence of any attempt to contract with any of the defendants except Pioche; and the Court therefore had no authority to take any action in the case except against him. (Gilmer v. Lime Point, 19 Cal. 47; Gilbert v. Columbia T. Co., 3 Johns. Cas. 107; Adams v. Saratoga & Wash. R. R. Co., 10 N. Y. 328.)

It appears that Cutter, the witness who testified upon this matter, was one of the stockholders of the corporation plaintiff, and the defendants objected to his testifying, on that ground; but the Court overruled the objection, and this is assigned as error. It has been settled by several decisions of this Court, that stockholders of a corporation are not competent witnesses on behalf of the corporation. (Mokelumne Hill Canal Co. v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 265; McAuley v. York Mining Co., 6 Id. 80; Wolf v. St. Louis Independent Water Co., 15 Id. 319.) It is unnecessary to determine whether the witness was admissible under Sec. 422 of the Practice Act, as amended in 1861, as no notice of the intention to examine him was given, as required by that act. The Court therefore erred in overruling the defendants' objection to this witness.

While these proceedings were pending in the District Court, the "Mount Diablo Railroad Company" filed their petition of intervention, averring that they were duly organized as a corporation on the thirteenth day of July, 1861, under the general Railroad Law of that year, for the purpose of constructing a railroad from the San Joaquin River, at a place known as New York, to the coal mines in the hills back of that place; that they had located their line and filed a map thereof in the County Recorder's office on the thirteenth day of July, 1861; that they hold and own a certain strip of land over which their railroad is located, and which is necessary for the use of their road, describing it; that the greater part of the route proposed by the plaintiffs for their railroad is within and a part of the tract thus acquired by them for the purposes of its said road; and that the acquisition of the land set forth in plaintiff's petition, would interfere with and destroy the line of road laid out by them. It seems that there is a narrow pass, known as "Kirker's Pass," through which both of the lines of these two railroad companies are located, and it is difficult if not impossible for strips of land of the width prescribed by the Railroad Act to be located in this pass, so as that both roads could be constructed therein, without interfering with or running over a portion of the same land located by both companies. The general Railroad Law of this State has conferred no exclusive right upon any company organized under it to construct its road between any points in the State. Nor has it given to any company the right to condemn or use any lands owned or previously located and appropriated by another railroad company, except where it may be necessary for one railroad to cross another. Thus it is clear that one railroad company cannot locate its line along or upon the previously located line of another company, nor can it condemn or appropriate land along or upon the previously located line of another railroad company, except, as before stated, where it may be necessary for one railroad to cross another. Land once located by a company, who are proceeding, in good faith and with reasonable diligence, in the construction of their road, cannot be taken from it under these proceedings, and appropriated by another company for railroad purposes. By its priority of location and appropriation, the first company locating its line acquires a vested right to its line of road, and the land necessary for its construction, as prescribed by the Railroad Law, of which it cannot be divested by another company who seek to appropriate the land to the same use. The next question is, which of these two companies first located their line of railroad in this narrow pass, or at any other place where they interfere with each other? This question we are unable to determine from the record before us; and as the case will have to go back for a new trial, it can be determined by the Court below upon such evidence as may be brought before it, in accordance with the principles laid down in this opinion.

The order of the Court below, appointing Commissioners to ascertain and assess the compensation to be paid for the land sought to be appropriated by the plaintiffs, is set aside and reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

GALLAGHER v. WILLIAMSON.

When property which has been sold is afterwards levied upon and sold under an execution by a creditor of the vendor, and suit is brought by the vendee to recover damages for the alleged wrongful taking, and the defense is, that the sale was made to defraud creditors, and that there was no immediate delivery or continuous change of possession, the statements of the vendor, whether made before or after the sale, are competent evidence to prove the fraud as against him. Whether the statements of the vendor are evidence against the vendee depends on circumstances. If made before the sale is completed, they are evidence against the vendee.

Confidential communications made by a client, to an attorney, respecting the business he is employed to transact, are privileged, and the attorney cannot be compelled to disclose them. But statements made by the client, to other persons at the time, or by other persons to him, are not thus privileged, and the attorney is bound to disclose them the same as any other witness.

On the trial, this interrogatory was put to a witness: "Did you see any difference in the appearance or management of things after the sale, from that before the sale, of the stage and horses to plaintiff?"

Held, to be a proper question, and not objectionable in cases of this character.

Where a Court instructs a jury upon what state of facts they may find a verdict for a party, the instruction should include all the facts in controversy material to the right of plaintiff, or defense of defendant.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below against the defendant, Williamson, and he appealed.

Gallagher v. Williamson.

John Currey, for Appellant.

Williams & Thornton, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages for the alleged taking of a stage-coach, horses, and harness, by the defendant from the plaintiff. It appears that Patrick Gallagher, the plaintiff's brother, was formerly the owner of the property in controversy; and becoming embarrassed and insolvent, he executed a bill of sale to the plaintiff, at the request of a sister, Mrs. Giblin, dated August 20th, 1861, to secure, or in payment of, a debt due from Patrick to the plaintiff. At that time, Patrick was indebted to the defendant, Williamson, who commenced an action thereon a few days afterwards; and on the sixteenth day of September, recovered judgment thereon, for $1,104.58 and costs; on which judgment an execution issued, which was duly levied upon the property in question, and the same was afterwards sold on the execution. These acts constitute the alleged taking. The defendant contended that the sale to the plaintiff was made to defraud the creditors of Patrick Gallagher, of whom he was one, and that there was no immediate delivery or continuous possession in the plaintiff within the Statute of Frauds; and that the sale was therefore void as to him.

It seems the bill of sale was made in the night time of August 29th, in the absence of the plaintiff—the contract on his behalf being made by Mrs. Giblin, who acted as his agent. At the trial, one Lay was called as a witness for the defendant, and testified that he had a conversation with Patrick Gallagher the next morning, to wit: August 30th, about the transaction, in which the latter told him the purpose for which the bill of sale had been made. He was then asked to state what he told him upon the subject; to which the plaintiff objected; that such statements were mere hearsay, and they were made after the bill of sale was executed. The Court sustained the objection, and this is assigned as error. The Court clearly erred in its ruling on this point. The defendants had an undoubted right to prove that the vendor made this bill of sale for the purpose of defrauding his creditors; and his statements upon the subject, whether made before or after the execution of the bill of sale, were competent evidence to prove that fact, as against him. Whether such statements were evidence against the vendee, depends upon circumstances. The defendant insists, that at the time this conversation occurred, the sale had not been completed; that Mrs. Giblin had no authority from the plaintiff to make the contract; and he did not, until afterward, know of the sale to him, or ratify it. If these statements were made to the witness before the sale was in fact completed, they were admissible in evidence against the plaintiff, as statements made by the vendor before he had finally parted with his title to the property; and whether they were thus made was a question for the jury to determine from all the evidence.

It appears that Mrs. Giblin employed one Currier, an attorney at law, to draw up a bill of sale, and they went to the office of one Woods for that purpose. The defendant called Currier as a witness, and asked him this question: "Did you hear Mrs. Giblin say, when you went to the office of Squire Woods, on the night of August 29th, 1861, that she had no authority from plaintiff to transact the business for him, of which she has testified on this trial?" The plaintiff objected that it was a privileged communication made to the witness as an attorney, and therefore he could not disclose it; the Court sustained the objection, and this is assigned for error. Other questions were also put to this witness respecting the conversations between the vendor, Mrs. Giblin, and other persons present at the time of the transaction, relating to the object and design of the parties in making the bill of sale, which were excluded by the Court upon the same objection. It appears that Mrs. Giblin employed the attorney, and she was therefore his client so far as relates to this transaction. The rule is well settled, that the confidential counselor, solicitor, or attorney of the party cannot be compelled to disclose communications made to him in that capacity. (Landsberger v. Gorham, 5 Cal. 450). But this rule does not extend to any facts within his knowledge, or information acquired by him in any other way than by such confidential communications of the client. (Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 377.) It follows that all state-much, if not entirely, in the sound discretion of the Legislature; and when the political department of the Government has recognized the public character and necessity for public use of any particular proposed railroad, Courts will rarely, if ever, in a proceeding to condemn lands, investigate and determine this preliminary question.

Under the general Railroad Law, all railroads are compelled to act as common carriers for the conveyance of all passengers and property that may come to their road for that purpose.

The Courts are not authorized to condemn lands for railroad purposes, unless it is shown by evidence that the petitioners have endeavored to contract for the purchase of the same, but have been unable to do so.

The general Railroad Law has not given to any company organized under it, the right to condemn or use any lands owned or previously located and appropriated for railroad purposes by another railroad company, except where it may be necessary for one railroad to cross another. Land once located by a company, who are proceeding in good faith and with reasonable diligence in the construction of their road, cannot be taken from it and appropriated by another company.

John B. Felton and J. W. Stephenson, for Defendants and Intervenors, Appellants.

Pratt & Clarke, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORN, O. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is a proceeding under the general Railroad Law of this State to condemn land for railroad purposes. The defendants appeared and filed a demurrer to the petition of the railroad company, setting up various grounds. The Court sustained the demurrer and allowed the plaintiffs to amend their petition; and the granting leave to amend is now assigned as error. The principal grounds of the demurrer were, that the petition did not state that the land sought to be acquired was necessary for the purposes of the company; and that it did not show that the company could not contract for the purchase of the land. It is insisted that these averments were essential to give the Court jurisdiction of the proceedings; that the Court had no power to allow the plaintiffs to amend their petition; and that the Court could not acquire jurisdiction by the amended petition; and that it was the duty of the Court, upon sustaining the demurrer, to dismiss the proceeding. Sec. 23d of the general Railroad Law of 1861, under which these proceedings were prosecuted, contains this provision: "If such company cannot contract for the purchase of any real estate, or any right, title, or interest therein, necessary for any of the purposes aforesaid, from the person or persons owning the same, then such company may acquire the same, for the purposes in this section expressed, by means of the special proceedings prescribed in this act." Under a clause of the same character, though differently worded, it was held, by this Court, that the person applying for a condemnation must have first sought and failed to buy the land from the owner. (Gilmer v. Lime Point, 19 Cal. 47.) The Legislature of 1863 (Stat. 1863, 613) so amended Sec. 23 of the general Railroad Law as no longer to make this inability to contract a condition or ground of jurisdiction in proceedings to condemn land. The power of the Legislature to declare the terms and conditions upon which such proceedings might be instituted, was fully sustained in that case.

Sec. 33 of the general Railroad Law contains this provision: "The said Court or Judge may make all such orders as may be necessary or proper in the special proceedings provided for in this act, and shall cause the pleadings and proceeding to be amended whenever justice shall require it to be done, and shall direct the manner of the service of all orders and notices not herein specially provided for." It is clear that the Court had full power, under this provision, to grant leave to the plaintiffs to amend their petition. The mere fact that the matters to be amended related to the jurisdiction of the Court over the proceedings can make no difference. The power to cause amendments to be made is granted in general terms, unqualified by anything which would justify the Court in refusing leave to amend in the matters objected to in this case. This point is therefore overruled.

It is next objected that the corporation, plaintiffs in this case, are a private company, incorporated for the advancement of their own private enterprise of coal mining, and not as common carriers for

of O'Connell, but it was refused by the Court. In August, 1862, Tevis recovered judgment in that action for the restitution of the premises, from which Calderwood caused an appeal to be taken to this Court, which was dismissed on the ground that the sureties in the undertaking, on appeal, had been excepted to, and had not justified according to law. (21 Cal. 512.) Before the judgment in Tevis v. O'Connell was rendered, and while that action was still pending in the District Court, Calderwood commenced the present action, having obtained the possession from O'Connell, alleging that he had the title to the premises, and was in possession; and that Tevis set up a false claim of title thereto. The case came on for trial in December, 1862, and Tevis recovered judgment, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

One of the defendants, Marye, answered the complaint, denying the plaintiff's title, and averring that the legal title was vested in Tevis, and that he, Marye, was the owner of the equitable title to the one-half of the premises. To this answer, the plaintiff demurred, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. It appears that the demurrer had not been submitted or disposed of when the case was tried. The plaintiff contends that it was an irregularity to try the case while this demurrer was pending, such as entitles him to have the judgment set aside and a new trial granted. He refers to the case of Hestres v. Clements (21 Cal. 425), in support of this point. In that case, the demurrer was to the complaint, and the decision was evidently founded upon Sec. 155 of the Practice Act, which provides that "when there are issues both of law and fact to the same complaint, the issues of law shall be first disposed of." The present case does not, however, come directly within the provisions of that section, as the demurrer was not to the complaint, but to one of the answers. The objection was not raised at the time of the trial; in fact, the plaintiff failed to appear or to prosecute his action at the time set for trial. At most, it was but an irregularity; and in this case we cannot see that the plaintiff has thereby been "prevented from having a fair trial," to bring his case within the first clause of Sec. 193 of the Practice Act. Nor has he suffered any injustice from it, to justify a new trial on this ground. (Sannicksen v. Brown, 5 Cal. 57; Johnson v. Sepulveda, Id. 151; Paige v. O'Neal, 12 Id. 493; Broadus v. Nelson, 16 Id. 79.) This objection is therefore overruled.

It is objected that, as the judgment in Tevis v. O'Connell was not rendered until after the present action was commenced, therefore the Court erred in admitting it in evidence. The action in which that judgment was rendered was pending at the time this action was commenced; and the right and title of the defendant Tevis, established by it, were vested in the latter before this action was instituted. A notice of lis pendens having been duly filed, and the plaintiff having purchased from the defendant therein while that action was pending, and after the notice was filed, is bound and estopped by the judgment therein, when rendered, equally with the defendant O'Connell. The mere fact that that judgment was not rendered until after the commencement of this action, cannot affect its conclusiveness and binding effect. The pendency of that action was plead by the defendant Tevis, in abatement of this suit; and it was perfectly proper for him to show that that action had been finally adjudicated in his favor.

The next point is, that the premises were claimed as a homestead by O'Connell and his wife; that the plaintiff purchased this homestead right and interest, and obtained a conveyance thereof, executed by O'Connell and his wife; and that this homestead right is not barred or concluded by the judgment in Tevis v. O'Connell, because the wife was not made a party to that action. The mere possession and use of premises as a homestead does not of itself create any interest in the property, when the parties claiming the homestead, in fact, have no title or estate therein. They are but trespassers upon the property of another. And in such cases it is not necessary to make the wife a party to an action founded upon such trespass. The trespass is the act of the husband, and not of the wife, and therefore he is the proper party. It follows, that a judgment against him, in such action, is conclusive upon him, and all persons claiming under him. This point, therefore, is not well taken. The plaintiff raises several other questions, but as they are destitute of merits, and unimportant, it is not necessary to refer to them.

The judgment is affirmed.

Nelson v. Murray.

NELSON v. MURRAY.

WHERE the pleadings are verified, and the answer in response to a material allegation of the complaint denies the same upon information and belief, the denial is insufficient.

If the answer merely denies the conclusions of law resulting from the facts averred in the complaint, it is insufficient to raise an issue, and the facts are deemed admitted.

APPEAL from the District Court, Thirteenth Judicial District, Merced County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Coffroth & Spaulding, for Appellant.

H. H. Hartley, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by an owner of a ferry to restrain the defendant from obstructing a public highway leading to it. The cause was submitted upon the complaint and answer, and a decree rendered granting a perpetual injunction. The appellant contends that all the material allegations of the complaint were denied by the answer, and therefore the Court erred in rendering judgment against him. An examination of the pleadings shows that the defendant, in answer to an averment in the complaint that the Board of Supervisors, on a certain day, made a certain order establishing a certain road, denies, upon information and belief, that the Court of Sessions established or opened a road, as averred in the complaint, which is clearly insufficient. Many of the denials follow the language of the complaint literally, in such a way as to render them insufficient to raise issues, where the pleadings are verified as in this case. The complaint also avers that the Board of Supervisors of the county, in October, 1855, made an order declaring the road in question a public highway; and the answer merely denies that the road became a public highway in the manner prescribed by law, which is clearly insufficient. The whole answer is evasive, and the material facts to sustain the plaintiff's action are not specifically denied, and are therefore to be deemed admitted. The Court below did not err in treating the answer as insufficient to put the plaintiff upon his proof.

The judgment is affirmed.

VERZAN v. MCGREGOR et al.

THE general rule is, that it is for the Court to determine all questions relating to the admissibility of evidence; but when the question of its admissibility depends upon the decision of other questions of fact, such as the execution of a contract or agreement, and the testimony is conflicting as to whether the instrument was in fact executed or delivered, it is proper to submit this question to the jury, under proper instructions from the Court.

Where the party offering the instrument, makes out a prima facie case of its execution, the other party should not be allowed to introduce counter proof before the instrument is read to the jury.

Parol evidence is admissible when it relates to the execution or authenticity of a written instrument, or to its delivery, or whether the delivery was absolute or conditional.

Where a written agreement is signed and executed by the parties, and at the same time an addition is made in writing upon the same paper, beneath the signature, which additional writing is not signed by either of the parties independent of the signatures of the parties which precede it, parol evidence may be introduced to show whether the parties intended this addition to form a part of the contract.

Defendants entered into a contract with the Table Mountain Ditch Co. to perform certain labor on the ditch of the company. The contract contained many stipulations; one of which was, that if the work was not completed by a certain time, defendants should forfeit the contract, and also all moneys due on the same: held, that if this clause in the contract was inserted under a mistake as to the amount and difficulty of the labor to be performed, it was void; and that it did not deprive defendants of the benefit of the other clauses in the agreement.

If the pleadings are under oath, and the replications in response to a material averment of the answer undertake to deny, by saying "It is not true," etc., the replication is evasive and does not specifically deny the averment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellant.

That the Court was the proper tribunal to determine the admissibility of the memorandum, I refer to the following authority: (1 Greenl. on Ev. Sec. 49.) In equity, time is seldom of the essence of a contract; in law, it generally is, unless waived. It is true, Courts always, to prevent injustice, seize on slight circumstances to determine that time is waived. And to prevent a party from sustaining a total loss — where he only fails in time — the Courts always allow an action in assumpsit (not on the contract) in the quantum meruit, or some other of the common counts, where the defendant has accepted the work, service, material, or other thing from the plaintiff, whereby he has actually been benefited; but then plaintiff can avail himself of no special provision of a written contract. (2 Parsons on Cont. 172.)

S. Rosenbaum, for Respondents.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a ditch or canal used to convey water for mining purposes. The ditch was originally owned by the "Table Mountain Ditch Co.," and had been sold under a judgment and execution against the company, and purchased by one Rhodes, and by him conveyed to the plaintiff. The sale to Rhodes was made on the sixteenth day of April, 1860. On the twenty-ninth day of May, 1859, the defendants entered into contract with the company, by which they agreed to finish, widen, deepen, and repair the ditch; dig a tunnel, and erect several flumes connected with the ditch; and agreed to finish the work in November, 1859. The defendants are in possession of the property under this contract; claiming the right to retain the possession until they are paid for the labor done on the work. This claim of the defendants is founded upon the following writing, which is written under the contract, just below the signatures of the parties, but is not signed by either of them, independent of the signatures to the contract itself, which precedes it. It is as follows: "The Versan v. McGregor.

Table Mountain Ditch Co. agree to give to the parties of the first part, the right of way for digging the ditch. And the parties of the second part, agreeing to give the parties of the first part the ditch as security till the whole is paid. Also agreeing to build two sufficient reservoirs to hold water from said ditch; one at the end of the long flume, also one on Table Mountain. Failing to build such reservoirs, to pay interest on all money due the parties of the first part."

One important question in the case is, whether or not this memorandum forms any part of the contract between the parties. On this point Nesbit and Saucier, the subscribing witnesses, whose names are subscribed to the main contract above the memorandum, were examined before the Court. Nesbit testified that he was present when the contract was signed, and was called to witness it. Several hours were spent in discussing it. Defendants wished security for their pay. Tyre (who acted for the company) said he was willing to give security for their pay, if the defendants would give security for finishing their work; and it was agreed that the defendants should give security for the performance of their contract to the amount of five hundred dollars. Tyre then wrote the memorandum as security for the payment on the contract, and the defendants left to get security before the memorandum was signed; that when he signed as a subscribing witness, McGregor was on one side of him and Tyre on the other. Witness asked why the memorandum was not signed. Tyre replied that the memorandum had nothing to do with the contract; and McGregor was standing by his side at the time, within three feet of him, and made no response. He supposes McGregor must have heard him ask the question. The memorandum was to be executed conditionally; and he is certain defendants so understood it. The defendants refused to take the contract unless security was given; and they said they would give security to the company, if the latter would give the memorandum. Nothing was said about the memorandum when the contract was delivered.

Saucier, the other attesting witness, testified that he was present when the memorandum was written. It was talked over for an hour or more. Tyre wrote the memorandum and read it, and both parties then signed. The memorandum seemed to make the contract satisfactory; noticed that the paper was signed above the memorandum. The paper was ready for signing before the memorandum was written. It was read as a part of the contract. The witness thought it a part of the contract, and thinks all thought so. He did not hear any consultation about security. Several other witnesses, including McGregor, one of the defendants, were examined on this point, and some of them state that it was agreed that it was written as a mere memorandum until the defendants gave security in the amount of five hundred dollars, and then to be signed. It seems that the defendants never gave this five hundred dollars security. The Court below, after hearing all the evidence upon this point, held, that the memorandum formed no part of the contract, and excluded it from the jury; but afterwards, upon a statement of the defendants, that they claimed that the acts of the company were a fraud upon them if the memorandum was excluded, and that this fraud was for the jury to determine, the Court permitted it to be read to the jury in connection with the parol evidence. The jury found a general verdict for the defendants, and also a special verdict upon several questions; among others, "that the defendants had a lien and possession of the ditch as security for the payment of their demands for labor and materials furnished and used in said ditch, tunnels, and flumes," and that Rhodes and the plaintiff had notice of the lien.

The first question to determine is, whether the Court erred in submitting the contract and memorandum together to the jury. The general rule is, that it is for the Court to determine all questions relating to the admissibility of evidence; and when this question of admissibility depends upon the decision of other questions of fact, such as the execution of a contract or agreement, these preliminary facts are, in the first instance, to be tried by the Judge; but he may, at his discretion, take the opinion of the jury upon them. Often these preliminary questions are mixed questions of law and fact; or the evidence may be conflicting as to whether the instrument was in fact executed or delivered by the parties; in which case it is proper to submit the question to the jury under proper instructions from the Court. It is enough to authorize such submission to the jury that there is some proof of the facts on which the right to admit the evidence is predicated. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 49.) It is often the case that the main question in controversy is the execution and authenticity of the instrument. And the rule is, that if there be no evidence of authenticity, the instrument cannot be read to the jury; but if there be any fact or circumstances tending to prove the authenticity from which it might be presumed, then the instrument is to be read to the jury, and the question, like other matters of fact, is for their decision. (2 Phillips' Ev., C. H. & E.'s Notes, 503, Note.) And when a prima facie case of execution has once been made, the Court is not to allow the other party to adduce counter proof before the instrument is read, and thus assume to take the question from the jury. (Id.) Testing the present case by these rules, it is manifest that the Court erred — first, in permitting the plaintiff to introduce counter proof after the defendants had made a prima facie case of execution; second, in deciding that the memorandum formed no part of the contract between the parties after such prima facie proof had been made, thus taking the question from the jury; but these errors were corrected by afterwards permitting the instrument to be read, and leaving the question of its authenticity to the jury. So the action of the Court, taken as a whole, forms no ground for reversing the case.

The next question is, whether parol evidence was admissible to show that the memorandum formed part of the contract or agreement of the parties. As a general rule, parol evidence is not admissible when it relates to the construction to be given to a written contract; but such evidence is admissible when it relates to the execution or authenticity of the instrument, or to its delivery, or whether the delivery was absolute or conditional. In such cases the execution and acts of delivery being mostly a matter in pais, oral declarations of intentions connected with the execution and delivery may properly come in as part of the res gestæ. (2 Phillips' Ev., C. H. & E.'s Notes, 754.) On this point, the case of Heywood v. Perrin (10 Pick. 228) is very similar to the present. In that case a promissory note, payable on demand, had been signed by the defendant; but before its delivery the defendant objected to it because it was payable on demand, and thereupon the following memorandum was written at the bottom of the note, below the signature of the defendant and the attestation of a subscribing witness, to wit: "One-half to be paid in twelve months, the balance in twenty-four months;" and it was then delivered to the payee. The Court held, that it was competent for either party to prove by parol evidence the time when, the person by whom, and the circumstances under which the memorandum was affixed to the note. But evidence of the declarations of the promisee as to his intention in taking the contract in that form, and as to his understanding of the meaning and construction of its terms, could have no effect in giving a construction to the instrument, as the Court was bound to construe it according to its terms, and could not be aided by the declarations of the parties made at the time. The Court, therefore, held that the words "payable on demand," in the body of the note, were qualified and controlled by the memorandum at the bottom.

The evidence upon this point, in the present case, was somewhat conflicting, and it was a proper matter for the jury to determine after hearing all the testimony; and as their conclusion is sustained by the Court below in refusing a new trial, we should not be justified in disturbing the verdict on the ground that it is not sustained by the evidence. It seems that some of the testimony on this point was given to the Court in the absence of the jury, and was not restated by the witnesses to the jury. It was the fault of the plaintiff that the evidence was not restated to the jury after the Court decided to submit the whole matter to the jury. If he had reoffered such testimony, and the Court had excluded it, he would then have had some ground on which to predicate error.

The contract set up by the defendants contains this clause: "The parties of the first part also agree to finish the whole work on or before the fifteenth of November, 1859; and they expressly agree that if the tunnel, ditch, and flume are not finished within ten days of the time specified, they will forfeit the contract, as also all moneys due on the same." The work was not finished until long after the time specified; and the defendants set up as reasons for the delay, that the tunnel to be constructed was much longer than the company represented, and the rock in the tunnel was found to be much harder than was anticipated, and harder than was represented by the company. The Court instructed the jury that the time was not of the essence of the contract, and a failure to complete within the time would not be a forfeiture of the amount due under the contract for labor and materials that were of actual value to the company; and if the parties were mutually mistaken in regard to the length of the tunnel, and the time fixed was based on such mistake, the stipulation as to time would be void, and the defendants would have a reasonable time in which to complete the work. Or if the company represented the tunnel to be shorter than it really was, and if the defendants believed such representation to be true, and acted thereon in fixing the time for completion, then the clause as to time and forfeiture would be void, and defendants would be entitled to a reasonable time. To these instructions the plaintiff excepted, and asked the Court to instruct them "that if the defendants had not completed their work within ten days after the fifteen of November, they could not claim any lien or other advantages under the contract, but could at most only recover the reasonable value of their work, without lien or other advantages from the contract," which the Court refused, and this is assigned as error.

Where an act is done or a contract is made under an injurious mistake or ignorance of a material fact, it is voidable; and this rule is not limited to cases where there has been a fraudulent concealment and suppression of facts, but extends also to cases of innocent misapprehension and mistake. (Story on Cont. Sec. 409; 1 Story's Eq. Sec. 140.) It is not necessary, in a case of this kind, where the mistake or misrepresentation only affects one out of many stipulations in a contract, to treat the whole agreement as void, but only that portion to which the mistake or misrepresentation properly applies. The rule in equity is, that if there has been any undue concealment or misrepresentation, the injured party will be placed in the same situation, and the other party will be compelled to do the same acts, as if all had been transacted with the utmost good faith. (1 Story's Eq. Sec. 439.) In this case, the evidence and instructions given on this point are intended merely to prevent a forfeiture claimed under a clause inserted under a mistake as to the facts, and a misrepresentation by the company's agents of those facts, most material to this part of the contract. The fact that this evidence was used to defeat the claim of forfeiture will not deprive the defendants of the other valid clauses in the argument not affected thereby, and compel them to rely upon a mere implied contract to pay the value of the work done. In this view of the case, the Court did not err in giving the instructions objected to, or in refusing the instructions asked by the defendants.

The contract in controversy, in describing the parties, reads as follows: "This agreement, entered into this 29th day of May, 1859, between Robert McGregor and James Newton, parties of the first part, and David Tyre, C. A. Simmons, and Thomas Cairns, Directors of the Table Mountain Ditch Company, parties of the second part, witnesseth," etc. The agreement refers to the ditch, tunnels, and flumes "of the Table Mountain Ditch Company," as the subject matter of the contract. It is signed by Tyre, Simmons, and Cairns, without any official designation, or statement of the capacity in which they sign, attached thereto; but the memorandum commences thus: "The Table Mountain Ditch Company hereby agrees," etc. The contract seems to have been filed and kept with other papers of the company, by its Secretary. The plaintiff objected to the admission of the contract in evidence, on the ground that it was not the contract of the company, but only of Tyre, Simmons, and Cairns, who signed it. The defendants aver, in their answer, that the contract was entered into "with the Table Mountain Ditch Company." The company, who were made parties to the suit by the answer, which was in the nature of a cross complaint, in their answer merely deny that "it ever entered into any such contract as is set forth in the cross bill," etc. The plaintiffs, in their replication to the answer, say that "it is not true, as charged in said answer, that the Table Mountain Ditch Company agreed with the defendants to give to them," etc. The answer and replication are clearly evasive, and do not specifically deny that the company were the real parties to the contract, and bound thereby. If it had been the intention to raise that distinct issue, it should have been done by more direct specific denials or averments. As was said in Rowe v. The Table Mountain Water Com- pany (10 Cal. 444), where a similar point was raised: "We cannot see why the corporation, if it chose to do so, could not as well bind itself in this form as in any other." The averment in the complaint is admitted by the failure to specifically deny it. There is sufficient in the contract itself to show that the Company were the parties really interested; so that it is not impossible, in fact, for the contract thus executed to be the contract of the corporation, in which case the objection fails. It seems, too, that the corporation acted under it, by making payments thereon, and putting the defendants in possession of the ditch; and they receive the benefit of the defendants' work thereon. These are strong circumstances to show the liability of the company. (Angell & Ames on Corp. Sec. 296.) There was therefore no error in this action of the Court. We have thus examined all the material points raised by the appellant, and find no just ground for disturbing the verdict and judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

DRAPER v. DOUGLASS et al.

Instruments conveying mining claims need not be under seal.

Plaintiff located a quartz lode and commenced work, digging up the rock towards the lode, at a distance of fifty or one hundred feet from it: held, that his declarations made at the time, as to his object in commencing work at that point, were admissible in evidence.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendants appealed.

H. H. Hartley, for Appellants.

P. L. Edwards, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a certain quartz lode in the County of El Dorado. It seems that the lode was located by one Kisardo and three others, in October, 1861; and afterwards Kisardo bought out the others and took bills of sale from them, and the plaintiff claimed title under a conveyance from Kisardo. On the trial, the latter was examined as a witness, and testified that these bills of sale to him had been lost, and explained when and where. The defendants objected that these bills of sale were not under seal, and to proof of their contents, on the ground that the originals were not duly accounted for; and it is insisted that the Court erred in overruling the objection. This Court has repeatedly decided that instruments conveying mining claims need not be under seal, and the evidence fully establishes the loss of the originals. There was, therefore, no error in this action of the Court.

One of the witnesses testified that he saw the plaintiff at a certain time at work some fifty or a hundred feet below the tunnel which had been commenced by the original locators, digging up the rock towards the tunnel; and the plaintiff told him at the time that the object of the work was to drain the ravine to run a tunnel into the quartz lode. The statement of the plaintiff was objected to, and the action of the Court in admitting it is assigned as error. It was clearly admissible as part of the res gestæ. The plaintiff was engaged in work at a distance from the lode, and he explained the object of the work; that it was to enable him to mine the lode, thus showing the connection between the work and the mine.

It is often the case, that miners commence their operations in sinking shafts and running tunnels at a distance from the lode sought to be worked, and their statements while thus engaged in the work, as to the object they are seeking to accomplish by it, are properly admissible as part of the res gestæ; otherwise it might be claimed that they were doing no work on the mine, because of the distance from the lode. Verbal and written declarations are often said to be admissible, as constituting a part of the res gestæ. As such, they are most properly admissible when they accomplish some act—the nature, object, or motives of which are the subject of inquiry. (1 Phillips' Ev., C. H. & E.'s Notes, 185, and Note 89.) This point is therefore not well taken.

Pelberg v. Gorham.

The next objection is, that the judgment is contrary to the evidence. We are satisfied from an examination of the testimony that the evidence sustains the judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PELBERG et al. v. GORHAM.

A COMPLAINT (where there is more than one plaintiff), in an action to recover damages for the alleged seizure of goods, which avers, that the defendant took and carried away "certain goods, chattels, and effects, of and belonging to the said plaintiffs," does not necessarily aver a joint ownership of the goods in the plaintiffs; but would be sustained by proof that the plaintiffs owned the property as partners, or as tenants in common, and that their respective interests therein were very unequal.

Defendant, Gorham, as Sheriff, levied on goods claimed by the plaintiffs. After suit had been brought, one of the attaching creditors procured a release from one of the plaintiffs, executed in the name of both, of all actions and causes of action, etc. : held, that if this release was obtained by fraud, it was void, and the Sheriff could derive no advantage from it, although he was not implicated in, and knew nothing of the fraud.

In an action against a Sheriff for damages for the wrongful seizure of goods, the true measure of damages is, the value of the goods at the time of the taking.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts will be found fully reported in 10 Cal. 120. The plaintiffs recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendant appealed. On the trial, plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show that plaintiff Glazier, who executed the release, had an interest in the goods only to the amount of thirteen hundred and fifty dollars; and that Pelburg had an agreement with him, before the seizure of the goods by the Sheriff, that on payment of said amount to him, Pelberg should become the sole owner of the goods. Plaintiffs claimed that the release was a fraud on plaintiff Pelberg.

Dwinelle & Hepburn, for Appellants.

One coöwner has a right to transfer or release his interest in a joint property, whether it damages his coöwner or not. An intention to injure or defraud has nothing to do with the power of disposition. The release by Glazier to Gorham may have been a fraud on Pelberg, but it nevertheless sundered the joint right by releasing or passing the interest of Glazier the plaintiff, to Gorham the defendant. If the right of property in the goods had been in Glazier alone, and he had released to Gorham, it is plain that he could not recover; for the cause of action would have been extinguished, or passed from the plaintiff to the defendant. The same thing, in legal effect, exists in this case. The cause of action is joint, and in two; and both join in the action which only both can support. After suit is brought, one of the two plaintiffs and joint owners releases and transfers his part of the joint ownership to the defendant. This sunderes the joint ownership, and makes the defendant a coöwner tenant, in common with the other plaintiffs; and in such a case, to permit a judgment to go against the defendant, for the value of the goods, is to permit a judgment to be recovered against him or a cause of action which he owns himself; and that is precisely what has happened here.

D. W. Perley, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages for an alleged seizure of goods claimed by Pelberg and Glazier, by the defendant, as Sheriff of the County of San Francisco. The defendant set up as a defense, that since the commencement of the suit, one of the plaintiffs, Glazier, had released the cause of action. This release, the plaintiff Pelberg contends, was made for the purpose of defrauding him. The case has been previously before this Court, and will be found reported in 10 Cal. 120.

On the trial, after the return of the remittitur, the defendant asked the Court to give the following instruction to the jury: "That the complaint in this action alleges that the plaintiffs were the joint owners of the goods in controversy, and that neither of the plaintiffs can deny said joint ownership, as far as this action is concerned." The Court refused to give it, and this is assigned as error. The complaint alleges that the defendant took and carried away "certain goods, chattels, and effects, of and belonging to the said plaintiffs." Here is no direct averment of "joint ownership," as stated in the instruction. This averment would be sustained by proof that the plaintiffs owned the property as partners, part owners, or as tenants in common, and that their respective interests therein were very unequal. The evidence shows that the plaintiffs were tenants in common of the property, having very unequal interests therein; and therefore the release of Glazier could not affect the interests of Pelberg therein. The refusal of the Court to give this instruction was not erroneous, in view of the facts of the case.

The next error assigned is the refusal of the Court to give the following instruction asked for by the defendant: "Even if the jury should believe that the plaintiff Glazier, when he made the release, intended to defraud the plaintiff Pelberg, the release is nevertheless valid and sufficient to defeat this suit, provided the defendant, Gorham, was not a party to the fraud; in that event, the remedy of Pelberg would be a suit against Glazier." If this release was obtained by fraud, it is void, and could not be used for any purpose. But even if such was not the case, the defendant, Gorham, is not the real party interested in defending this action, as he acted in levying upon the goods for and on behalf of the attaching creditors, one of whom it appears procured the release from Glazier. The instruction, therefore, should have stated that those acting for and on behalf of Gorham, must be free of the fraud, as well as Gorham, to make it good, on the ground claimed by the appellant. Gorham could not claim any benefit from a paper procured by the fraud of another acting on his behalf. That a release, obtained by fraud under these circumstances, cannot operate as a bar to the action, is well settled. (Eastman v. Wright, 6 Pick. 323; Loring v. Brackett, 3 Id. 403.)

The last objection is, that the Court erred in charging the jury "that if they found for the plaintiff they would take the value of the goods to be the amount stated in the inventory." The evidence shows that the amount stated in the inventory referred to was the cost price of the goods; and it appears that the controversy between the parties on this point was, whether the value was to be taken at the inventory prices, or at the discount thereon at which they were taken by plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were entitled to recover the full value of the goods, and they were not limited to the amount they paid for them. It is evident, therefore, that the defendant suffered no injury by this instruction, as it was, in effect, a proper determination of this controverted question. The amount at which the plaintiffs purchased the goods, was not the necessary criterion of their value, as is claimed by the defendant. The instruction seems to have been given in this form, to answer this point raised by the defendant at the trial, and it was not necessarily erroneous. The judgment is affirmed.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action upon two judgments rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant; one dated September 9th, 1852, for the payment of sixty dollars per month, for the support of the infant child of the parties, they having been husband and wife; the other, dated January 16th, 1855, for two hundred and nineteen dollars, with interest at ten per cent. per annum, and costs. This action was commenced July 11th, 1861. The defendant demurred to the complaint on various grounds; the Court overruled the demurrer, and the appellant contends that the Court erred in so doing, claiming that the complaint showed that the cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations. This is not, specifically, mentioned as one of the grounds of the demurrer; and it is doubtful whether it should not be thus distinctly specified to authorize the Court to consider it. (Mason v. Cronise, 20 Cal. 211; Smith v. Richmond, 19 Id. 476; Barringer v. Warden, 12 Id. 311; Sublette v. Finney, 9 Id. 425.) In all these cases, this ground of demurrer was specifically stated, and the question was not, therefore, directly decided. It is not necessary to determine it here, because the Statute of Limitations was specifically set up as a defense in the answer, and a demurrer thereto was sustained, and the question is therefore properly presented in that way.

The Statute of Limitations requires that an action on a judgment be brought within five years. The second judgment sued on was rendered more than five years before the commencement of the action; and the action upon that judgment was barred by the statute. But it seems that the amount claimed under that judgment was not included in the judgment rendered in this action; so that the defendant has suffered no injury by the sustaining of the demurrer to his answer, so far as relates to this second judgment.

The first judgment is payable in monthly installments; and in such case the time begins to run from the expiration of the period fixed for the payment of each installment as it becomes due for the part then payable; and for the other installments, only from the day of the expiration of the respective times of payment. (Angell on Limitations, 105.) It follows, that all the installments which fell due prior to five years before the commencement of the suit, were barred by the statute; but for all the installments which fell due within the five years, the right of action was not barred. The Court below did not err, therefore, in sustaining the demurrer to the answer, so far as it applied to the first judgment. It seems that the judgment rendered, included only the installments which fell due within the five years; and it is therefore correct, so far as relates to this point.

It is objected, that no proof was offered to show that the child named in the judgment had been, or was, in the custody of the plaintiff, or that she had expended the necessary money and care on her support and education. The complaint is duly verified, and these averments not being specifically denied by the answer, are to be deemed as admitted; and no proof to sustain them was therefore necessary. The right to bring an action upon a judgment or decree, is clear and undoubted; and the fact that the decree was for a divorce and for alimony, makes no difference in the rule. (Howard v. Howard, 15 Mass. 196.)

The judgment is affirmed.

FLANDREAU et al v. DOWNEY.

JUDGMENTS are evidence in actions concerning the same matters for or against the parties thereto, as well as their privies in estate.

A was the owner of certain houses and lots. B obtained a judgment against him; sold the property, and obtained a Sheriff's deed. After B's purchase, C commenced an action against A to foreclose a mechanic's lien on the property, which lien had been recorded before B's judgment had been docketed, but did not make B a party defendant. C obtained judgment of foreclosure, and had the property sold, and became the purchaser. A then purchased of B the title which he had acquired by his Sheriff's deed. In an action brought by C against A to recover possession: Held, that A was not estopped by C's judgment from asserting the new title he had acquired by the deed from B. An estoppel by deed or matter of record should be pleaded as such, where there is an opportunity to plead it. Where no opportunity to plead it occurs, it is conclusive as evidence.

If a record that he has not been pleaded is offered in evidence as an estoppel, and no objection is made at the time that the record has not been specially pleaded, the objection is deemed waived.

In a suit in equity to enjoin a Sheriff and the plaintiffs in an execution from selling real estate, on the ground that the sale would be a cloud upon plaintiff's title, a judgment denying the injunction and dismissing the complaint is not an estoppel, so as to prevent plaintiffs from showing the truth upon the subject, in a subsequent action to recover possession of the property.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventeenth Judicial District, Sierra County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Vanclief & Bowers, for Appellant.

Flandreau v. Downey.

The admission of this evidence against our objection, was error, because Downey was not a party to the action of Flandreau et al. v. White et al., in which case the judgment was against Flandreau et al. (1 Phillips' on Evidence, 326, 327; Cowen & Hill's Notes to same, Part 2d, 571, 574, 818, 819; Byers v. Atwater, 4 Day, 431-435; Hurst v. McNiel, 1 Wash. C. C. 79-83; 19 N. Y. 108, and cases there cited.)

In the two actions of Flandreau v. Wm. M. Downey, on which plaintiff's title in part depends, the parties were the same as in this case; and Wm. M. Downey, who was the defendant in those actions, is therefore conclusively bound by the judgments therein against him, and is estopped from disputing anything therein determined. (9 Cowen, 270; 2 Denio, 9; 15 Wend. 615; 4 Cow. 602; 2 Barb. 206; 1 Hilliard on Mortgages, 440; 1 Greenl. Ev., Sec. 522.) And as the record in the case of Flandreau et al. v. White et al. could be relevant for no other purpose than to impeach or invalidate what had been determined against Downey in those cases, it should have been excluded.

Taylor and Cowdery for Respondents.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover possession of two lots, with the buildings thereon, in the town of Downieville. The plaintiffs claim title under two judgments rendered in their favor against the defendants, dated October 2d, 1858, to enforce mechanics' liens on said property. These liens were duly recorded September 29th, 1857, and a credit had been given on the debt for one year from March 13th, 1857. The complaints, in the action to enforce these liens, were filed September 13th, 1858. The summonses issued thereon were dated the same day; but were not placed in the hands of the Sheriff until two days thereafter, having remained in the meantime in the hands of the Clerk. The plaintiffs purchased the property at the sales under their judgments, and their deeds bear date October 17th, 1859.

To rebut this evidence of title the defendant showed that Howard & Ladd recovered a judgment against him, which was docketed July 7th, 1858, under which the property was duly sold at Sheriff's sale, and purchased by Ladd; and that Ladd had conveyed the same to him since his purchase, by a deed bearing date October 8th, 1861. As the title obtained by the plaintiffs, under their judgments and sales thereon, relates back to the date of the recording of their mechanics' liens, and as that was prior to the docketing of the Howard & Ladd judgment, under which the defendant claims a new and subsequently-acquired title, it follows that under this evidence the plaintiffs had the prior and better title to the premises.

But the defendant introduced further proof. He offered in evidence the judgment roll, findings, and remittitur from the Supreme Court, in a case brought by the present plaintiffs against White, Howard & Ladd, to enjoin the latter from selling the premises under the judgment of Howard & Ladd v. Downey, on the ground that such sale and the title acquired under it would be a cloud upon their title acquired at the sale under their judgments. The judgment in that case was as follows: "It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the injunction heretofore granted and issued in said cause be and the same is hereby forever dissolved, and the complaint of said plaintiffs be and the same is hereby dismissed. It is further ordered that said defendants have and recover judgment of, from, and against said plaintiffs for their costs in this behalf expended." That case was appealed to this Court, when the judgment was affirmed on the ground that the actions to enforce the mechanics' liens were not commenced, within the meaning of the statute, until the fifteenth day of September, as the summonses were not issued until that day, and therefore they were not commenced within six months after the credit had expired, as required by the statute. (The case will be found reported in 18 Cal. 639.)

To the introduction of this evidence the plaintiffs objected: first, that that action was not between the parties to this suit; second, that the defendant Downey was estopped by the judgment in the action on the mechanics' liens from contesting their validity, and that they were conclusive against him; third, that they were irrelevant to the issue of this case. The Court overruled these objections and admitted the evidence, and this is the first error assigned.

The first objection is that the record and judgment in that action were inadmissible, because Downey was not a party in that action. In this case, however, the defendant Downey claims title under and derived from the defendants in that action, and he is therefore a privy in estate. As such the record in that case is clearly evidence for and against him. (2 Phil. Ev., C. H. & E.'s Notes, 14, 15, Note 260; 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 518.) This objection, therefore, is not well taken.

The second objection is that Downey, the defendant, is estopped by the judgments in the mechanics' lien suits from contesting their validity. If Downey claimed by no other title than that held by him at the date of these judgments, he would be concluded by them. But he claims by a new and subsequently-acquired title, derived from Ladd; and as the holder of that title he thereby acquired the same rights, as against those judgments, that his vendor had, and can claim the full benefit of that title, as against these plaintiffs, the same as his vendors could. As they were not concluded or estopped by those judgments, not having been parties in the actions in which they were rendered, so he, claiming under them by privity of estate, is not concluded or estopped by them. The objection, therefore, is untenable.

The third objection is that this evidence was irrelevant to the issues in this case. The defendant did not plead his judgment in his answer as an estoppel, or as showing that the same matter involved in the controversy in this case was adjudicated and determined in that. Whether it was necessary to thus set up this judgment as an estoppel, or as res judicata, in order to make it an issue in the case, or whether it was a matter which could properly be given in evidence, without being thus specially pleaded, is not very clearly settled. In Hostler v. Hays (3 Cal. 302) it was held, that only a technical estoppel, by deed or matter of record, was required to be specially pleaded, and that an estoppel in pais need not be. The estoppel claimed in that case was not by deed or matter of record; and it was not necessary, nor does the Court hold, that in all cases where an estoppel is claimed by deed or matter of record it must be specially pleaded. This question is examined at some length in 2 Smith's Leading Cases, 519-522, and the result would seem to be that a record or deed is conclusive as a plea where there is an opportunity of pleading it, but where there is no such opportunity then it is conclusive as evidence. (Id. 521.) The averments of the complaint in this action, as is but too common in actions of this kind, are of the most general character. The answer, after denying the allegations of the complaint, sets forth the judgment of Howard & Ladd against him, the sale of the property under it to Ladd, and the sale by the latter to him; but contains no averment relating to the suit of the plaintiffs against White and others, or the judgment rendered in it. No objection was made to the introduction of this evidence, that the record had not been specially pleaded, and it is therefore to be deemed as waived. If that specific objection had been made at the time, the Court could have allowed the defendant to amend his answer by making the proper averments to authorize the admission of the proof and remove the ground of the objection.

But it is urged that it is irrelevant on another ground; that is, that this record shows no such adjudication of the matters in issue in this action as will estop or conclude the plaintiffs from showing the truth upon the subject. The case of Fulton v. Hanlow (20 Cal. 450) is very similar, in almost every point to the present. In that case the record claimed to be res judicata, was a suit in equity to enjoin proceedings under a Sheriff's sale, on the ground that they would make a cloud upon the plaintiff's title; and the judgment was that the complaint be dismissed, and that the purchaser at the Sheriff's sale was entitled to a conveyance from the Sheriff, in which latter respect it went further than the judgment offered in this case. It was held that the purchaser's title was not so adjudicated in the suit in equity, or established by the decree, as to become res judicata, but was still open to be controverted in a subsequent action for the possession between the parties or their privies. This is decisive of the present action, for the judgment of the Court below seems to have been founded entirely upon this prior adjudication, the very findings in which were copied, and made part of the findings in the present action, on the ground of the conclusive effect thereof.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

SARGENT et al. v. STURM.

If the original possession of property is acquired by a tort, no demand previous to the institution of a suit is necessary.

If the tortfeasor has parted with the possession of the goods tortiously obtained, in payment of pre-existing debt; or, if they have been sold on an execution against him, and bid in by a creditor, no demand of the purchaser is necessary before the institution of a suit: nor can the purchaser, who has obtained them in such manner, hold them against the original vendor.

If a creditor of the fraudulent vendee levy on and sell the goods fraudulently obtained, on an execution against the fraudulent vendee, and become the purchaser at execution sale, he acquires no title: but a bona fide purchaser from the fraudulent vendee paying a valuable consideration without notice of the fraud, in the usual course of trade, would hold the goods against the vendor.

Where the purchaser has obtained the goods from the fraudulent vendee, in payment of a pre-existing debt, or as an execution creditor, it is not necessary, on the trial, to prove that he participated in the fraud of the fraudulent vendee.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John B. Hall, for Appellant.

P. L. Edwards, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession, or the value, if possession could not be had, of a quantity of lumber, valued at $1,100. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are the lawful owners and entitled to the possession of the lumber; that the lumber is in the possession of and unlawfully detained by the defendant; and that he refuses to deliver the same to the plaintiffs, though such delivery has been duly demanded. It appears that the plaintiffs sold and delivered the lumber in question to one Smith; but they contend that Smith obtained the same by fraud and fraudulent representations; and that, therefore, he never acquired any valid title thereto. The defendant claims the property, as purchaser, under a sale on an execution issued on a judgment in his favor against Smith. The plaintiffs recovered judgment in the Court below, from which the defendant appeals.

The first point raised by the appellant is that, as the complaint does not allege any tortious or unlawful taking of the property by the defendant, the plaintiffs were bound to aver and prove a special demand and refusal before commencing the action; and a motion for nonsuit was made on that ground and overruled. The case of Paige v. O'Neal (12 Cal. 483) is very similar in many of its features to the present one. In that case the Court say: "It was not essential to aver a demand of the defendant of the wheat in controversy in the complaint, or to prove a demand on the trial. If the property in fact belonged to the plaintiff — and it is upon this theory the suit is brought, and to this effect the evidence tended when the plaintiff rested — the seizure by the defendant was tortious; and it is a general rule that where the possession of property is originally acquired by a tort, no demand previous to the institution of suit for its recovery is necessary. It is only when the original possession is lawful, and the action relies upon the unlawful detention, that a demand is required." No objection was made by demurrer, that a special demand was not averred in the complaint; but the defendant took issue upon all the averments. The jury found by their verdict, that the property belonged to the plaintiff, and that it was in the defendant's possession. The defendant's claim was adverse to that of the plaintiff, and his possession was therefore unlawful from the beginning. He contested the plaintiff's claim or right to the property all through the action. If he had admitted in his answer the plaintiff's right to the property, and that he had always been ready to deliver up the property upon demand, but no demand had been made, it might have been a question, whether he could have been compelled to pay the costs of the action. But after contesting the title of the plaintiff, through a litigated suit in which he claimed the title, he cannot escape the effects of an adverse verdict, by an objection of this kind.

At the trial, the defendant offered in evidence the execution issued on the judgment of Sturm v. Smith, and other proof in connection therewith, that the property was duly sold by the Sheriff, under that execution, to the defendant; but the Court, on objection, excluded the evidence, and this is assigned for error. The answer of the defendant is simply a denial of the allegations of the complaint, and does not aver any title or right of possession in the defendant; in fact, it denies that the property was in his possession. Under these circumstances, it is doubtful whether the evidence was admissible under the pleadings. But the defendant has not been injured by the exclusion of the evidence. Even if it had been admitted, together with the judgment on which the execution issued — which, however was not offered — it could not have availed the defendant anything. The plaintiffs' right of action was founded upon the want of any title in Smith to the property on the ground of fraud; and this evidence did not in any way tend to disprove the facts on which the plaintiffs' claim rested. The plaintiffs' evidence established his title, as found by the verdict of the jury. The evidence offered and rejected would not have shown that the defendant stood in any better position than Smith, or that the plaintiffs' title was not as effectual against the defendant as against Smith. The defendant, by his alleged purchase at the sale on execution, acquired no better title to the property than Smith had; and the same evidence which established the fact that Smith had no title, equally established the same fact as against the defendant; and the force and effect of that evidence could not have been avoided or defeated in any way by the excluded testimony. He who receives goods from a fraudulent purchaser in payment or as security for a preëxisting debt against such fraudulent purchaser, cannot hold them against the vendor. (Root v. French, 13 Wend. 570; Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. 637.)

And the same principle applies to a purchase by a creditor at an execution sale of the property on an execution against the fraudulent vendee. (Durell v. Haley, 1 Paige, 492; Buffington v. Gerish, 15 Mass. 156.) But a bona fide purchaser from the fraudulent vendee, paying a valuable consideration without notice of the fraud, obtaining them in the usual course of trade, would hold the goods against the vendor. (Hilliard on Sales, 332, Sec. 7.) The defendant in this case, holds a claim which accrued before the sale; and as he paid nothing on his purchase at the execution sale, he cannot claim the right of a bona fide purchaser in such cases. If the amount of his bid on the property was applied as a credit on the execution and judgment, he can have the same canceled at any time by applying to the Court and showing that he obtained no title to the property by his purchase. (Prac. Act, Sec. 237; Piper v. Elwood, 4 Denio, 165; Adams v. Smith, 5 Cowen, 280; Nelson v. Rockwell, 14 Ill. 375.) By that means, he will be placed in the same position he was in before his purchase, and will have lost nothing thereby. It was not necessary for the plaintiffs to prove that the defendant participated in the fraud of Smith. The evidence introduced by the plaintiffs, and which was objected to by the defendant, was admissible as tending to prove the fraud of Smith in the purchase of the property from the plaintiffs.

The judgment is affirmed.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF HIDDEN.

THE allowance of a claim against an estate by an executor or administrator, and the Probate Judge, has the force and effect of a judgment, to be paid in due course of administration; but it is doubtful whether this judgment would bind another creditor of the estate who is not a party to it.

When the account of a claimant is contested, and he applies for leave to amend, by filing a more full and particular account, the amendment should be allowed.

APPEAL from the Probate Court, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

C. T. Ryland, for Appellant.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

The appellant in this case was a creditor of the deceased, and duly filed his claim against the estate, which was allowed by the administratrix and the Probate Judge, on the fifth day of January, 1861. Afterward, on the thirtieth day of October, 1861, while the final account of the administratrix and settlement thereof was pending in the Probate Court, one of the creditors of the estate filed objections to the final account; and among other things objected to the allowance of the appellant's claim, on the ground that a portion thereof was barred by the Statute of Limitations. No fraud, mistake, misrepresentation, or deceit on the part of appellant, or of the administratrix, are charged. On the hearing of the matter, the Probate Judge refused to permit the plaintiff to file a more full and particular statement of his account, or to give him an opportunity to prove that his claim was not barred by the statute, but rejected a large portion of his claim on that ground alone.

In construing the statute relating to the estates of deceased persons, this Court has held, that a claim duly allowed by the administrator and Probate Judge, fixes the obligation upon the estate as a judgment, and has the same force and effect as a judgment. (Dick's Estate v. Gherke, 6 Cal. 669; Pico v. De la Guerra, 18 Id. 430.) In Beckett v. Selover (7 Id. 228), while an allowed claim was held to have the force of a judgment, it was still considered to be of no force, except as between parties and privies, and therefore it was held not to bind the heir in a proceeding for the sale of real estate for the payment of debts. So, too, it is doubtful whether it would bind a creditor of the estate who is not a party to it. Upon the question of the Statute of Limitations, the one hundred and thirty-fifth section of the Probate Act is imperative, as it provides that "no claim shall be allowed by the executor or administrator, or by the Probate Judge, which is barred by the Statute of Limitations."

But the Court erred in not permitting the appellant to file a more full and particular account of his claim, and in refusing to give him an opportunity to prove that his claim was not barred by the statute.

The order of the Court rejecting the claim is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.

LEWIS v. TYLER.

WHERE the law compels a person, such as an innkeeper or common carrier, to take the care and custody of goods, he has a lien on the property for his reasonable and just charges therefor; but one who merely provides food, and takes the care of an animal, as an agistor, or a livery stable keeper, has no lien on the property, unless there is a special agreement to that effect.

APPEAL for the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Tehama County.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and the defendant appealed.

W. S. Long, for Appellant.

W. H. Rhodes, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of certain cattle. The defendant claimed the right to their possession on the following grounds: First, that he seized them while trespassing upon his lands and has a right to hold them until paid the damages caused by the trespass; second, that the plaintiff contracted with the defendant to pasture his cattle for him, and that he has a lien on them therefore, and is entitled to the possession until the lien is paid. No point is made upon the first defense, and it is therefore unnecessary to notice it.

The general principle is, that where the law compels a person, such as an innkeeper, or common carrier, to take the care and custody of goods, he shall have a lien on the property for his reasonable and just charges therefore; and the same rule applies to a person who, by his labor and skill, has imparted an additional value to the goods. (Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 491.) But one who merely provides food and takes the care of an animal, as an agistor or livery stable keeper, has no lien on the property, unless there be a special agreement to that effect. (Grinnell v. Cook, 3 Hill, 491, 492, and cases cited.) An agistor of cattle is under no legal obligation to take the charge of or keep any cattle that may be brought to him for that purpose. He may receive or refuse them, without violating any duty or obligation imposed on him by the law; and he is at perfect liberty, therefore, when he receives stock to keep, to impose such terms and conditions as he may deem proper. And he may require an agreement that he shall have a lien upon the animals for his reasonable charges, or for the agreed price, if he shall deem it necessary for his security. That class of bailees, however, who are required by law to take the charge and custody of, and to keep animals for others, have no right to impose conditions upon those who employ them; and the law, therefore, very properly gives them a lien upon the property for their security. That reason does not exist in the case of agistors of cattle, and therefore they have no lien, except where there is a special agreement. (Edwards on Bail, 279, 280.) It follows, that the claim set up by the defendant is no defense to the action.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

DUDLEY v. THOMAS.

When matters in dispute are submitted to arbitration, with power for the arbitrators to appoint an umpire, the arbitrators have a right to select the umpire, either before or after the investigation of the matter has commenced, even though the articles of submission contain a clause providing for such selection in the event of a disagreement between the arbitrators.

Arbitrators have the power to award costs, though no mention be made of costs in the articles of submission.

After an award has been once made and delivered, the arbitrators cannot afterwards alter the same, even to correct mistakes, without the consent of the parties; but the making of a new and supplementary paper, and attaching the same to the award, after it has been delivered, does not vitiate the original award, and may be treated as surplusage.

If the arbitrators award that one of the parties shall pay to the other a sum certain, and also that the parties shall execute to each other mutual releases of all actions, etc., the tender of a release as provided by the award is not a condition precedent to the right to bring an action to recover the money.

The award of money is absolute and unconditional; but the award of releases is different, for they are concurrent acts, and neither party can compel the other to execute a release without the tender of a release by himself.

Dudley S. Thomas.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

L. Archer, for Appellant.

The submission, in this case, was general as to all matters in difference between the parties to the date of the first submission, to wit: November 6th, 1861, and was special as to certain other specified matters. The award does not show that the special matters named in the submission were passed upon as is required, to make the award good. (See Muldrow v. Morris, 12 Cal. 339.) This defect, it is submitted to the Court, cannot be supplied by parol evidence, but renders the entire award null and void.

The agreement to submit provides for the selection of an umpire, in the event of a disagreement between the two arbitrators. The fact is, that the umpire was selected before the arbitrators commenced their session. We contend that this was a material and fatal variance from the agreement. This point has not, so far as we know, been decided by this Court, and we think it is worthy of full consideration. A person might well be willing to submit his rights to two named persons, and consent to have a third called in, in case of disagreement, and yet not be willing to submit to the three in the first instance for many reasons, which will occur to the minds of the Judges.

Thomas Bodley, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NOXTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to enforce an award. The case was tried by the Court, who found for the plaintiff, and a judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the defendant appeals. It is objected that the umpire was selected by the arbitrators before they commenced to hear the case, when the articles of submission provided for such selection in the event of a disagreement between the arbitrators. This objection is not tenable. The arbitrators in such case had the right to appoint the umpire either before or after the investigation of the matter had commenced. Indeed, it is the better course that the umpire be first selected, so that he can hear the evidence direct from the witnesses. (Caldwell on Arbitration, 107; Roe v. Doe, 2 Dum. & East. 644; Harding v. Watts, 15 East. 556; McKinstry v. Solomons, 2 J. R. 57; Van Cortland v. Underhill, 17 Id. 405.)

It seems that on the thirty-first day of October, 1860, the parties agreed to submit all matters in controversy between them to arbitration — the award to be made on or before November 6th. No award was made under this submission; and on the second day of April, 1861, they agreed that the same matters should be resubmitted to the same arbitrators, and that the arbitrators should also take into consideration and render their award upon any damage that the defendant may have been entitled to by reason of any striking given to him by said plaintiff, and the detaining by him from said defendant of certain trucks and chains. The award was rendered May 4th, 1861, that Thomas should pay to Dudley eight hundred and fifty dollars, on or before May 14th, 1861, in full payment, discharge, and satisfaction of all moneys, debts, and demands due from him to Dudley; and that the said parties should, within ten days next ensuing the date of the award, seal and execute to each other mutual and general releases of all actions, causes of actions, suits, controversies, claims, and demands for or by reason of any matter or thing from the beginning of the world down to the date of the said submission. It is objected that the award covers matters not submitted to the arbitrators; but this is not sustained by the record. The award evidently includes no matter not submitted; nor do we think the award respecting the release goes beyond the matters submitted. It includes all matters up to the date of the submission but none since; and it is thus authorized by the submission.

It appears that after the award had been made, the arbitrators, on the sixth day of May, 1861, attached the following certificate, signed by them, to a bill of costs in the case amounting to one hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty cents, viz.: "We, the undersigned, certify the foregoing to be the correct bill of costs in the above matter of difference, and award the said Stillman Thomas to pay the same as costs of said suit." Neither in the agreement of submission, nor in the award made on the fourth day of May, was there any stipulation or reference to the subject of costs. The arbitrators have power to award costs, though no mention be made of costs in the submission, as it is a matter within the terms of a general reference. (Cald. on Arb. 198.) And it has been held that in the absence of any specific directions about costs, they must follow the award. (McIntosh v. Blyth, 1 Br. & Bing. 269.) But it is contended that the execution of this certificate by the arbitrators to the bill of costs, was an alteration or amendment of the award as published, and therefore vitiates the award. The rule seems to be well settled, that after an award has been once made and delivered the arbitrators cannot afterwards alter the same, even to correct mistakes. If such alteration is attempted it will be considered as mere surplusage, and it will not vitiate the award, which will stand good in its original terms. (Cald. on Arb. 177; Henfree v. Bromley, 6 East. 309; Irvine v. Elmore, 8 Id. 53; Brooke v. Mitchell, 6 M. & W. 473.)

In the case of Porter v. Scott, (7 Cal. 312) it was held, that any alteration of the award by the arbitrators after it has been made and published, without the consent of the parties, would vitiate it; but that was an alteration of the original award, and not, as in this case, the making of a new, separate, and supplementary paper. We are satisfied that the execution of this subsequent instrument did not vitiate the original award, which remained unaltered by the arbitrators. Whether it should be treated as mere surplusage, or as an effective instrument, is not a question before us; for the judgment only included the amount of the original award, and the plaintiff does not complain because the amount of costs in this supplementary paper was not included in it.

It appears that the plaintiff executed a receipt, which included the two sums of eight hundred and fifty dollars and one hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty cents, with a release of all actions, etc., as required by the award, which he offered to deliver upon the payment of said sums and the execution of a similar release by the defendant. It is contended that it was necessary for the plaintiff, in order to maintain the action, to prove a performance of, or an offer to perform, the award on his part; and that this was not good as an offer of a release, because he required the payment of both sums, when, as defendant claims, he was not entitled to the sum of one hundred and eighteen dollars and twenty cents.

The first inquiry is, whether it was necessary for the plaintiff to aver and prove an offer of a release to enable him to maintain the action. The arbitrators first award that the defendant shall pay to the plaintiff eight hundred and fifty dollars, on or before the fourteenth day of May, 1861; and they further award, that both parties shall, within ten days after the date of the award, execute to each other mutual releases. The award is dated May 4th, so that the time for the execution of the releases was the same day as that fixed for the payment of the money.

In a case very similar to the present, where the award required the defendants to pay the plaintiffs a certain sum without fixing any time for the payment, and there was a further award that the plaintiffs should, on demand, assign certain claims to the plaintiff, it was held, that no demand of the money before suit brought was necessary, as by the award the defendants were directed to pay a certain sum without any condition or qualification whatever. And it was further held, that it was not necessary that the plaintiffs should aver a tender or offer of performance on their part. (Nichols v. Rensselaer County Mut. Ins. Co., 22 Wend. 125; see, also, Crosby v. Watkins, 12 Cal. 85.)

It would seem, from the principles laid down in the case from Wendell, that an offer to perform was not necessary, to enable the plaintiff to maintain an action in a case like this. The award of the payment of the money, in the present case, was absolute, unqualified, and unconditional. The award of mutual releases was, however, different; for they were clearly concurrent acts, and neither party could compel the other to execute a release without showing either an offer of a release by him, or a readiness and willingness on his part to execute it. The action is merely to recover the money awarded; and the tender of a release, as provided by the award, was not a condition precedent to the right to recover the money. The right to recover the money is not defeated by the mere fact that the plaintiff demanded more than he was entitled to, because his right of action was good without any demand at all; and even where a demand is necessary, the mere fact that a greater sum is demanded than the party is entitled to, will not defeat the action, unless the defendant shows that, upon such demand, he offered to pay the sum the plaintiff was really entitled to, and that it was refused. This objection of the plaintiff is not, therefore, well taken.

The judgment is affirmed.

AMYX v. TABER.

THE Common Council of the City of Stockton, under the charter of 1862, have power to make ordinances to prevent cattle and hogs from running at large over the streets and public places within the corporate limits of the City.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

M. G. Cobb, for Appellant.

Terry & Baine, for Respondent.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of certain cattle and hogs. The defendant in his answer, set up as a defense the charter of the City of Stockton, and the by-laws of the city made under that charter relating to animals running at large in the city; that he was Chief of the Police of said city, and as such took up the animals in question under the authority conferred on him by the laws of the State and the ordinances of the city, and held them as such at the commencement of the action. The plaintiff demurred to the answer; the Court sustained the demurrer and rendered final judgment for the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

Amyx v. Taber.

Sec. 1 of the Act of 1862, reincorporating the City of Stockton (Stat. 1862, 314), provides that the City of Stockton shall be a body corporate, and that said body corporate "may make by-laws not repugnant to the Constitution and laws of this State." Sec. 6 of Art. 3 provides that "the Common Council shall have power within the city, to pass all by-laws, ordinances, and resolutions not repugnant to the Constitution of this State, necessary to be passed for the municipal government and management of the affairs of the City of Stockton, and for the execution of the powers vested in the said body corporate, or in any office thereof;" and Sec. 7 provides that "the Common Council shall have power within the city, by ordinance * * * to prevent, remove, and abate nuisances, and at the expense of the parties causing or committing the same, to prevent and regulate the running at large of all hogs, pigs, goats, sheep, horses, mules, jackasses, or horned cattle * * * ; to impose and appropriate fines, forfeitures, and penalties, for the breach of any ordinance." Sec. 1 of Art. 5 provides for a Police Court, and that "said Police Court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of all violations of any city ordinance, and may hold to bail, etc." Under these statutory provisions, the Common Council of the City of Stockton passed an ordinance making it unlawful for persons owning such animals to permit them to run at large within the corporate limits of the city, and authorized the Chief of Police, whenever he should find such animals within said limits, to cause them to be taken in charge and placed in the city pound, and after giving ten days' public notice in some newspaper published in the city, to expose them for sale at auction to the highest bidder, and apply the proceeds, first to the payment of a fine of five dollars for each animal, and the costs of sale and keeping, and the residue, if any, to be deposited with the City Treasurer for the benefit of the owner.

The answer avers that the animals in controversy were running at large within the corporate limits of the City of Stockton; and, as Chief of Police, acting under said laws and ordinances, he took them in charge, placed them in the city pound, and caused a notice thereof to be published in a newspaper in said city; and that they were thus lawfully in his possession, and lawfully detained by him at the time the suit was commenced. It seems to have been objected that, as the city charter gives the Police Court "exclusive jurisdiction of all violations of a city ordinance," the Common Council had no authority to confer upon the Chief of Police the powers vested in him by this ordinance. This objection is not tenable. The proper construction of this statute is that the Police Court is to have exclusive jurisdiction of all actions prosecuted for the violation of a city ordinance. The Police Court is a judicial tribunal, and cannot perform the duties appropriate to a Chief of Police, in the removal of nuisances, or the taking up of estrays, or animals found trespassing upon the public grounds and streets.

The power and authority of the Common Council of Stockton, under their charter, to make a proper ordinance to prevent animals of the kind named from roaming at large over the city, and its streets and public places, is clear and undoubted. Such laws and ordinances are adopted in all well-governed cities and towns, and are clearly demanded by the public interests. Individuals have no right to use the streets and public grounds of a city as a place in which to keep such animals; and ordinances prohibiting them from so doing, and providing the proper means to prevent it, do not violate any constitutional or vested right or privilege. Ordinances of such a character have been fully sustained by the Courts. (Helber v. Noe, 3 Ire. 493; Whitfield v. Longest, 6 Id. 268; Commonwealth v. Dow, 10 Met. 382; Commonwealth v. Chase, 6 Cush. 248.) We do not deem it necessary to enter into a detailed examination of the provisions of the ordinance in question in this case, as the respondent has not seen fit to file any brief pointing out the specific objections to it. The answer contained sufficient facts to show a good defense to the action, and that the defendant lawfully possessed and detained the property.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

Hamm v. Arnold.

HAMM v. ARNOLD.

ARNOLD commenced a suit in equity against Hamm, Gallup & Gwin, averring that he was in possession of a tract of land, and Gallup had executed a deed of the land to Gwin in 1856, in trust for Hamm, and that neither Gallup nor Gwin had any title to the land; and asking that this adverse claim be adjudged null and void. Hamm answered, denying that he claimed any interest in the land under the deed. On the trial the complaint was dismissed as to Hamm, and judgment rendered against the other defendants. Arnold, in 1857, purchased the land at a sale on an execution issued on a judgment against Packard Hamm, grantor. Hamm afterwards brought an action against Arnold to recover possession of the land: held, that Arnold was not estopped by the judgment in the equity suit dismissing his complaint as to Hamm, from proving title under his Sheriff's deed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Thirteenth Judicial District, Stanislaus County.

Albert Packard was seized in fee of the demanded premises on the twelfth day of March, 1856, and continued so seized till he conveyed it to plaintiff Hamm, on the third day of January, 1857. It was under this deed from Packard that Hamm claimed title in the present action. The suit brought by Arnold against Hamm, Gallup, and Gwin was commenced December 30th, 1858, and judgment was rendered in it February 17th, 1860. The present action was commenced October 7th, 1861. The other facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

J. J. Stoddard, for Appellant.

A. Shell, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a tract of land in Stanislaus County. The case was sent to a referee for trial. After the plaintiff had proved his claim of title, he gave in evidence a record in another action, which was a suit in equity brought by the defendant, Arnold, against the present plaintiff, Hamm, and one Gwin. The defendant then offered evidence to prove that on the tenth day of February, 1857, he purchased the premises in question at a Sheriff's sale under an execution issued upon a judgment against one Packard, the plaintiff's grantor, which was a subsisting lien upon the premises at the date of the deed from Packard to the plaintiff, and at the time of the purchase by the defendant. The plaintiff objected to this evidence as irrelevant, on the ground, that the defendant was estopped by the decree in the equity suit. The referee sustained the objection, and the defendant's evidence of title was excluded, which is now assigned as error.

The complaint in the suit in equity, brought by Arnold against Hamm and Gwin, under which the estoppel is claimed, alleged that he (Arnold) was the owner, and was and had for a long time been in the peaceable possession of the premises in controversy; and that the "defendants claim an estate or interest in said lands adverse to the right and title of the plaintiff thereto; and by their own act, or by their procurement, a deed of said land bearing date December 13th, 1856, executed in due form of law to the said defendant Gwin, by S. M. Gallup, has been, or was, on the twentieth day of December, 1856, duly filed for record in the office of the County Recorder of said County of San Joaquin, after having been acknowledged in due form before a Notary Public." It then avers that at the date of the deed, Gallup had no interest in the land; and Gwin has no interest therein, and the deed was made to cast a cloud upon the plaintiff's title; that Hamm has the beneficial interest in this claim of Gwin's and Gallup and Gwin held and hold the same in trust for Hamm. There are several other averments not necessary to mention. The complaint prays that said adverse claim may be adjudged null and void; and that Gwin may be decreed to convey the land to the plaintiff; and that in the meantime he may be restrained from conveying or incumbering it.

The answer of Hamm in that suit denies that the deed to Gwin was procured by him, or that he ever had or has any beneficial interest or title in the claim of title under the deed to Gwin, or that the latter holds any interest therein in trust for him; and prays that the complaint be dismissed as to him. The decree in that suit adjudged the deed to Gwin to be void; and the latter was ordered to execute and deliver a conveyance of his claim of title to the premises derived under the deed, to the plaintiff; and that "the complaint be dismissed as against the defendant, Hamm."

It is evident that this title of the present defendant, Arnold, was not adjudicated; or if involved in the controversy in that suit, that the adjudication was not adverse to his title, but on the contrary was sustained by the decree. The mere dismissal of the complaint, as against Hamm, was not an adjudication against the title of Arnold, or in favor of any title claimed by Hamm. On the contrary, Hamm set up no title in that action, but denied all the material allegations of the complaint against him. Taking the averments of his answer to be true, then he was improperly made a party to this suit; and the presumption is, that the Court found them to be true, and granted his prayer by dismissing the suit as to him. But the answer of Gwin raised issues to be tried, and showed that he was the real party defendant; and as to him, the issues, involving Arnold's title and right of possession, were found in favor of Arnold, and the decree was rendered accordingly. There is no valid ground for the claim that the judgment in this suit in equity estopped Arnold from proving his title in the present action. A question very similar in principle was so decided in the cases of Fulton v. Hanlow (20 Cal. 450) and Flandreau v. Downey (23 Cal. 354.) (See, also, McDonald v. The Bear River and Auburn Water & M. Co., 15 Id. 145; Kidd v. Laird, Id. 162.) The referee therefore erred in excluding the defendant's evidence.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

WATSON v. WHITNEY.

One who, with armed men, enters upon land inclosed with a fence and in the possession of another, and commences the erection of a house, and refuses to deliver up peaceable possession on demand, but makes a show of force to retain it, is guilty of forcible entry and detainer.

In an action of forcible entry and detainer, all matters of legal excuse, justification, or avoidance, can be given in evidence by the defendant under a general denial of the allegations of the complaint.

Watson v. Whitney.

The granting or refusing of a change of venue by reason of the bias and prejudice of the citizens of the county, is discretionary with the Court, subject to revision only in cases of abuse.

Where the complaint in an action of forcible entry and detainer, prays for treble damages, the Court has the power to treble the damages, although the complaint does not specially refer to the statute authorizing it.

In impanneling a jury each party has a right to put questions to a juror to show not only that there exist proper grounds for a challenge for cause, but to elicit facts to enable him to decide whether he will make a peremptory challenge.

APPEAL from the County Court of Napa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Moore and Laine, for Appellant.

Wallace & Rayle and Edgerton, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON J. concurring.

This is an action for forcible entry and detainer. The facts are substantially as follows: The tract of land in controversy was inclosed at the time of the forcible entry, which took place December 31st, 1862, and had been in the quiet and peaceable possession of the plaintiff or his tenants ever since 1856. On that day, Watson, the plaintiff, and several persons with him, went to the place where the defendant, with six or seven others, was engaged in constructing a small house. The plaintiff asked whose house is that, to which the defendant replied that it was his; and the plaintiff then demanded peaceable possession, to which the defendant answered that he could not have it. Whitney and those with him were armed; and the plaintiff then said, "I see you are all armed, and that is enough." One of the persons who went there with the plaintiff struck the house with an ax; and one of the defendant's party presented a pistol at him, and told him that if he struck again he would shoot him. He did not strike again, but replied that he would throw the ax at him if he did not drop the pistol. These facts, which are not controverted, clearly show a forcible entry and detainer within the provisions of the statute, and within the rules laid down by this Court on that subject. There was an unsual assemblage of armed men with the defendant, and the plaintiff had just grounds to apprehend violence if he had attempted to retain possession, or remove the defendant from his land. Actual threats were also used of violence to the plaintiff or those who accompanied him. The jury that tried the case returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, on which judgment was rendered for restitution of the premises with treble damages, from which the defendant appeals.

The defendant filed an answer while the case was pending before the Justice of the Peace, in which, after denying generally the allegations of the complaint, he averred that he entered peaceably, on the day named, upon a certain quarter section of land described by the public surveys, which includes about ten acres of the tract described in the plaintiff's complaint; that he had a right to enter thereon under the preëmption laws of the United States; that it was public land; had been surveyed by the United States Surveyors as such, and was subject to the preëmption laws. The Justice, on motion, struck out all of this answer, except that part denying the allegations of the complaint. When the case came up in the County Court on appeal, the defendant moved the Court to reverse this order of the Justice, and to send the case back to the Justice with an order requiring him to certify it to the District Court for trial, which motion was denied by the Court, and this is assigned for error. It is unnecessary to determine, in this case, whether title can be put in issue in actions of this kind, and thus require the case to be sent to the District Court for trial. The affirmative allegations in the answer show no title in the defendant, but merely an attempt on his part to comply with the preëmption laws of the United States, as a means of procuring a title at some future time. There was, therefore, no error in refusing to send the case to the District Court for trial. Nor was there any error in refusing to reverse the order of the Justice. If the defendant desired to amend his answer by adding that part stricken out by the Justice, he should have made a motion to that effect in the County Court. He has not been prejudiced in any way by this action of the Justice, as the twentieth section of the Forcible Entry Act allows all matters of excuse, justification, or avoidance, to be given in evidence under a general denial of allegations of the complaint. This assignment of error is therefore overruled.

The defendant filed an affidavit, and moved the County Court thereon to change the place of trial to some other county, which was denied, and this is assigned for error. The affidavit sets forth that he believes he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in the County of Napa, by reason of the bias and prejudice of the citizens of that county against the defendant, and the class of persons to which he belongs; that there has been great excitement in the county, and much feeling and prejudice existed, growing out of the rejection of the grant of the "Suscol Rancho," and that this suit has grown out of these troubles, and numerous suits of a similar character had been commenced, and the questions involved therein have been largely and generally discussed by the citizens of the county; that there is a large league of landholders of the Suscol Rancho who are bitterly opposed to the defendant, who have contributed money to prosecute the defendant and others. The granting of a change of venue on this ground is discretionary with the Courts, subject to revision only in cases of abuse. (Sloan v. Smith, 3 Cal. 410; People v. Fisher, 6 Id. 155.) The fact that no difficulty occurred in selecting a jury, which was accepted by the defendant to try the case, shows that there was no just foundation for the application, and that there was no abuse of this discretion vested in the Court. This objection is therefore untenable.

It is also contended that the Court erred in trebling the damages found by the jury, because the complaint does not specially refer to the statute, in the prayer for damages. The plaintiff prays, in his complaint, for treble damages; though it does not refer to the statute which allows the damages to be trebled. Parties are not held to any great strictness in their pleadings in Justices' Courts, and this Court has held that an omission of this kind will not prevent the Court from trebling the damages. (O'Callaghan v. Booth, 6 Cal. 63; Hart v. Moon, Id. 161.) The next point raised is, that the verdict is against law and evidence. This, as we have already shown, is not well taken. The evidence fully sustains the verdict.

In impaneling the jury, the defendant propounded the following questions to each juror, which were objected to by the plaintiff and excluded by the Court, and this is assigned as error: "1st. Have you heard much conversation among the people in regard to the rights of the parties on the Suscol Rancho; and if so, have you formed or expressed an opinion in regard to those rights? 2d. Have you any bias or prejudice against that class of citizens on the Suscol Rancho commonly called squatters, of which class the defendant is one? 3d. Have you ever sat on any of these Suscol cases, similar to this case, as a trial juror?" It is not necessary to determine whether affirmative answers to these questions, or any one of them, would have formed a proper ground for a challenge for cause. Each party has a right to put questions to a juror, to show, not only that there exists proper grounds for a challenge for cause, but to elicit facts to enable the party to decide whether or not he will make a peremptory challenge; and the defendant had a right to put these questions, if they were pertinent for either purpose. He was entitled to an answer to these questions, to enable him to decide whether he would make a peremptory challenge; and the Court erred in refusing them.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MERRILL v. FORBES et al.

The rules of law respecting the acts necessary to constitute a forcible entry, or a forcible entry and unlawful detainer, require something more than a mere trespass upon the property.

One who enters upon land, for the purpose of cutting and taking away grass or crops growing thereon, without any intention of taking possession of the land, and without residing thereon, is not guilty of a forcible entry and detainer.

APPEAL from the County Court of Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman and Wells, for Appellants.

Merrill v. Forbes.

Our first point in the case is, that the complaint, and the proofs under it, establish that, if any unlawful act was committed, it was merely a trespass, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this form of action. (Commonwealth v. Shattuck, 4 Cush. 143; Frasier v. Hanlon, 5 Cal. 156; 1 Bishop on Cr. Law, Sec. 399; 2 Id. Sec. 416; State v. Fort and Gause, 4 Dev. & Bat. 192, cited in 2 Archbold's Crim. Prac. 354, 12; People v. Smith, 24 Barb. 16; Willard v. Warren, 17 Wend. 257; People v. Gibbs, 24 Id. 200.)

M. A. Wheaton, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action founded on an alleged unlawful entry and forcible detainer of a tract of land in Solano County, originally commenced before a Justice of the Peace, and appealed to the County Court, where it was tried before a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for damages in the sum of two hundred and sixty-seven dollars and fifty cents, which was trebled in the judgment.

It appears that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises in controversy, as tenant of the owner, under an agreement to give one-third of the grain that he might raise thereon, delivered in sacks. Whether there was any agreement about the crop of grass does not appear; but it seems that the plaintiff, shortly before the acts complained of, offered to purchase the grass of him, or his interest therein, but they failed to come to an agreement, and the defendant Forbes purchased the grass crop of the owner of the land. When Forbes went on the premises with his workmen and mowing machine to cut the grass, the plaintiff was not at home, but his employé went and told them they must not cut the hay. They refused to stop work. Afterward, the plaintiff returned home, and went and forbade them; but the workmen told him they were going to stay there until Forbes told them to quit. Forbes was afterwards told he must not cut the grass; to which he replied, it did not make any difference about Merrill's forbidding him—he was going to cut it.

Mitchell v. Davis.

The rules of law respecting the acts necessary to sustain an action for a forcible entry, or a forcible and unlawful detainer, require something more than a mere trespass upon the property. The entry of the defendants was evidently not for the purpose of taking possession of the land, but merely to cut and take away the grass growing thereon; and when this was completed, the defendants quit the premises entirely. Indeed, they do not appear to have resided on the land, even while they were at work. There is no conflict of evidence upon these points, and it is clear that the facts are entirely insufficient to maintain this kind of action.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

MITCHELL v. DAVIS.

On the trial of an action of forcible entry and detainer, the plaintiff offered in evidence a judgment against defendant awarding possession of the land; and the writ of restitution issuing on the same; and the Sheriff's return thereon: held, to be competent evidence, for the purpose only of showing the extent of plaintiff's possession, and that defendant was estopped from contesting the same.

The Supreme Court, in reversing a judgment, passed upon a point of law, as resulting from the facts then before it: held, that the rule that the law, thus laid down, becomes the law of the case in all its stages, only applies so long as the evidence develops the same state of facts; and that, if on the new trial, the evidence shows a different state of facts from that shown on the first trial, the law of the case will be that resulting from this new state of facts.

When irrelevant testimony is offered by one party, in the course of a trial, and objected to by the other, and is admitted by the Court, under the objection, and afterwards, before the close of the trial, the party introducing the evidence asks leave to withdraw it, and the other party objects, and the Court under the objection, refuses leave: held, that this last objection was a waiver of the first, and cured the error.

If the party guilty of a forcible entry, has any title or right of possession, his title or right of possession cannot be tried in an action of forcible entry and detainer. He must first deliver up the possession, forcibly acquired; and then, he may litigate his title or right to possession in a proper action.

APPEAL from the County Court, Stanislaus County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Mitchell v. Davis.

L. Quint and Coffroth & Spalding, for Appellant, cited: (Table Mountain Co. v. Stranahan, 21 Cal. 548; Davidson v. Dallas, 15 Id. 82; Higginbotham v. Higginbotham, 10 B. Monroe, 371; Baxter v. Beaumont, 16 East. 33).

George Cadwalader, for Respondent, cited: (Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 625; Rice v. Bancroft, 11 Pick. 468).

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action of forcible entry and detainer. The case has been previously before this Court, and will be found reported in 20 Cal. 45. It was there held that the evidence showed that the plaintiff was in possession of the premises at the time of the alleged entry of the defendant, as the agent of one Storer, and therefore the action should have been in the name of Storer, and not the plaintiff. It seems that Storer had recovered judgment, in an action for the possession of the premises, against Davis; and the return of the Sheriff to the writ of restitution was, that he had "put Storer, by his representative, James Mitchell, in peaceable possession of the within described premises;" and as there was no other proof respecting the character of the possession of the plaintiff, it was held that his possession was merely as against Storer.

At the trial, had after the return of the remittitur, the plaintiff proved that he held possession at the time of the defendant's entry, not as agent, but as the mortgagee of Storer, by his consent; and under instructions from the Court upon this subject, the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff introduced in evidence at the trial, the judgment, execution, and return of the Sheriff thereon in the case of Storer v. Davis, and this is alleged to be in error. This evidence was admissible to prove the right and extent of the possession of the plaintiff, and that the defendant was estopped from contesting the same. The return of the Sheriff that Mitchell was the "representative" of Storer, was open to explanation by proof showing in what way he was his representative, and in what character he took the possession. This objection is therefore overruled.

Mitchell v. Davis.

It is urged that the proof showed that the possession was delivered to Storer and not to Mitchell, and that there was no proof of actual possession by Mitchell at the time of the alleged entry; and the previous decision of this Court in the case is referred to in support of this position. The evidence in the case as now presented is very different upon this point from what it was on the previous appeal. It now appears that one Hunter was the attorney of Storer, and as such directed the Sheriff to put Mitchell in possession under the writ; that Mitchell had a mortgage upon the premises, and though he may have been put in possession as agent of Storer, yet the proof is that he held at the time of the defendant's entry as mortgagee, and not as agent. This evidence shows that the actual possession was in Mitchell, and not in Storer. The possession of a mortgagee is not in fact the possession of the mortgagor. As was said in the opinion on the former appeal: "The fact of possession, and not the title to the premises or the right of possession, can alone be inquired into." It is urged that the previous decision upon this point has become the law of the case, and conclusive upon the parties; and numerous decisions of this Court are referred to. An examination of those cases will show, however, that they apply only to principles of law announced in a case; and not to mere questions of fact, which may have been passed upon. For instance, it was held in this case on the previous appeal, as a question of fact, that the evidence showed that the possession of the plaintiff was as the agent of Storer, and not by any right in himself; and it was further held as a principle of law, founded upon this fact, that the possession of the agent was the possession of his principal for the purpose of this action, and therefore the action should have been in the name of the principal. The determination of this principle has become the law of the case; but the question of fact, whether or not the plaintiff was the agent of Storer, is liable to be changed by further evidence showing the true and a different state of facts; and the action of this Court upon this question of fact does not operate as a bar or estoppel upon the plaintiff from showing the true facts of the case. If no further evidence had been introduced by the plaintiff on the second trial upon this point, there might have been some grounds for saying that the question had been put at rest by the former adjudication. The judgment of this Court was, that the case be remanded for a new trial; at which new trial the plaintiff had a clear right to introduce any evidence relevant to the issues to be tried. The Court instructed the jury that if they "found from the evidence that Mitchell was the agent of Storer, and as such was put into the possession of the premises, then his possession was that of Storer, and not his own, and they should find for the defendant." This was following out and adhering to the law of the case as it had been laid down by this Court. The jury, however, found that he was not the agent of Storer, in finding for the plaintiff, and that finding is sustained by the evidence before them. This objection is therefore overruled.

The plaintiff offered in evidence a location of a military land warrant by Storer upon the premises, and the Court overruled an objection of the defendant to its admission, and this is assigned for error. It seems that immediately afterwards the plaintiff asked leave of the Court to withdraw this evidence from the jury; but the defendant opposed it, and the Court therefore refused leave to withdraw it. This action of the defendant waived this objection, and cured the error. The paper was irrelevant, and should not have been admitted, and the Court should have permitted it to be withdrawn; but, under the circumstances, the defendant is precluded from assigning it as error. The defendant offered in evidence an opinion of the U. S. Land Commissioner, respecting the validity of the location of this land warrant, which the Court excluded, upon objection being made by the plaintiff. The opinion, even if it were admissible in evidence under any circumstances, was clearly irrelevant to the issues in this case, and the Court therefore did not err in excluding it. If the defendant has any title or right of possession to the land, it must be tried in some action proper for trying such questions; but the present is not an action of that kind. He was not justified in attempting to enforce any such right by taking forcible possession of the land in dispute. He must first deliver up the possession thus forcibly acquired, and then he may be in a situation to litigate, in a proper action, any valid right or title he may have to the land. One great object of the Forcible Herriter v. Porter.

Entry Act, is to prevent even rightful owners from taking the law into their own hands and attempting to recover, by violence, what the remedial process of a Court would give them in a peaceful mode.

The judgment is affirmed.

HERRITER v. PORTER—HIHN, INTERVENOR.

A CAUSE of action arising out of contract, or based upon a single or continuous tortious act, cannot be divided up into several demands, and made the subject of separate actions.

If an action be brought to recover possession of a lot of personal property, wrongfully taken and detained, and if the wrongful taking was one continuous and tortious act, a verdict and judgment, in that action, will be a bar to a subsequent suit for the remainder of the property.

The Supreme Court will not presume error, or that facts exist which would show error. If the Court below commits error in its finding or judgment, that error, or the facts necessary to establish it, must be shown affirmatively by the appellant.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Cruz County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

R. F. Peckham, for Appellants.

There are many decisions against splitting up causes of action, founded in public policy; but they are all in trespass, trover, and actions, ex contractu.

No case is to be found in which it has been held, that a suit to recover a specific chattel was a bar to another suit to recover another specific chattel, which happened to be in the possession of the defendant at the time.

If such is the law, then if defendant has in his possession different kinds of goods, at the same time — though of the most opposite character — and in distant and different places, a recovery of one — for instance, a horse in Sacramento — would preclude his afterwards suing for a cow in the County of Santa Cruz.

Herriter v. Porter.

The chattels, in this case, being all of the same kind, can make no difference in principle.

J. C. Wilson and W. W. Stow, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession, or the value, if possession could not be had, of 7,770 redwood posts, in Santa Cruz County, brought by the plaintiff against Porter, Sheriff of that county, and Hihn intervened in the action, claiming to be the owner adverse to the plaintiff. The facts as agreed to are substantially as follows: Prior to July 6th, 1860, the intervenor, Hihn, and others were the owners of a tract of land in said county, known as the "Soquel Augmentation;" and before that date the plaintiff went on the land, cut and took timber thereon, and made the same into posts, to the amount of 12,000 to 14,000 — the posts in controversy being a part of them. On that day, the plaintiff had 7,000 of the posts at the warehouse of Hihn & Lynch, 4,000 on the bank of the Soquel Creek, and the remainder on the "Soquel Augmentation." The intervenor, Hihn, and the owners of the tract of land, on that day, commenced an action in the District Court, against Herriter, the plaintiff to this action, to recover the possession of 3,500 of the posts at the warehouse of Hihn & Lynch, and 5,000 on the "Soquel Augmentation;" and the defendant, Porter, as Sheriff, took from the possession of Herriter, under the affidavit, order, and undertaking in that action, the said 13,777 posts. The plaintiffs in that action recovered a verdict and judgment, against Herriter, for 3,500 posts at the warehouse, and 2,300 of those on the "Augmentation." Herriter having failed to file a bond or undertaking, in the former action, as required by the statute, to enable him to retain possession of the posts, the Sheriff delivered them to Hihn, one of the plaintiffs in that action, who afterwards sold them. Herriter, after the judgment, demanded the posts sued for in this action of the Sheriff, who failed to deliver them. Upon these facts the Court below found for the plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which the defendants appeal.

Herriter v. Porter.

It is urged by the appellants, that the timber out of which the posts were made was cut on the land of Hihn and others—therefore, the posts were their property under the rule laid down in the case of Halleck v. Mixer (16 Cal. 578). That is true, unless they were cut under some contract or agreement with the owners of the land, or with their consent—a fact which does not appear in the statements of facts agreed on.

It is further contended that the 4,000 posts on the bank of the Soquel Creek were not included in the action brought by Hihn and others against Herriter; that the judgment in that action is not a bar to the claim of the intervenor, Hihn, set up in this action. From the agreed statement it would appear that they were not thus included; but the statement shows that the Sheriff, in that action, took possession of those posts with all the others, and delivered them to the plaintiffs in that action, under the order, affidavit, and undertaking therein. This act of the Sheriff does not, however, necessarily show that the right to those particular posts were litigated and determined in that action; but it shows that the intervenor, Hihn, obtained the possession of those 4,000 posts under and by virtue of the proceedings in that action.

If the claim of Hihn and others to all the posts cut by Herriter was founded upon one entire contract respecting them, or upon one single or continuous tortious act on the part of Herriter, then that claim could not be divided up into distinct demands, and made the subject of separate actions. And if it was attempted, a judgment in one action would be a conclusive bar to any other action, upon the principle, that if a plaintiff bring an action for a part only of an entire and indivisible demand, the verdict and judgment in that action will be a conclusive bar to any subsequent suit for another part of the same demand. (Phillips v. Benik, 16 Johns. 136; Farrington v. Payne, 15 J. R. 432; Cunningham v. Harris, 5 Cal. 81.) Whether the former action between these parties was founded upon a contract, or a tort, we are unable to determine from the statement of facts before us. So, too, we are equally unable to determine whether the claim sued for in this action, and that sued for in the former action, formed parts of one entire contract, or are founded upon one single or continuous tortious act. In the absence of the necessary evidence to determine these points, we cannot presume they are of such a character as would require us to reverse the judgment of the Court below. If that Court has committed error in its finding or judgment, that error, or the facts necessary to establish it, must be shown affirmatively by the appellant. We cannot presume error, or presume facts to exist which would show error.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ABRAMS v. HOWARD, ADMINISTRATOR, ETC.

THE declaration of a married woman as sole trader, which states that the business she intends to carry on will be the business of buying and selling goods, wares, and merchandise, describes the business to be carried on with sufficient particularity.

The affidavit of publication of the declaration of a sole trader, which states that the publication was made "once a week for three weeks, viz.: from April 26th, to May 20th, 1861," is sufficient to show that the publication was made for three successive weeks.

A and B, married women, as sole traders, each had suits pending against C, a Sheriff, for seising on execution their personal property. A's suit was tried first, and it was stipulated that B's suit should abide the event of A's. On the trial of A's suit, she offered as a witness, the husband of B: held, that the legal interest of the witness was adverse to the party calling him, and that he was a competent witness.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Pratt & Clarke, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeals in these cases, on the following grounds: 1st, because the transcript contains no assignment of errors; 2d, because there is no statement on appeal; 3d, because it does not show that the appellant filed an undertaking on appeal, within five days after the notice of appeal was filed. The appellant has filed his assignments of error in this Court, which is all that is requisite. There is a statement on motion for new trial which answers the purpose of a statement on appeal. But if it did not, the absence of a statement on appeal is no ground for dismissing the appeal. The appellant has filed a certified copy of the undertaking on appeal, which shows that it was filed two days after filing the notice of appeal. The motion to dismiss the appeal is therefore denied.

These actions were brought by the plaintiffs, married women, claiming to be sole traders, to recover the possession of certain personal property, against the defendant's intestate, former Sheriff of San Francisco, who had levied an execution thereon, as the property of the plaintiffs' husbands, who had formerly been engaged in business, under the style of "Abrams & Bro." At the trial, the plaintiff offered in evidence her declaration as sole trader, to which the defendant objected that it was insufficient, not being made in compliance with the Sole Trader Act. The declaration states as follows: that it is "my intention to carry on and transact business on my own account and in my own name as sole trader, in pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the State of California, entitled 'An Act to authorize Married Women to transact Business in their own Name, as Sole Traders,' approved April 12th, 1852. And I further declare that the said business will be the buying and selling of goods, wares, and merchandise," etc. The objection is, that the description of the business to be carried on is not sufficiently specific. This objection is not well taken. The business of a general merchant, is described with sufficient particularity.

The affidavit of the publication of the declaration as sole trader was also objected to, because it did not state that the publication was made for three successive weeks, in the terms of the statute. The affidavit states that the publication was made "once a week for three weeks, viz.: from April 26th to May 20th, 1861." The affidavit is sufficient on this point. If the first publication was on the twenty-sixth of April, the first week's publication ended May third; the second week, May 10th; and the third week, May 17th, which shows that they must have been successive weeks.

When the case of Henrietta Abrams was called for trial, the parties in the case of Helena Abrams agreed that the latter cause should abide the event of the former. In the trial of the former case, the plaintiff called as a witness Moses Abrams, the husband of the plaintiff in the latter suit, and the defendant objected that he was incompetent, on the ground that his testimony would inure directly to the benefit of his own wife under the stipulation. The Court overruled the objection, and this is assigned for error. The witness was not a party to either suit. His legal interest was adverse to the party calling him; because if she failed to maintain her action, the property would be applied in payment of his debt on the execution, and he was interested to have it so applied. The record of the judgment in this action would not be legal evidence for or against the witness, in the other action, for he was not a party to that action. The fact that his wife, a sole trader, was a party thereto, does not bring the case within the rule in Sec. 393 of the Practice Act. This assignment of error, therefore, is not well taken.

The judgment is affirmed.

TREASURER v. THE COMMERCIAL COAL MINING CO.

THE general rule, that a Court of Equity would not enforce a specific performance of an agreement for the transfer of stock, applied particularly to public stocks, such as are commonly bought and sold in the market, and where exact compensation in damages could be awarded by a Court of Law.

Where stock is of a peculiar and uncertain value, and where compensation in damages will not afford a party a full and adequate remedy, a Court of Equity will decree a specific performance.

In this State, Courts of Equity will decree a specific performance of contracts for the transfer of mining stocks, owing to their fluctuating and uncertain value in market, and the difficulty of substantiating by competent evidence what would be a proper measure of damages.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

M. G. Cobb, for Appellant.

The true rule in equity is, that specific performance of an agreement relating to chattels, ought to be decreed, where equity and conscience require it, and where the remedy by action at law for damages would be inadequate, and no competent or just relief could be otherwise afforded. (2 Kent's Com. 9th Ed. 661; Mitford's Ch. Pl. 6th Am. Ed. 140, note g.) The bill in this case, however, may well be sustained on the ground of trust. (Mech. Bank of Alexandria v. Seton, 1 Peters, 203.)

Hall & Scaniker, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action in the nature of a suit in equity, to compel the defendants, a corporation, to issue to the plaintiff a certificate of forty-six shares of the capital stock of the company. The defendants demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The Court sustained the demurrer, and rendered a final judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint avers, that the plaintiff, with others, located and took up a coal mining claim; that his colocators, with others, formed the corporation defendants, for the purpose of mining for coal, with 2,500 shares of capital stock; that plaintiff and his colocators, delivered the possession of their claim to the corporation, who took possession, and have ever since held possession; that in consideration thereof, the defendants agreed to issue to the plaintiff the one-sixth of the capital stock, after deducting his share of the debts then existing against the original locators, and the expenses of organizing the corporation; that one hundred and sixty-two and two-thirds shares were used to pay his share of said debts; that they have delivered to him two hundred and eight shares, leaving forty-six still due to him; that he demanded the stock, and they have refused to issue it. An amendment to the complaint sets forth the names of the trustees of the corporation, and prays that they be compelled to issue the stock, and for general relief.

The general rule is, that a specific performance will not be enforced of an agreement for the transfer of stock, on the principle that damages are a sufficient satisfaction. (Fry on Spec. Per. Sec. 24.) This rule applies more particularly to public stocks, such as are commonly bought and sold in the market; and it has been held not to apply to railway shares and investments of that description, where the shares are limited in number and cannot always be had in the market. (Duncuft v. Albrecht, 12 Simons, 189.) In which case it was also held that a parol agreement for the sale of such shares was binding, and that the contract was not within the Statute of Frauds. (Humble v. Mitchell, 2 Rail. Cases, 70.) So a bill to compel a specific delivery of certificates of shares of stock has been sustained. (Doloret v. Rothchild, 1 Sim. & Stuart, 590; Chater v. San Francisco S. R. Co., 19 Cal. 219.) So of a bill to compel a transfer of York Buildings stock. (Colt v. Nettewill, 2 P. Wm. 304.) Justice Story, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (Vol. 2, Sec. 717), speaks thus upon this subject: "And the true reason why a contract for stock is not now specifically decreed, is, that it is ordinarily capable of an exact compensation. But cases of a peculiar stock may easily be supposed, where Courts of Equity might still feel themselves bound to decree a specific performance, upon the ground that from its nature it has a peculiar value, and is incapable of compensation by damages. Indeed, it has been thought, that on contracts for stock a bill ought now to be maintainable generally in equity for a specific delivery thereof, upon the ground that a Court of Law cannot give the property, but can only give a remedy in damages, the beneficial effect of which must depend upon the personal responsibility of the party." And it seems to be well settled, that where compensation in damages will not afford the party a full, complete, and adequate remedy, a specific performance will be decreed. (Clark v. Flint, 22 Pick. 231; The Mech. Bank v. Seton, 1 Peters, 299; Lady Arundell v.

McDonald v. Badger.

Phipps, 10 Vesey, 148; Buxton v. Lister, 3 Atkins, 383; Cowles v. Whitman, 10 Conn. 121.) Courts of Equity have never hesitated to compel a transfer of stock held by a person in trust for another. (The Mech. Bank v. Seton, 1 Peters, 299; Cowles v. Whitman, 10 Conn. 121.) In the peculiar condition of business and mining operations in this State, where numerous mining and other corporations are in existence, whose stock is often of fluctuating and uncertain value, and where certain kinds of stocks have a peculiar value to those acquainted with their affairs, where the market value of stocks, if any they have, is often difficult to substantiate by competent evidence, and where the risk of the personal responsibility of individuals and corporations is so great, Courts should be liberal in extending the full, adequate, and complete relief afforded by a decree of specific performance. In the view we have thus taken of the principles which should govern cases of this kind, the action of the Court below was erroneous.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the defendant is directed to answer the complaint within ten days after notice of the filing of the remittitur in the Court below.

McDONALD et al. v. WILLIAM G. BADGER—HARRIET J. BADGER, INTERVENOR.

THE declaration of homestead may include more than one lot of land in the homestead claim, if they are contiguous, and their value in the aggregate does not exceed $5,000.

Where the homestead claim, as described in the declaration, includes several lots of land; and the lot on which the homestead residence is situated equals or exceeds $5,000 in value, the homestead claim is void as to all the lots included therein, over and above the one thus occupied as the homestead residence.

Where the declaration of homestead claimed and described two lots of land, and the one on which the homestead residence was situated was worth $5,000 or more, and both lots were sold on an execution, issued on a judgment against the husband: Held, that the purchaser at the execution sale acquired a valid title to the lot on which the homestead residence was not situated, and could maintain ejectment therefor.

A deed to the wife, of real estate, which is upon its face a deed of purchase, and recites a consideration paid, is presumptive evidence that the property thereby conveyed belongs to the community, and is liable as such for the debts of the husband; but this presumption may be overcome by clear and conclusive proof that the property was purchased with separate funds of the wife. The execution defendant cannot defeat the recovery, in ejectment, of the purchaser at the execution sale, by setting up title in a third person.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

At the Marshal's sale referred to in the opinion, the land was sold in three parcels; the lot, thirty feet front, on which the residence was, in one parcel; the strip, four feet nine inches wide, in a second parcel; and the lot, thirty-four feet front, in a third parcel.

D. P. & A. Barstow, for Appellants.

The referee who tried the case, as well as the Judge who passed upon the motion for a new trial, held that this property was liable for Badger's debts. The only objection to our right of recovery was, that at the time of the levy and Marshal's sale, there was a segregating of this lot from the other, or setting apart of the other portion of the whole tract from this for a homestead; and the case of Gary v. Estabrook et al. (6 Cal. 457), was relied on as an authority in point. But the case at bar differs entirely from that case, as the Court will see by a reference to it. At the Marshal's sale, three lots were sold: the homestead lot, the strip four feet and nine inches wide (between the two lots), and the thirty-four feet front. We do not claim that the homestead lot passed at the sale, but we do contend that the remainder of the land did. There was no call for an appraisalment of the premises, and a setting apart of the homestead, in this case.

J. B. Crockett, for Respondent.

The whole property being covered by the homestead claim, it was not liable to forced sale on execution; and the purchasers at such sale cannot recover, in ejectment, the excess over $5,000. Ejectment is not the proper remedy; nor a sale under execution, against the husband, the appropriate method of reaching the excess. (Cook v. McChristian, 4 Cal. 23; Gary v. Estabrook, 6 Id. 457; Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Id. 181; Bowman v. Norton, Id. 403; Williams v. Young, 17 Id. 408.) The plaintiff in this suit, therefore, acquired no title by the Marshal's deed, which can avail him in this action.

If there was any title in Badger to the strip covered by the conservatory, reserved in the sale to Scott, or to any other part of the premises, it passed by the proceedings in insolvency to his assignee; and there was, therefore, no interest remaining in him to be sold on execution. (Taffts v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 47; Lambert v. Glade, 4 Id. 337; Bank of Tenn. v. Horn, 17 How. 157.)

Appellants, in reply.

We have always regarded the question of homestead, as the real point in the case. Conceding the claim to be good, as to the original thirty-foot lot, we have contended that the after-acquired property could not be invested with the character of homestead property, because the benefits conferred by the Homestead Act were not intended to extend so far. The design of the act is to secure to every family a homestead worth, at most, $5,000. That Badger's family had on the thirteenth of June, 1855. But they claim more. They claim, by virtue of that act, as homestead property, land subsequently acquired, worth, at least, $10,000; and this Court is asked to assent to the proposition, that where a party who has "selected" his homestead worth $5,000, and upwards, afterwards acquired other land in the neighborhood of his homestead, this land also becomes invested with homestead rights. It was settled long ago, that a defendant, in ejectment, situated as Badger is, in this case, cannot set up an outstanding title in a third person. And the reason of the rule is, that by the act of sale and purchase, the judgment debtor becomes the tenant of the purchaser, and cannot deny his landlord's title. (Jackson v. Graham, 3 Cairns, 188; Jackson v. Bush, 10 John. 223.)

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a lot in the City of San Francisco, sixty-eight feet nine inches front on Second Street, and one hundred and twenty-five feet in depth. The plaintiff claims title to the premises under and by virtue of a deed executed by the United States Marshal, dated October, 1860, under and in pursuance of a Marshal's sale on execution on the thirty-first day of January, 1860, issued upon a judgment recovered by the plaintiffs in the United States Circuit Court for the Northern District of California against the defendant on the nineteenth day of November, 1858. Mrs. Badger, the wife of the defendant, intervened, claiming the premises as a homestead, and as her separate property.

The principal questions which arise in this case depend upon these claims to the property set up by the wife: the first of which we propose to examine is that relating to the homestead. It appears that in 1855 Badger executed, acknowledged, and recorded an instrument purporting to be a declaration of homestead on thirty feet of these premises, which was all he owned at that time. This paper can have no force or effect — as the law in force at that time did not authorize the execution or recording of such instruments. He was, however, residing upon this lot of thirty feet with his family, and it constituted and was his homestead under the laws then in force. Afterwards, on the third day of May, 1861, Mrs. Badger duly executed, and acknowledged, and procured to be recorded, a declaration of homestead, which includes not only the thirty feet occupied as a homestead in 1855, but the adjoining lot, which had been purchased since 1855, of thirty-eight feet nine inches front by one hundred and twenty-five feet in depth. This declaration of homestead includes the premises now in controversy.

The referee finds that the lot, thirty feet wide, with the house, is of the value of $7,500, and the thirty-eight feet nine inches front is of the value of $4,800. The appellants contend that as the value of these lots exceed the $5,000, the value of the homestead allowed by law, and as they are separate lots, acquired by different titles, therefore the homestead claim should at least be limited to the lot thirty feet front on which the dwelling-house stands, and that the lot thirty-eight feet nine inches front should be held and deemed free and clear of the claim of homestead. There can be no valid objection to including more than one of several contiguous lots in the homestead claim, provided their value does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000, the sum allowed by the homestead law. But a person cannot thus include more than one lot in the homestead declaration where the value of such lot, with the dwelling thereon, equals or exceeds $5,000. And if it is attempted, the homestead claim will be held void as to all separate lots included therein, over and above the one thus occupied as a residence. The homestead claim cannot, therefore, in this case be held to extend beyond the lot of thirty feet front. The appellant in his brief does not claim that this lot passed by the sale to the plaintiffs, so that it is unnecessary to examine either the title set up to it by Mrs. Badger as her separate property, or any questions which might have been raised owing to the fact that its value exceeds $5,000.

The next questions to examine relate to the other lot thirty-eight feet nine inches front. It appears that on the eighteenth day of December, 1855, the defendant, Badger, purchased this lot and took a deed therefor from one Slade; that afterwards Badger sold and conveyed the southern portion, to wit: thirty-four feet front on Second Street by one hundred and twenty-five feet deep, to one Scott, thus leaving the title to the northern portion, four feet nine inches wide by one hundred and twenty-five feet deep still in Badger. On the twenty-fourth day of April, 1857, Scott conveyed this south thirty-four feet by deed of bargain and sale to Mrs. Badger for the sum of $3,000, of which $1,000 was paid in cash and the remaining $2,000 was secured by a mortgage on the premises executed by Badger and his wife jointly, and they also gave their joint promissory note for the amount, which note and mortgage still remain unpaid.

The intervenor claims that she made this purchase of Scott for her own sole, and exclusive use, and benefit, as her own separate estate; and that the purchase money paid thereon was her own separate property. This deed is not copied into the transcript, and we are unable to determine from the record whether the property was conveyed to her sole, separate, and exclusive use, or not. The referee who tried the cause found, that the cash payment of one thousand dollars was made as follows, to wit: That one Phinney, who resides in the City of Boston, had before then left with said Wm. G. Badger, for collection, a promissory note of another person, with authority to loan out the money, when collected, on Phinney's account; that the note was paid to Badger shortly before the conveyance from Scott to Mrs. Badger; that, to enable Mrs. Badger to make the cash payment to Scott, Badger loaned to his wife the one thousand dollars collected for Phinney; that, subsequently, a portion of the one thousand dollars was refunded to Phinney by the sale of a piano, which was the separate property of Mrs. Badger, being between three hundred and fifty and four hundred dollars. The referee also found, that the intervenor was not entitled to maintain her intervention, and a judgment was rendered accordingly, from which she has not appealed. The referee also found, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, and they appeal from the judgment rendered thereon. The decision of the referee was adverse to the claim of title set up by Mrs. Badger; and as she has not appealed from that decision, it is conclusive against her, so far as relates to her claim to it as her separate property.

The law is well settled by the decisions of this Court, that a deed of purchase to the wife is presumptive evidence that the property thereby conveyed belongs to the community, and is liable as such to the debts of the husband, and can be disposed of by him like any other community property. But this presumption may be overcome by clear and satisfactory proof that it was acquired by the separate funds or property of either the husband or wife; and the burden of proof to rebut the presumption lies upon the party claiming it as separate. The fact that such a deed is made to the wife, instead of the husband, creates no presumption that the property is her separate estate. The conveyance being by deed of purchase, excludes all presumption that this property was acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent. (Meyer v. Kinser, 12 Cal. 247; Smith v. Smith, Id. 216; Pisley v. Higgins, 15 Id. 127.) The proof in this case does not clearly and satisfactorily show that this lot was purchased with the separate funds or property of the wife. It cannot, therefore, be held or deemed her separate estate; but it was community property, and liable to the debts of the husband, and subject to his control and disposition.

It further appears, that, on the third day of June, 1857, the defendant, Badger, filed his petition in a proper Court, to obtain a discharge from his debts under the Insolvent Law; that the proper proceedings were had, and, in due time, the Sheriff was duly appointed his assignee; and thereupon, Badger made, executed, and delivered to the assignee a general assignment, in writing, of all his estate, in general terms, without specifying any particular property. After proper proceedings, he obtained a decree discharging him from his debts. The respondent contends, that the assignee in this case took, by operation of law, all the estate of the debtor, whether named in his schedule or not; that the title to this lot was thereby vested in the assignee, who held the same for the benefit of the creditors generally, in accordance with the insolvent law; and therefore the plaintiffs acquired no right, title, or estate in the property by their subsequent purchase under the judgment. It is unnecessary to determine these questions, because it is a rule of law that the execution defendant cannot defeat the purchaser's recovery of his possession, by setting up a title in some third person. This rule is founded in good sense and sound policy. (Jackson v. Graham, 8 Caines, 188; Jackson v. Bush, 10 J. R. 223; Jackson v. Davis, 18 Id. 7.) It follows that this outstanding title in the assignee is no defense to the action.

The respondents contend, that the action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, on the ground that the defendant has not been in the possession of the thirty-four foot lot since the deed from him to Scott, dated in January, 1856, and this action was commenced December 21st, 1860. This, however, was within five years, the time limited for actions of this kind. But, even if it had not been, the defendant, Badger, has been in possession of this lot ever since the deed from Scott to his wife. The deed, as has been shown, conveyed a community, and not a separate, estate; the possession followed the estate, and the husband is therefore to be deemed as having been in possession under it, and not the wife. This defense is therefore untenable. It follows, from the view we have taken of this case, that the referee erred in finding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to the possession of the lot, described as fronting thirty-eight feet nine inches on Second Street, and running back one hundred and twenty-five feet.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

On petition for rehearing, CROCKER, J. delivered the following opinion — NORTON, J. concurring:

A rehearing is urged on the ground that one point presented by the appellant in his brief was not passed upon in the former opinion. It is contended that as the homestead declaration covers the whole property, including both lots, therefore, even though the value exceeds $5,000, the excess cannot be recovered in ejectment: that it was not liable to forced sale on execution. Several decisions of this Court are cited which sustain the principle that a judgment is no lien upon the homestead, and that the same cannot be sold on execution. (4 Cal. 23; 16 Id. 181-213; 17 Id. 403.) In another case cited, that of Gary v. Estabrook (6 Cal. 457), it was held, that where the homestead claimed by the defendant in execution had been ascertained by appraisement to exceed $5,000, a sale thereof should not be made by the Sheriff under execution until an exact appraisement of the value of the premises is obtained, so that he could sell and convey a definite undivided interest therein. That is, to illustrate, if the homestead should be found, upon appraisement, to be worth $10,000, then as the undivided one-half only would be exempt under the Homestead Law, he could then proceed to sell and convey the other undivided half not exempt. This rule properly applies to a case of a single lot or tract of land on which the dwelling of the debtor stands, but it is not necessary to take that course where the homestead covers two or more lots, on only one of which is the dwelling of the debtor. As stated in the former opinion, the debtor may include several contiguous lots in his homestead claim, provided they do not exceed in value $5,000; but if the lot on which the dwelling stands equals or exceeds in value the $5,000, the attempt to include any other lot or lots will fail. If inserted in the declaration filed, they will not in such case form any part of the homestead, any more than as though they had not been inserted therein. The law requires that the debtor act in good faith, and not under cover of a law made for his special benefit, attempt to embarrass his creditors, or hinder, or delay them in collecting their just debts. It is better for the debtor to treat the lot or lots not occupied by the dwelling as free from the homestead, and therefore liable to levy and sale on execution, like any other property not exempt from execution, than subject the debtor to the risk of the loss of the whole homestead property, on the ground that he had included an excessive quantity of value in his declaration for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding creditors. As to the objection that the value of the separate pieces of property, as reported by the referee, was taken at a date subsequent to the filing of the declaration of homestead, and that the property may have greatly improved in value in the meantime, we think it is entitled to no weight, for the reason that there was no proof or finding as to the value at the time of the filing of the declaration; in which case the presumption would be that the value would be the same, as there properly could be no presumption of either an increase or diminution of the value in the intermediate time. We do not wish to be understood, however, as holding that the value at that date is to fix the extent or quantity of land exempt as a homestead for all future time, regardless of the subsequent increase of value caused by the construction of improvements or otherwise. That is a question to be determined when it is properly before the Court.

The rehearing is denied.

ROWLEY, EXECUTOR, ETC., v. HOWARD et al.

The return of a Deputy Sheriff, on a process served, is a nullity, unless made in the name of the Sheriff.

The jurisdiction of Justices' Courts is special and limited, and the law presumes nothing in favor of their jurisdiction. A party who asserts a right under a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court, must show affirmatively every fact necessary to give the Court jurisdiction to render such judgment.

The acts in relation to the collection of delinquent taxes, which compel the defendant to verify his answer, do not change the rule in the forty-sixth section of the Practice Act, "that where the complaint is not verified, a general denial of its allegation in the answer will put in issue all its material allegations."

A summons was served by a Deputy Sheriff, and returned with the following signature to the return: "Elijah T. Cole, D. S." Judgment was rendered by default: held, that the judgment was null and void, for want of jurisdiction.

Rowley v. Howard.

The general rule applicable to all judgments is, that they cannot be impeached in a collateral action, for errors or irregularities, but may be for want of jurisdiction.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and the defendants appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

A. P. Catlin, for Appellants.

The judgment before the Justice was void, for want of jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.

Winans & Hyer and W. S. Wood, for Respondent.

A judgment by default, where summons has been served on defendant, cannot be attacked collaterally, for a mere irregularity of service, or for a defective return. (Dorente v. Sullivan, 7 Cal. 279; Crane v. Brannan, 3 Id. 193; Webb v. Harrison, Id. 65.) The service of summons was sufficient.

The rule laid down in Joyce v. Joyce (5 Cal. 449), on which appellants relied to show that the service on Young was defective, is overruled in Touchard v. Crow (20 Cal. 150); in which case it is decided that a Deputy County Clerk may take acknowledgments — holding a deputy to possess the same powers as the principal. The statutes in reference to County Clerks and their deputies, and Sheriffs and their deputies being similar, the same rule will obtain as to the powers possessed by each.

OROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a lot in the town of Folsom. The plaintiff claims title under a tax deed, executed by the Sheriff, in pursuance of a sale under an execution issued out of the District Court, upon a judgment for taxes, rendered in a Justice's Court by default. The judgment was rendered, and the proceedings had, under and in pursuance of a statute of this State, entitled "An Act to provide for the collection of Delinquent Taxes in the City and County of Sacramento," approved April 3d, 1860. (Stat. 1860, 189.) The return of the service of the summons issued in the action for taxes is signed "Elijah T. Cole, D. S.;" and it is objected that this return is insufficient to give the Court jurisdiction, or to authorize him to enter a judgment by default. This objection is well taken. In Joyce v. Joyce (5 Cal. 449) it was held, that such a return was insufficient to prove service; and that the act and return of a deputy is a nullity, unless done in the name and by the authority of the Sheriff. And a similar principle was laid down in Lewis v. Thompson (8 Cal. 266). The jurisdiction of Justices' Courts being special and limited, the law presumes nothing in favor of their jurisdiction; and a party who asserts a right under a judgment rendered in such Court, must show affirmatively every fact necessary to confer such jurisdiction. (Swain v. Chase, 12 Cal. 283; Whitwell v. Barbier, 7 Id. 64; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Id. 296.)

The respondent, in reply to this point, contends that as the complaint alleges that "said judgment was duly and lawfully recovered in manner and form prescribed by law," and as this averment is not specifically denied in the answer, therefore it is admitted. The complaint is not verified, and the answer denies generally the allegations of the complaint. This averment cannot, therefore, be held as admitted. It is true, that the act in question requires the answer to be verified; but this does not change the rule established by Sec. 46 of the Practice Act. The statute also provides that "any deed derived from a sale of real property, under this act, shall be conclusive evidence of title, except as against actual frauds, or prepayment of the taxes, and shall entitle the holder thereof to a writ of assistance, from the District Court, to obtain possession of such property." The respondent contends that this statute precludes the appellant from making the objection. In the case of Mills v. Tukey (22 Cal. 373), this clause of the statute was considered on an appeal from an order granting a writ of assistance; but in that case the Court founded its decision upon the fact that "the sale was made on a judgment regularly obtained," and therefore is not authority upon the question now before us, where the judgment is null and void for want of jurisdiction. The plaintiff introduced the papers in evidence, showing the proceedings before the Justice, in support of his title, and they show the invalidity of the judgment. The plaintiff, therefore, proved the invalidity of his own claim of title; and the statute does not preclude the defendant from taking the benefit of an objection thus shown.

It is further urged, by the respondent, that the judgment of the Justice cannot be impeached in this collateral action — citing numerous cases in support of the position. But that rule applies more particularly to the judgments of the superior Courts of general original jurisdiction, and not to inferior Courts of special and limited jurisdiction, like that of a Justice of the Peace. In the former, all presumptions are in favor of their jurisdiction; and their want of jurisdiction must be proved. In the latter, the presumption is against their jurisdiction; and therefore it must be affirmatively shown. (Alderson v. Bell, 9 Cal. 315; Dorente v. Sullivan, 7 Id. 279.) The general rule applicable to all judgments, is that they cannot be impeached in a collateral action for errors or irregularities, but may for want of jurisdiction. (The Chemung Canal Bank v. Judson, 4 Selden, 254; 2 Phillips' Ev.; C. H. & E.'s Notes, 109, 65, 188.) This objection is fatal to the plaintiff's claim of title; and the Court below erred in overruling it.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

HICKS v. WHITESIDE.

A DECLARATION of location, under the Possessory Act of this State, described the tract of land as being in Township 21; and also gave the names of the land-claims adjoining it on its different sides. The tract was in Township 22: held, that this mistake did not vitiate the declaration, and that it was admissible in evidence.

A, a witness for plaintiff, when cross-examined, was asked questions by defendant, which, on plaintiff's objection, were erroneously ruled out by the Court. Defendant afterwards called the same witness, and asked the same questions, which were answered without objection: held, that the judgment would not be reversed by reason of the error committed by the Court, as defendant had suffered no injury thereby.

In an action to recover possession of a tract of land, claimed by plaintiff under the Possessory Act of this State, evidence tending to show, that at the time plaintiff filed his declaration, he knew that the land in controversy or any portion of it was claimed by defendant, is relevant.

The two hundred dollars of improvements, pertaining to the realty, required by the fourth section of the Possessory Act, must be made on the land claimed, before an action can be commenced to recover possession of the same.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Butte County.

The land in dispute in this action, was the north half of the south-east quarter section eight, containing eighty acres. Plaintiff, in his declaration of location, claimed the whole of the south-east quarter. Defendant had resided on the north-east quarter of the same section for several years prior to the making and recording of plaintiff's declaration; and an inclosed field of defendant's extended on, to, and included, about fifteen acres of the said north half. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and the defendant appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. E. W. Lewis, for Appellant.

The Court erred in permitting plaintiff to introduce the declaration of location. The declaration describes the land as being in Township 21, while the land in action is in Township 22. Certainly, that is a variance that is material and decisive on the case. A declaration under the act, when the provisions of the law have been complied with, is the title paper of the claimant, as much so as a patent or deed; and a person might with as much propriety recover land described in them as being in one township, when the land in action is in a different township. The Court ought to have given the first instruction asked by defendant. Plaintiff, in his pleadings, predicated his bill upon the Possessory Act. When a person pleads a particular title, he must prove it as laid. (Egan v. Delaney, 16 Cal. 87.) To recover, under the Possessory Act, he must show a full, complete compliance with the provisions of the act—particularly, Secs. 2, 3, and 4—before suit was commenced. (Wright v. Whitesides, 15 Cal. 47.)

H. O. & W. H. Beatty, for Respondent.

The description was perfect without the township. We could reject that as a call repugnant to and inconsistent with the other calls; and rely upon the other portions of the description. That you may reject one repugnant call of a deed, when the others furnish a perfect description of the land, is beyond question, both on principles of reason and authority. (1 A. K. Marshall, 17; Ferris v. Coover, 10 Cal. 589.) The instruction asked by defendant, was improper for this reason: plaintiff filed his claim December 17th, 1860, and filed his complaint February 20th, 1861. Suppose plaintiff was living on the place the twentieth of February, and putting up improvements at that time; but that they were not far enough advanced to amount to two hundred dollars. He brings suit on that day, and goes on with his improvements. Before the seventeenth day of March — when the ninety days would expire — he has over two hundred dollars of improvements. Now, on the trial, he proves that he complied with all the requirements of the statute, within the time prescribed. Could the trespasser say: "You sued too soon; you should have allowed me to trespass a month longer before you sued?" This point is fully settled in the case of Stark v. Barnes (4 Cal. 412).

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a tract of land in Butte County. The tract really in controversy is the north half of the south-east quarter of Section 8, in Township 22 north, of Range 1 east. The plaintiff claimed under the Possessory Act of this State. He offered in evidence his declaration of location, filed in the Recorder's office; and the defendant objected to its introduction on the ground that it described the tract as being in "Township 21," instead of Township 22, and contends that the Court erred in overruling the objection. The premises are particularly described by the surrounding claims, which clearly show that the tract lay in Township 22, and that the figures 21 were inserted by mistake, instead of 22. The Court therefore properly overruled the objection.

It seems that Herring, the County-Surveyor, testified as a witness for the plaintiff, that he made the survey of the tract of land described in the plaintiff's declaration; that he wrote the declaration; and that the tract embraced one hundred and sixty acres. On cross-examination, the defendant asked him when this survey was made, and whether he made the survey prior to or at the time he wrote the certificate; to which the plaintiff objected, that the questions were not proper on cross-examination. The Court sustained the objection; and this is also assigned for error. The questions were clearly proper ones on cross-examination; but it is evident that the defendant was not injured by this ruling of the Court. The objection only went to the putting of the questions at that particular time; and did not preclude him from putting the same questions, upon making him a witness for himself, had he so desired. If, when the defendant recalled the witness as his own, the Court had then overruled the questions, he might perhaps have claimed that he had been injured thereby; but it seems that he then asked the question without objection. The questions do not seem to have been of so important or material a character as to justify us in reversing the judgment because they were excluded at that particular stage of the trial.

It appears that the defendant had been in the possession, prior to the filing of the possessory claim by the plaintiff, of an old field, a part of which, including about fifteen acres, lay upon the north side of the eighty-acre tract in controversy. It seems that the remainder of the eighty acres was inclosed by a fence in the spring of 1860, built by the defendant and other parties. One of these persons, Garner, was called as a witness, and the defendant asked him what he knew or understood about the fences thus built including any part of the Whitesides tract, and whether it included any portion of the tract upon which Whitesides resided. The possessory claim filed by the plaintiff, bounded the tract on the north by the "Whitesides claim," as well as described it as the south-east quarter of Sec. 8. The Court, on the ground of irrelevancy, excluded these questions, and also a question put to another witness respecting the knowledge of the plaintiff, that the defendant claimed the tract in controversy at the time of a certain conversation between the parties respecting the building of fences. We think all of these questions were relevant to the matters in controversy between the parties, and that the Court erred in excluding them. They tend to show the knowledge of the parties of the location of the lines of their respective claims, which was important, taken in connection with other evidence respecting the building of fences on their claims by these parties and their neighbors.

The defendant asked the Court to give the jury the following instruction, which was refused: "If the jury do not find that there was two hundred dollars worth of improvements on the land claimed by plaintiff at the time of the pretended location, or prior to the institution of this suit, pertaining to the realty, the plaintiff cannot claim under the act; in this event, unless plaintiff had an actual possession thereof prior to defendant, they will find for the defendant." This is also assigned for error. The plaintiff's declaration was filed in the Recorder's office December 17th, 1860, and this action was commenced February 20th, 1861. The fourth section of the Possessory Act requires that, unless improvements to the value of two hundred dollars shall have been made prior to the recording, they must be put on within ninety days after the date of the record. Sec. 2 of the same act provides that "no person shall be entitled to maintain any such action for possession of or injury to any claim unless he or she occupy the same, and shall have complied with the provisions of the third and fourth sections of this act." The instruction is based upon the principle that these improvements must be made before the action is commenced—while the respondent contends that he had a right to show that they were put on or completed after that time, if done within the ninety days. We think the respondent is mistaken in his construction of the statute. The general rule is well settled, that the plaintiff must show a right to maintain the action at the commencement of the suit. He cannot commence his action while his right or title is imperfect or inchoate, and trust to completing or perfecting it before the trial takes place. The right of action in this case is founded upon the statute, and that imperatively requires that he "shall have complied" with this provision of section four before he shall be entitled to maintain the action. (Wright v. Whitesides, 15 Cal. 47; Sweetland v. Froe, 6 Id. 147.)

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Haynes v. Calderwood.

HAYNES v. CALDERWOOD et al.

WHERE an action has been commenced to quiet title to a tract of land and to remove a cloud therefrom caused by certain deeds on record, and a lis pendens has been filed, one who purchases from the defendant during the pendency of the action, and after the lis pendens is filed, is bound by the judgment rendered therein.

Gregory v. Haynes (18 Cal. 592 and Id. 21, 448) Affirmed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court. (In connection with this case, see Calderwood v. Tevis, 23 Cal. 335.)

David Calderwood, for Appellants.

R. C. & D. Rogers, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff, who is in the possession of the property in question, claiming to be the owner in fee, against the defendants, who are claiming an adverse title thereto, to quiet his title, and to remove the cloud therefrom caused by certain deeds on record, under which the defendants claim adversely. It appears that one Wenborn, whose title has since been conveyed to the plaintiff, on the thirteenth day of May, 1854, commenced an action in the District Court against one Boston and others, to quiet his title to the premises. On the same day, he filed and had recorded in the Recorder's office a notice of the pendency of the action, in accordance with the provisions of Sec. 27 of the Practice Act. The plaintiff in that suit recovered judgment, which is unreversed.

It seems that during the pendency of that action, on the third day of June, 1854, the defendants therein executed and delivered to one D. Calderwood their quitclaim deed of the premises, and various subsequent deeds were made by D. Calderwood and those claiming under him, which are the deeds sought to be canceled by this action, as being a cloud upon the plaintiff's title. The main question therefore is, whether or not the defendants had actual or constructive notice of the former suit of Wenborn v. Boston et al., for it is clear that if they had, they are bound by the judgment rendered therein; the title thus derived from the Bostons cannot be set up against the title of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff is entitled to relief, by having the deeds under the Bostons canceled for the purpose of removing the cloud upon his title created by them.

The validity, force, and effect of the decree in the suit of Wenborn v. Boston, and of the lis pendens filed in that action, were fully sustained by this Court in the cases of Gregory v. Haynes (13 Cal. 592 and 21 Id. 443), and we see no good reason for overruling the points decided in those cases. The same questions are brought before us by the appellants in this case. It is sufficient to say that we affirm the judgments in those cases on these points. The defendants cannot attack that judgment or attempt to retry the issues therein determined in this collateral action. This disposes of all the material points assigned as error by the appellants.

The judgment is affirmed.

 IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF S. L. REED.

R WAS the owner of a tract of land, and residing on the same. On the twenty-third of April, 1861, he married; and on the thirtieth day of March, 1862, died, leaving issue of the marriage, one child. He continued to reside on the land, with his family, up to the time of his death. No declaration of homestead had been filed prior to January 1st, 1862: held, that the failure to file a declaration of homestead, was a waiver of the homestead right as against the general creditors of deceased.

APPEAL from the Probate Court, Solano County.

The widow in this case did not claim the homestead as against the incumbrances on the land, but only as against the claim of the general creditors of the estate. The widow was married to the intestate on the twenty-third day of April, 1861; and the child was born February 6th, 1862. The other facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

John G. Hyer, for Appellant.

In Matter of Estate of Reed.

Sec. 2281 Wood's Digest, page 403, provides: "If there be no law in force exempting property from execution, the following shall be set aside for the use of the widow, or minor children, and shall not be subject to administration: The homestead, consisting of any quantity of land, not exceeding twenty acres, and the dwelling house thereon, with its appurtenances, not being included in any incorporated town, or city; or instead thereof, a quantity of land, not exceeding one lot, in any incorporated town or city, and the dwelling-house thereon, and its appurtenances, to be selected by the widow; or if there be no widow, to be designated by the Probate Judge; and not to exceed, in any case, more than $5,000 in value." Now, I claim, that this section means to set apart absolutely for the support and maintenance of a family, whether the same consist merely of a widow, or widow and minor child, or children, or minor child, in case he be an orphan, the estate described therein, and that nothing can defeat such claim or right. The Constitution, Art. 11, Sec. 15, also provides, that the Legislature shall protect, by law, from forced sale, a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all heads of families.

It is useless to argue, that the acts of the Legislature, defining how a homestead may be acquired, militate against this theory. It is not so. If the section of the statute cited, read, "property may be exempted," a contingency resting in the volition, and sometimes, nay, almost always, in the discretion or caprice of the husband, instead of reading as it does, "if there be no law in force exempting property, it shall be set aside," etc., i. e., above all contingency to preserve sacred to the widow and minor children, then a question might possibly arise under the Homestead Act, as at present in force.

H. H. Hartley, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

S. L. Reed died on the thirtieth of March, 1862, leaving his widow Mary Ann Reed, and one child, surviving him. J. L. Reed was appointed administrator of the estate, with the consent of the widow. The widow filed her petition in the Probate Court, setting forth the fact of their marriage; that they had lived together after their marriage, and until his death, on a certain tract of land, which is described, as their family residence; and praying that twenty acres of the land with the dwelling-house thereon, in which they resided, be set apart to her as a homestead. The creditors appeared and filed their written objections to the allowance of this claim to a homestead, on the ground: 1st, that no homestead had been selected, according to law, at the death of deceased, or at any time; 2d, that the homestead claim, if any there was, had been abandoned by the act of the parties in mortgaging the property; 3d, that the marriage of the petitioner and deceased, was subsequent to the twenty-eighth day of April, 1860, and to the contracting of the debts allowed against the estate; 4th, that the real estate was acquired by the deceased prior to the marriage, and was his separate property, and not subject to a homestead claim. On the first day of June, 1863, the Probate Court denied the application to set apart the homestead, from which the widow takes this appeal.

The amendments to the Homestead Law, passed in 1862 (Stat. of 1862, 521), extended the time for filing declarations of homestead to the first day of June, 1862, and provided as follows: "But from and after the said last mentioned day, no property shall be deemed a homestead, or be exempt from forced sale, under execution or other legal process, unless the declaration provided for in said act be made and filed for record according to law; provided, that the making or filing for record of such declaration shall not, in any case, or in any manner, affect or impair any alienation, sale, mortgage, or other contract, or lien, lawfully executed, or obtained prior to the time of the filing for record of such declaration." We find nothing in the record, showing that any declaration of homestead had been filed as required by this law within the time fixed by this statute. We find, copied into the transcript, a declaration of homestead, made by the petitioner, and filed, and recorded, on the sixteenth day of June, 1863, after the order appealed from was made. It cannot, therefore, avail the petitioner in this case. It is clear, that by the failure and neglect to file the declaration of homestead within the time fixed by this statute, the property could not be deemed or held as a homestead. The Court, therefore, did not err in denying the application to set apart the property.

The order is therefore affirmed.

HUSSEY v. McDERMOTT.

SEVERAL persons were owners of separate tracts of land within an outside fence, which formed a common inclosure; but the division lines of the separate tracts within the common inclosure were well known and defined, and each person cultivated his own tract, and that the general outside fence constituted as full and complete an actual possession in the owner of each separate tract, as though it had been inclosed by a lawful fence.

A and B, two of these owners, disposed of their tract to C. Soon after this, D, who was the owner of another tract within the inclosure, went on the tract sold to C and commenced plowing it. C went to D, took hold of his horses, and commenced turning them from the tract, when D drew a pistol, and aiming it at him threatened to hurt him if he did not leave. D continued plowing on the land: held, that the acts committed by D, clearly amounted to a forcible entry and detainer.

APPEAL from the County Court of the County of San Joaquin.

The land within the inclosure mentioned in the opinion was public land, and had been inclosed at the common expense of the parties claiming it for their mutual protection. The other facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

George W. Tyler, for Appellant.

Brown and Graves, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action of forcible entry and detainer. The facts relating to the matter in controversy do not seem to be disputed, and the main question is whether they show that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the action. It appears that the parties are the owners of separate tracts of land within an outside fence, which forms a common inclosure for several farms; but the division lines of the tract of each claimant are well known and defined, and each person cultivates his own tract within such boundary lines. The tract in controversy contains about thirty acres, and lies immediately north of the tract owned by the defendant; and the division line between this thirty-acre tract and the defendant's land is marked by a small ditch and embankment, about three feet high from the bottom of the ditch to the top of the bank. This thirty acres had been owned and cultivated by two brothers named Sperry, from 1857 to the Fall of 1861, when they exchanged with the plaintiff for other land owned by him. This exchange was made and the possession of the thirty acres delivered by the Sperrys to the plaintiff about two months before the commencement of this suit. About a month before this exchange was made with the plaintiff, the defendant applied to the Sperrys to purchase this thirty acres, or make an exchange for cattle; but they failed to come to any agreement.

A few days before the commencement of the suit, the plaintiff, and several others with him, went on this thirty-acre tract and found the defendant plowing there, and the plaintiff told the defendant that he was trespassing upon his land and wanted him to leave it. The defendant replied, that he should do no such thing; that he had a better right to it than the plaintiff. The plaintiff then took the horses by the bits, and commenced turning their heads in the direction of the defendant's house, and said to the defendant: "Let me show you how to plow a furrow off my land." As soon as the plaintiff did this, the defendant pulled out a six-shooter pistol, raised it up, pointed it at the plaintiff, and told him to let go those horses' bits or he would get hurt. They were then about twelve feet apart. The plaintiff then went off and left the defendant, who went on plowing the land. It seems that about six weeks after this occurrence, and while the suit was pending, the plaintiff attempted to plow the land, when the defendant came with a double-barreled shotgun, and drove him off; but after the defendant went away, the plaintiff commenced plowing again.

The respondent contends, that the plaintiff had not the actual possession of the land, at the time of the entry of the defendant; because the thirty acres were not inclosed by a separate fence, and the plaintiff had never cultivated the land. His possession was clearly sufficient to support this action. The evidence shows, that a separate fence was not necessary; that the general outside inclosure was sufficient for the protection of the crops. The land had been cultivated by the Sperrys, and that constituted as full and complete an actual possession as though it had been inclosed by a lawful fence. They had put the plaintiff in possession; and his possession was as full and ample as theirs. He went to cultivate the land as soon as the proper season had arrived, and was forcibly driven off by the defendant. This objection, therefore, has no force.

The acts of the defendant clearly constitute a forcible entry and detainer, within the statute on that subject, and entitled the plaintiff to bring and maintain this action. This is not a case where the evidence is conflicting, for the principal facts are not controverted. It is unnecessary to investigate the instructions given and refused by the Court, to which the plaintiff excepted, and to point out the errors committed by the Court therein. The verdict of the jury, and the judgment of the Court thereon, are clearly against the law and the evidence; and the Court erred in refusing the plaintiff a new trial.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF JAMES.

By the amendment to the Homestead Act of 1860, it seems to have been the intention of the Legislature, that the homestead, upon the death of either husband or wife, should descend to and vest absolutely in the survivor. But whether the act should receive this construction, or whether the homestead, upon the death of either husband or wife, descends to the survivor and the children, heirs of the deceased, and should be partitioned between them, are questions which the Probate Court has no jurisdiction to determine. The District Court of the county where the homestead is situated, is the only proper tribunal to hear and determine these questions.

APPEAL from the Probate Court of Santa Clara County.

The respondents, Sarah E. D. James and George H. C. James, were children of the intestate, by a former marriage, and were his only children. The homestead had been acquired after the marriage of the intestate with appellant, Mary M. James. The other facts appear in the opinion of the Court.

W. W. Crane, Jr., for Appellant.

The declaration of homestead, created a joint tenancy between Jeremiah C. James and appellant, and consequently, when he died she became vested, as survivor, with the whole fee. (Stat. 1860, 811, Sec. 1.) But if, on the contrary, appellant did not take the whole by right of survivorship, under the amendatory Act of 1860, she certainly is entitled to one-half of all the property, by virtue of her community rights; and one-third of the remainder, by virtue of the Statute of Descents and Distributions. It follows, that the Probate Court of Santa Clara County clearly committed error in awarding one-half of all the property to the petitioners, Geo. H. C. and Sarah E. D. James. (Wood's Dig. 423, Sec. 1; Id. 424. Sec. 10; Knox v. Beard, 5 Cal. 252; Estate of Buchanan, 8 Id. 507; Scott v. Ward, 13 Id. 468; Payne v. Payne, 18 Id. 291.)

James & Lane, for Respondents.

On the death of the intestate, the property, both real and personal, immediately descends to the heir, subject only to the lien of the administrator, for the payment of debts. (7 Cal. 215.)

Four months after the appointment of administrator, the heir has the right to apply to the Probate Court for a distribution of his interest in the estate. (Stat. 1861, 648, Sec. 85.) A partition is the necessary incident to the distribution, and is provided for by law. (Stat. 1861, 648, Sec. 89.) Unless there is some special statutory provision to prevent, it will not be denied but that the property in dispute, both real and personal, descends in equal proportions to the appellant.

It is claimed, on the part of the appellant, that by filing the declaration of homestead, the law of descent became entirely changed, and the right of inheritance by the children of the deceased became entirely obliterated; and the title of the property became, and now is absolutely vested in the appellant. The law of 1860 was not intended to, nor did it, in any manner, change the law of descent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

Jeremiah C. James, husband of the appellant, and father of the respondents, died intestate, February 2d, 1862. Previous to, and at the time of his death, his children, the respondents, resided in the State of New York. The premises in controversy were the common property of the intestate and his wife, and occupied by them as a homestead. During the lifetime of the intestate, in April, 1860, his wife, the appellant, filed a declaration of homestead, in accordance with the statute then in force. Soon after the death of the intestate, the appellant was appointed administratrix of the estate, and on the ninth of July, 1862, upon her application, the Probate Court set apart to her use, as the family of the intestate, the homestead and certain personal property. Afterwards, the respondents filed their petition in the Probate Court, praying for a partition of the property thus set apart to the widow, they claiming the undivided one-half, or one-quarter to each, as the descendants and heirs of the intestate. The application was opposed by the appellant; but the Probate Court granted the prayer of the respondents, from which decree she takes this appeal.

The property was set apart to the use of the family of the deceased, in accordance with the provisions of Sec. 34, of the Act of 1861, amending Sec. 121 of the Probate Practice Act, which reads as follows: "Upon the return of the inventory, or at any subsequent time, during the administration, the Court, or Probate Judge, may, of his own motion or on application, set apart for the use of the family of the deceased, all personal property which is by law exempt from execution, and the homestead, as designated by the general Homestead Law, or by Sec. 124 of this Act." (Stat. 1861, 636.) Sec. 124 (Wood's Dig. 403), defines what personal property and homestead shall be thus set apart. Sec. 125 provides to whom such property, thus set apart, shall belong. But since the date of this law, the Legislature, in 1860, amended the Homestead Law, and among other things provided that "from and after the filing for record of said declaration, the husband and wife shall be deemed to hold said homestead as joint tenants; and all homesteads heretofore appropriated and acquired by husband and wife, shall be deemed to be held by such husband and wife in joint tenancy." (Stat. 1860, 311.) The distinguishing incident of a title by joint tenancy is, that the entire tenancy, or estate, upon the death of one of the joint tenants, goes to the survivor, and vests in him, absolutely. (4 Kent's Com. 398.) It would seem from this statute, that it was the intention of the Legislature that the homestead should vest in the surviving husband or wife, absolutely, and not descend to the heirs of either.

But the appellant contends, that the Probate Court has no jurisdiction of this proceeding, instituted by the respondents. It was held by this Court, In the Matter of Tompkins' Estate (12 Cal. 114), that the homestead does not constitute any part of the assets of the estate of the deceased husband or wife; that upon the death of the head of the family it is made the duty of the Probate Court to set apart the homestead for the benefit of the family of the deceased; and after this is done, the Court has no further control over it. It was further held, that what the rights of the surviving wife were, in and to the homestead, was a question to which the jurisdiction of the Probate Court did not extend. We think the Probate Court is not the proper tribunal to litigate questions, or afford the relief asked, in this case; that a proper action should have been brought in the District Court, of the proper county, where the homestead is situated, which has full power and authority to hear and determine the questions involved, and to afford such relief (if any) as the parties may be entitled to.

The order and decree of the Probate Court is therefore reversed, and the petition of the respondents is dismissed.

SPENCER v. DOANE et al.

In a civil action, a party cannot raise the objection for the first time in the Supreme Court, that the jury before which the cause was tried in the Court below, was not duly selected and summoned as required by law. To enable a party to avail himself of such objection, it must be made in the Court below.

Spencer v. Doane.

Newly-discovered evidence, which is merely cumulative, affords no ground for a new trial.

It is not error for the Court to exclude affidavits, filed on a motion for a new trial, which are written in a foreign language.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

On the twenty-third day of August, 1861, a decree was rendered in the Fourth District Court, on the petition of Alta Gracia Carlos, divorcing her from her husband, Fernando Carlos. The decree further adjudged two-thirds of the community property to the plaintiff, and one-third to the defendant, and provided for other proceedings touching its distribution, among which was the appointment of Spencer, the plaintiff in this action, receiver.

On the twenty-second day of April, 1861, Pierce, one of defendants, commenced an action against Fernando Carlos, in the Fourth District Court, on a note of one thousand dollars, and procured an attachment to issue, by virtue of which defendant Doane, as Sheriff, levied on the personal property of said Fernando.

This action was brought by Spencer, as receiver, to recover the value of the property attached. The plaintiff claimed that the note was given by Fernando Carlos to Pierce, without consideration, and for the purpose of defrauding the wife.

Wm. W. Chipman, for Appellant.

Cook & Hittell and Charles McC. Delany, for Respondents.

CROOKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff, as receiver in the divorce case of Carlos v. Carlos, to recover the value of certain personal property alleged to have been taken and converted by the defendants. The latter justify the taking under an attachment issued in an action brought by the defendant Pierce, against the husband in the divorce suit.

The first error assigned is, that the jury were not duly selected and summoned as required by law. It is a sufficient answer to say that no objection of this kind was made by the appellant at the time of the trial. The record states that the "jury were duly impaneled, accepted, and sworn." It is further contended that the jury made a mistake in their verdict. The verdict is a general one in favor of the defendant. We are unable to understand, from the brief of the counsel or from the record, wherein this alleged mistake consists, unless it be that they were mistaken in finding for the defendant instead of the plaintiff. Another assignment of error is accident or surprise, caused by an alleged mistake made by some of the defendants' witnesses. We do not see anything in the record which would justify us in setting aside the verdict and judgment on these grounds. (Taylor v. California Stage Company, 6 Cal. 228; Patterson v. Ely, 19 Id. 29.)

Another ground for a new trial urged by appellant, is newly-discovered evidence. This new evidence is all cumulative, and upon the same points to which the witnesses of the plaintiff testified on the trial. In such case it affords, as a general rule, no ground for a new trial—as has been repeatedly decided by this Court. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. There is much evidence to sustain the verdict, and the Court below, who heard it all, deemed it sufficient; and this Court will not, therefore, disturb the verdict on that ground.

The next point is, that the Court erred in refusing certain instructions asked by the plaintiff. These instructions are predicated upon the idea that the alleged antedating of the note given by Carlos to Pierce, was a fraud upon the plaintiff, or Carlos' wife, which vitiated the note and formed sufficient ground for a verdict for the plaintiff. The Court gave several of the instructions asked by the plaintiff, which embraced all the points the plaintiff was entitled to in those refused; and it is evident, therefore, that the plaintiff suffered no injury by this action of the Court. So, too, in regard to the action of this Court in excluding affidavits on the motion for a new trial, written in a foreign language. If they had been admitted, they would have been of no benefit to the plaintiff on his motion; and he has therefore suffered no injury by their exclusion. After a careful examination of the points raised by the appellant, we see no grounds for reversing the judgment or granting a new trial.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Moss v. Mayo.

MOSS v. MAYO.

WHERE property has been assessed to an unknown owner and sold for the tax, and a deed executed to the purchaser, the fact that the agent of the owner of the lot paid the tax on the wrong lot by mistake, is not such a mistake as a Court of Equity will relieve against.

Under the Act of April 3d, 1860, "Providing for the collection of Delinquent Taxes in the City and County of Sacramento," where several lots are assessed to unknown owners by fictitious names, and suits are instituted for the collection of the several taxes, there is no valid objection to having one affidavit for, and one order of publication of summons, apply to the several cases. In such case, the publication of one summons gives the Court jurisdiction in each case.

In such case a judgment rendered becomes a lien only on the property of the persons against whom it is rendered; and where no judgment is rendered either against the real owner by name or the fictitious person representing such real owner, a Court of Equity will enjoin the purchaser from dispossessing the real owner by a writ of assistance obtained under the tax deed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Winans & Hyer, for Appellant.

D. W. Welty, for Respondent.

On petition for rehearing, which was denied, respondent's counsel filed the following argument:

The view taken by the Court appears to have been, that to authorize the sale of property for delinquent taxes against unknown owners, they must not only be represented on the record by a fictitious name, but also that formal judgment must be rendered against them under said fictitious name; and following out that theory, the Court held, that because the plaintiff in this case, the real claimant of the property, was not bound by a formal judgment, the sale was a nullity, as far as her rights in the premises were concerned.

We think an examination of the entire statute will show that such was not the intention of the Legislature in framing the act, and that it in terms does not require a formal judgment to bind the property, but merely that all parties known should be before the Court by real names, and all unknown by a fictitious name; and then, after proper notice given, that a decree against the property should be made. The statute will be found in Statutes of 1860, 139-141. In the first section it legalizes certain assessments and renders them binding, both in law and equity, against the persons and property assessed.

Here, it will be observed, a special lien is created upon the property, regardless of the ownership thereof, and it is bound for the payment of the taxes.

The second section prescribes the form of complaint to be filed, and the defense permitted.

The third section provides that certified copies of entries of the assessment rolls, showing unpaid taxes against any person or property, shall be evidence, etc.; thus again recognizing most clearly the difference between a personal assessment and one against the property merely.

The fourth section enacts that judgments rendered in such cases shall become liens (from Justices' Courts) in like manner as judgments rendered in the District Court under that act; that is, become liens upon all property of the defendants liable to taxation, and may be enforced against the same.

Now the Court in reviewing this section seems to have held, that the only effect of a payment rendered under this act was to give a lien on the property of the defendants in the suit, and that only from the time of docketing the judgment — and that before that time, i. e., the rendition of the judgment, there was no lien.

Now we understand the statute differently. We contend that the statute make the tax a lien on the real estate, and that this section only enlarged the lien — that is, gave a judgment which operated not only as a lien upon the specific real estate bound for the tax, but also upon all the other property of the defaulting taxpayer. If this be so, then the only penalty attached to the want of taking a formal judgment against either the real or fictitious defendants would be, that the plaintiff would fail to obtain a general lien on all his other property; but we contend that if the record shows a decree, judgment, or other judicial determination of the amount of delinquency, fact of nonpayment, and the proper parties were before the Court—it was competent for the Court to order the property sold; and a sale of it passed the title to the purchaser thereat.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

The defendant was a purchaser of a certain lot in the City of Sacramento owned by the plaintiff, at a Sheriff's sale, under a judgment rendered for taxes against certain persons, not including the plaintiff (the lot being assessed to "unknown owners"). He obtained a Sheriff's deed under his purchase, and also a writ of assistance to be put in possession of the property. The plaintiff then brought this suit to enjoin him from enforcing the writ of assistance, averring that she resided in the City of San Francisco, and her agent at Sacramento had by mistake paid taxes on another lot that she did not own, instead of this one which she did own; that she had no notice of the tax suit or the proceedings under it, and that no summons had been served according to law in that suit to give the Justice of the Peace who rendered the judgment jurisdiction of the action. She avers readiness to pay to the plaintiff all expense that he has incurred, upon his releasing the claim. The Court denied the injunction; sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and rendered a judgment for the defendant, from which order and judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The suit before the Justice for the delinquent taxes was brought in the name of "The People of the State of California v. John Doe 232, M. A. Parker et al.," and was commenced June 22d, 1861. An affidavit was made and filed by D. C. Thomas, who styled himself one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, in which several suits for taxes are described, including the one under consideration; in which it is stated that the property described in the several suits was assessed to unknown owners; that neither the plaintiff nor their attorneys knew the true owners of any of the several tracts, or their places of residence, and therefore the fictitious name of John Doe had been used as an alias for the true owner; and that he had been informed and believed that those whose true names are mentioned in the several actions were the true owners, or had an interest in the property named in the suits in which they were made parties. The Justice thereupon entered a general order in his docket in the form of a summons directed to the persons therein-after named, and to all owners and claimants, known and unknown, of any of the lands thereafter described; and after reciting that Cornelius Cole, District Attorney of the County, had filed divers complaints in his Court to recover the taxes levied upon property in the City of Sacramento and assessed to unknown owners, and asking for a decree and order to sell the premises described in said complaints to satisfy said tax lien; referring to the original complaints on file, there followed a description referring to the several suits, that relating to the one under consideration being as follows: "For $29.44 against John Doe 232, Mary A. Parker, Catherine M. Hardenbergh, and the north seventeen feet of lot No. 6, between N and O, and Front and Second streets." The order then recites the affidavit made by Thomas, and states that by virtue and in pursuance of the provisions of the sixth section of an act passed April 3d, 1860, for the collection of delinquent taxes, the defendants named in the several suits, and all owners and claimants, known and unknown, and each of said tracts of land, were thereby summoned to appear before the Justice at a certain day therein named, to answer to the plaintiff, who sues to recover from them the sums mentioned in connection with their names, and for a decree and sale of their interest in the property to satisfy the lien for taxes; and that if they failed to appear and answer, the plaintiff would take a judgment against them as prayed for in the complaints on file in his office. The Justice further ordered and directed that summons in said causes be served by publishing the whole of this order one time per week for three months in the Daily Bee, a newspaper published in said county. This whole order was published in the Bee as provided for, which was all the service of summons in the case, and judgment was rendered thereon in favor of the plaintiff, on the day named, under which judgment the defendant purchased.

The sixth section of the act under which this tax suit was brought provides, that if the name of the owner of the property be unknown, or it has been assessed to an unknown owner, the person liable to pay the taxes may be sued by a fictitious name, and the summons be served in such manner as the Court may direct, and that the deed derived from the sale of such property shall be equally conclusive against the true owner as if the action had been prosecuted against him by his real name. And Sec. 5 provides that "any deed derived from a sale of real property under this act shall be conclusive evidence of title, except as against actual frauds, or prepayment of the taxes, and shall entitle the holder thereof to a writ of assistance from the District Court to obtain possession of such property."

In this case it is not alleged that there was any fraud, or that the taxes had ever been paid — but it is urged that the plaintiff's agent acted under a mistake in paying the taxes upon the wrong lot, and that she is therefore entitled to relief in equity. It is clear, however, that this is not such a mistake as a Court of Equity will relieve against. It is further urged that the judgment under which the sale was made was void, on the ground that the summons was not served by publication or otherwise, as required by the Practice Act, and that the affidavit of Thomas is not sufficient under the same act. It is true, that the statute under which the judgment was rendered provides that the Civil Practice Act, "so far as the same is not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, is hereby made applicable to proceedings under this act;" and it is also true, that the affidavit is not such, nor was the summons served, as is required by the Practice Act. But this was not necessary, as this matter of the service of summons in cases like the present, where the property was assessed to unknown owners, was provided for in the sixth section of the act, which governed and controlled the action of the Court upon this subject. We see no valid objection to the manner in which one affidavit and one general order of service of summons was made to apply to several cases. The statute does not require that a special order upon this subject should be made in each case. No person was injured by making one order apply to numerous cases; and the order referred to stated all the material facts relative to each separate action that were necessary to identify the action, its subject matter, and the names of the parties and the relief prayed for. The order was clearly in accordance with the provisions of the sixth section of the act in question. The time allowed for publication of summons was sufficiently liberal, and was in all respects reasonable.

The statute under which these proceedings were had provides that the judgment for delinquent taxes, when properly docketed in the Clerk's office, shall "become liens upon all property of the defendants liable to taxation," and the lien is not limited to the particular property on which the taxes accrued. It is made a lien upon the property of the defendants against whom the judgment is rendered, but no others. The judgment in this case is, that the "plaintiffs do have and recover from defendants, Mary A. Parker and Catherine M. Hardenbergh, the sum of $37.01, together with $19.80 costs, and that if the same is not paid, all the right, title, and interest of each of said defendants, and of John Doe 232, representing all other owners or claimants of, in, and to the property described in the complaint, to wit: the north seventeen feet of lot No. 6, between N and O, and Front and Second streets, in the City of Sacramento, to be sold to pay the same and discharge the liens plaintiff held for the taxes levied thereon and sued for." It will be seen that there is no personal judgment against any person except Mary A. Parker and Catherine M. Hardenbergh, and the docketing of the judgment only made the same a lien upon their property. A deed made in pursuance of a sale under this judgment would only convey such interest as they may have had in the premises at the date of the docketing of the judgment. The title of the plaintiff in this action, or her possession, or right of possession, cannot be affected by such deed, because she is not one of the defendants to the action by her own proper name, and there is no judgment for the recovery of the taxes sued for against "John Doe 232," the fictitious name used to represent her as the real owner. The defendant has the right, under his writ of assistance, only to dispossess the persons against whom the judgment for the taxes was rendered, and not the plaintiff. It appears that he was about to dispossess the plaintiff by virtue of the writ, which he had no right to do, and she was entitled to an injunction to restrain him from dispossessing her. It follows that the Court erred in refusing the writ and dismissing the action.

The judgment of the Court below is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

Griggs v. Clark.

GRIGGS, ADMINISTRATOR OF THE ESTATE OF CLARK, v. CLARK et al.

THE jurisdiction of the Probate Courts over the estates of deceased persons, does not divest the District Courts of their general jurisdiction as Courts of Chancery, over actions for a settlement of the affairs of a partnership.

In the absence of any special agreement between partners upon the subject, the rule of law is, that partners are to share equally both profits and losses; and the mere fact that partners have put unequal amounts of capital into the common stock, or that one has put in all the capital, and the others only their skill and industry, will make no difference in the rule.

As a general rule, it is the duty of each partner, during the partnership, to devote himself to the interests of the concern without compensation, unless there is an express agreement that he receive compensation. But when the partnership is dissolved by death, and the survivor expends his time and labor in the care and management of the partnership property, by which its value is enhanced, he should receive compensation for the same, to be deducted out of the profits realised from the enhanced value of the property. A surviving partner, however, is not entitled to pay for services rendered, for merely winding up the affairs of the concern.

When a bill is filed to settle the affairs of a partnership, the partnership transactions of each and all the partners should be taken into account; and the decree should include all these, so as to leave nothing open for future litigation.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Shattuck, Spencer, & Reichert, for Appellants.

The complaint does not contain facts which constitute a cause of action; and the demurrer should have been sustained. It shows defendants surviving partners by law; they alone could settle the partnership. (Wood's Dig. 411, Art. 2317, Sec. 198.) And they could only be sued when they had abused their trust; but the complaint charges no facts showing abuse. (Story on Part. Secs. 344-346; Collyer on Part. Sec. 129; 3 Kent's Com. 37; Evans v. Evans, 9 Paige, 178.) And having commenced in the Probate Court, he should have continued there. (Blanton v. King, 2 How., Miss., 861; Carmeischel v. Brawder, 3 Id. 252; Kimball v. Kimball, 19 Ver. 579.)

Wm. Ross and R. Robinson, for Respondent.

BALDWIN, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—COPE, J. concurring.

It seems to us that the report of the referee, and the consequent judgment of the Court, is erroneous in this: That it decrees that the defendants, as surviving partners, are liable for the full amount found to be due of assets collected, or in the hands of these survivors, without regard to the indebtedness of some $7,500 found to be due in Missouri, on account of the firm operations. We understand that the partnership was formed in Missouri, and comprehended, as well transactions in that State, as in this; and a full settlement should involve and conclude as well transactions there as here. The administrator of the deceased partner, therefore, is not entitled to a decree, irrespective of the firm debts there; and the survivors would seem to be entitled to retain in their own hands, money, or assets, sufficient to pay this indebtedness, whether due in Missouri, or on contracts made there or here. But if we are mistaken in this, it is obvious that the report of the referee, which seems to be the whole predicate of the decree of the District Court, does not furnish any ground for such decree; for the referee says that it is impossible for him to ascertain the true state of the accounts, or make a full settlement in this respect, in the absence of information as to the amount of the Missouri debts, or by whom they were paid.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

A rehearing was granted, and after reargument, CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action in the nature of a suit in equity, brought by the administrator of William T. Clark, deceased, who in his lifetime was in partnership with the defendants, in the purchase of cattle in the State of Missouri, and their sale in this State, for a settlement of the affairs of the partnership. The case was sent to a referee for trial, upon whose report a judgment was duly entered, from which the defendants appeal.

Griggs v. Clark.

The defendants demurred to the complaint; the Court below overruled the same, and this is assigned for error. It is contended, that the Probate Court, in which the proceedings for the settlement of the estate were pending, had acquired jurisdiction of the subject matter of the present action; and therefore the demurrer should have been sustained. The jurisdiction vested in the Probate Court does not divest the District Courts of their general jurisdiction as Courts of Chancery over actions of this character, as has been held by this Court. (Wilson v. Roach, 4 Cal. 362; Clark v. Perry, 5 Id. 58.)

It seems, that the amount of capital invested by each of the partners in the partnership business, was very unequal. The defendants claimed that each partner was entitled to an interest in the partnership property, and the profits of the business, in proportion to the amount of capital put in, and not in equal proportions; and when called upon by the administrator before the commencement of the action to settle and account for the partnership property and profits, they expressed themselves willing to settle and account upon that basis; but not upon the basis of an equal division. The administrator, on the other hand, claimed that the division should be in equal proportions; and as they refused to settle in that manner, he brought this action. The referee found, upon this point, in favor of the plaintiff; and this is sufficient to show that the defendants were in default, and that the plaintiff had a right to commence and maintain the action.

But the defendants contend that the referee erred in finding that the parties were to share the profits equally. In the absence of any special agreement between the partners upon the subject, the rule of law is, that the partners are to share equally of both profits and losses; and the mere fact that the partners have put an unequal amount of capital into the common stock, or that one has put in all the capital, and the others only their skill and industry, will make no difference in the rule. (Story on Part. Sec. 24; 3 Kent, 28.) The evidence as to whether there was any special agreement between the partners in this case, which would take the case out of this general rule, was conflicting; and under the circumstances, we are not disposed to disturb the finding of the referee upon this point.

Griggs v. Clark.

It appears that the time of the decease of the plaintiff's intestate was not the most advantageous period for the sale of the partnership stock of cattle then on hand, and the defendants did not sell the same until about a year afterward, during which time they increased in value about $6,000; and the referee found that the services of the partner who had charge of the stock during that time were worth the sum of $1,400. The referee held that the plaintiff was entitled to the share of his intestate in this increase, without any deduction therefrom of any sum for the services thus rendered by the surviving partner; and this is assigned as error. As a general rule, during the existence of the partnership, it is the duty of each partner to devote himself to the interests of the concern, and promote by his labor and skill the common benefit of the partnership, without any reward or compensation, unless there is an express stipulation to that effect. (Coll. on Part. Sec. 183; Story on Part. Sec. 182.) But when the partnership has been carried on for some time after a dissolution by death, and such continuance has proved beneficial to the parties, it is but just and proper that the surviving partner should receive a reasonable allowance for his skill and industry in conducting the business, for during that time the business has not received the care and labor of the deceased partner, as an equivalent for such services. While all the parties are living, each is under obligation to devote his time and services to the partnership business, and there is therefore good reason for holding that neither should receive a compensation for such services. But when, in consequence of the death of one partner, this equality no longer exists, it is but equitable that the surviving partner should be compensated for such services as he may have rendered in the business after the death of the deceased partner, to be deducted out of the profits realized by the continuance of the business; and the overplus of such profits, after deducting such compensation, to be divided between the partners. (Story on Part. Sec. 343 and notes; Coll. on Part. Sec. 328; Gow. Part. 354.) We do not wish to be understood, however, as holding that the surviving partner is entitled to compensation merely for services rendered in winding up the affairs of the firm (Beatty v. Wray, 19 Penn. 516), but to confine it to a case like the present, where the partnership business has been continued for a considerable period of time in order that the affairs of the partnership may be advantageously wound up. In the present case, the referee should have deducted the value of these services of the surviving partner, as found by him, so that the interest or share of plaintiff's intestate should bear its proportion thereof in the settlement of the business.

The deceased partner resided in California, and a large portion of the partnership business, especially that relating to the keeping and sale of the stock in this State, was conducted by him during his lifetime, during which he received and expended more or less money in and about the partnership business. In making up the account, the referee seems to have omitted these transactions of the deceased partner, and this is also assigned for error. It is clear that these transactions formed a material part of the account to be taken. The referee had no right to confine his account to the transactions of two only of the three partners. The whole of the subject matter in controversy between the parties, which included all the partnership transactions of each and all the partners, is the subject of the adjudication, and the account and decree must include all these matters and leave nothing open for future litigation or controversy. Equity will not adjudicate causes by piecemeal.

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded.

KILÉ & THOMPSON v. TUBBS.

The general rule is, that where a party enters, in good faith, upon a tract of land with color of title, under a deed purporting to convey the tract with specific boundaries, no person being in the adverse possession at the time, and he takes and holds actual possession of a part, bona fide, claiming title and possession of the whole tract described in the deed; he is deemed to have possession of the whole tract within the boundaries of the deed. This rule, however, cannot be held to apply to a case where a person in possession of a small tract, makes a conveyance of a large tract greatly exceeding his actual possession, when he has no color of title beyond his possession.

The State of California has no right to sell lands within her limits, to which she has no present or prospective title, by grant from the United States.

Kille v. Tubbs.

Whether this State has an inchoate title to lands, within her limits, called Swamp lands, depends entirely upon the question, whether they are Swamp lands, within the meaning of the Act of Congress of September 28th, 1850. The State of California does not acquire a legal title to the swamp lands within her limits, until they have been certified to the State by the General Land Office, and a patent issued to the State therefor by the United States.

If this State sells lands as swamp and overflowed, before the United States has issued its patent to the State therefor, the patent from the State has no other legal force except as a quitclaim from the State to the grantee of whatever interest or title the State may have to the lands therein described.

If the grantee, in a patent issued by this State, for land sold as swamp and overflowed, before the United States has issued to the State a patent therefor, bring an action to recover possession of the land, by virtue of his patent; and the defendant brings himself, in privity, with the source of paramount title, to wit: the United States, either as a preëmptioner under the laws of the United States, or otherwise, he has a right to show in evidence on the trial, that the land described in the patent is not swamp and overflowed, within the meaning of the Act of Congress; and if such shall appear to be the fact, plaintiff cannot recover.

The decision in the case of Dell v. Meador (16 Cal. 285) does not apply to lands sold and patented by the State as swamp and overflowed lands.

A had a house, corral, garden, and orchard on a tract of eighty acres of land, and claimed possession of the entire tract; but his actual possession did not extend beyond his improvements. B afterwards inclosed the entire tract with a fence, and put another house thereon. A then brought an action against B, to recover possession of the entire tract, and the defendant recovered judgment: Held, that the judgment was erroneous in this, that A was entitled to judgment for the house, corral, garden, and orchard, of which he had the prior actual possession.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellant.

It is a well-settled doctrine, that when an entry is made by one, under color of title, by a deed, his possession is deemed to extend to the bounds of that deed — though his actual settlement and improvements were on a small parcel of the tract. In such a case, where there is no adverse possession, the law construes the entry to be coextensive with the grant to the party, on the ground, "that it is his clear intention to assert such possession." (Elliott v. Pearl, 10 Peters, 443; Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. 222, 223; Fox v. Hus- ton, 4 Bibb. 559; Thomas v. Harran, Id. 563; and other authorities quoted in Elliott v. Pearl.) In Prescott et al. v. Nevers et al. (4 Mason, 330), Judge Story says: "I take the principle of law to be clear, that when a person enters into land, under a claim of title thereto, by a recorded deed, his entry and possession are referred to such title; and he is deemed to have a seizure of the land coextensive with the boundaries stated in his deed, when there is no adverse possession."

Kille v. Tubbs.

The plaintiffs had a patent from the State of California, for the land sued for. Defendant was a mere naked trespasser, having neither title nor pretense of title, unless the quitclaim deed from DeVries is so called. He was in no condition to contest the patent from the State to plaintiffs. This point is fully decided by this Court in the case of Doll v. Meador (16 Cal. 330, 331).

Budd and Carr, for Respondent.

The introduction of evidence, by defendant, as to the condition and character of the land, was not error. Such evidence does not attack the patent either directly or collaterally.

The patent is valid, and conveys to the plaintiff whatever right the State may have had in the land, and no more; and if the State had none, it conveyed none, and did not profess to convey any. The Statute of April 21st, 1858, 200, Sec. 7, expressly declares, that a patent issued for swamp lands shall not have any other legal effect or force than a quit claim of all right, title, and interest on the part of the State.

The case of Doll v. Meador (16 Cal. 295) was in relation to a patent issued under the act of the Legislature, for the disposal of the 500,000 acres granted by Congress to this State. There are between that case and this, the following important distinctions:

1st. The patent in that case conveyed the title in fee simple. (Act of 1859, Sec. 4, Chap. 313.) In this, it is but a quitclaim of the title of the State, if any she had. (Stat. 1859, 200, Sec. 7.)

2d. In that case, the land had been granted to the State, and was to be selected by the State, under State laws. (Act of Congress, Sept. 4th, 1841.) In this, swamp and overflowed lands had been granted to the State, to be segregated under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, a United States officer. (Act of Congress, Sept. 28th, 1850.)

3d. In that case, the land had been selected for the State of California, by State officials, and the selection had been approved by the register and receiver of the United States land office. (Stat. 1859, Chap. 313.) In this, the selection of the land as swamp and overflowed, was made by the purchaser, and not by any State or United States official. (Stat. 1858, Chap. 235.)

4th. In that, a tribunal decided before the issuing of the patent on notice to all claimants, that the plaintiff was entitled to the patent. (Stat. 1859, Sec. 3, Chap. 313.) In this, no officer of the government, State or National, decided, judicially or otherwise, that the land was swamp and overflowed land. The acts of the State officials were merely ministerial, and even the discretion given to the Governor by the Act of 1858, Sec. 7, was taken away by the proviso of the Act of 1861, 252.

“If the land be not swamp and overflowed land, then the United States neither conveyed nor attempted to convey the same to the State. Respondent does not attack the patent, nor the action of the officers in issuing it. The patent is regular and regularly issued; but unless the land is swamp and overflowed land, the patent conveyed nothing; the State had nothing to convey. (Summers v. Dickenson, 9 Cal. 555; Patterson v. Winn, 11 Wheat. 380.)

The case of Doll v. Meador (16 Cal.) decides that a person having a mere naked possession, cannot attack directly or collaterally a conveyance, or attempted conveyance of land, made or attempted to be made by the sovereignty possessing the eminent domain. But, in this case, the United States, the sovereignty possessing the eminent domain, neither granted, nor attempted to grant, the land in controversy, unless it were swamp and overflowed land; neither did the State attempt to convey any greater interest than the State may have had. The ancient doctrine, as to the effect of a patent from the sovereign, does not apply to the patent under consideration. (Summers v. Dickenson, 9 Cal. 555.)

Plaintiffs do not claim that the State held the land in controversy, by right of eminent domain, but by grant from the United States; and it is difficult to see how the State could have had any greater rights under the grant than any other grantee would have had.

The jury decided, not that no grant to the State had been made, but that the land was not within the calls of the grant. If the State took no greater rights, under the grant from the United States, than a private person would have done, then a segregation or survey made by the State, gave the State no rights. (Smith v. United States, 10 Peters, 335.)

Had the State brought suit for the land, the respondent could have shown that the land was not within the calls of the grant from the United States. And how can a grantee from the State by patent, conveying merely a quitclaim of the right of the State to the land, acquire by such patent, any greater rights than the State itself possessed?

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of eighty acres of land. The evidence shows that in 1859, one Stayton had a house, corral, orchard, and garden, on the tract in dispute, and resided in the house with his family, claiming a large tract of three hundred and twenty acres, which included the eighty acres in controversy. On the fourth day of April, 1859, while thus in possession, he with his wife executed and delivered a deed to one John Thompson, conveying to him the whole three hundred and twenty acres, and delivered the possession to the latter; and the present plaintiffs claim under Thompson, as also under a patent issued to them under the statutes of the State relating to swamp lands. On the first day of March, 1861, Kile, one of the plaintiffs, leased the premises to one Gilmore, who occupied the house and grounds under the lease, until a short time before the commencement of this suit. It seems that the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claim, inclosed all of the three hundred and twenty-acre tract, except the eighty acres in controversy, and all the actual possession they had of that was the house, corral, orchard, and garden. But they claim to have had the constructive possession of the whole under the deed from Stayton, and under the swamp land certificate and patent. They claim to own the title in fee under the patent.

It seems that one Devries claimed some interest in the tract, under an unlocated Mexican grant; and he and the plaintiff Kile entered into an arrangement by which it was agreed, that he was to have the land if it should be included in the final survey of the grant; if not, Kile was to have it under his swamp land claim. Under this arrangement, Devries claimed to be in possession. The final survey of the grant, made in 1859, did not, however, include the land. Devries built a fence around the eighty acres in controversy, and furnished lumber to put another small house on it. He made several attempts to get possession of the old house and improvements, but failed. He conveyed his claim to the premises, to the defendant, November 2d, 1861; and one Medlin, also, made a conveyance to the latter, dated November 15th, 1861; and he went into the new house — built, it seems, by Medlin — with the lumber furnished by Devries. Defendant claimed also to hold the land as a preëmptioner, under the United States law.

At the trial, the plaintiff asked the Court to give the following instruction: "That a party entering upon land, under a deed describing it by metes and bounds — although he actually inclose or occupy only a small portion — is, in contemplation of law, in possession of the whole tract described in the deed; and if the jury believe that John Thompson entered upon the tract of land described in the complaint, under a deed from Stayton — intending to take possession of the whole tract — he was in possession of the whole, though he actually occupied but a portion; and if Thompson transferred his right and possession to plaintiffs, they, entering under such transfer, were in possession of the whole tract transferred, whether the transfer was by proper deed, or an assignment of a certificate of purchase." The Court refused to give the instruction, and this is assigned as error. The general rule seems to be, that where a party enters, in good faith, upon land, with color of title, under a deed purporting to convey the land with specific boundaries — no person being in the adverse possession at the time — and he takes and holds actual possession of a part, bona fide, claiming title and possession of the whole tract described in the deed, he is to be deemed to have the possession of the whole tract within the boundaries of the deed. In other words: in such case, his possession is held to be coextensive with his deed. (Rose v. Davis, 11 Cal. 133; Baldwin v. Simpson, 12 Id. 500; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Id. 591; Elliott v. Pearl, 10 Pet. 443; Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. 222; Prescott v. Nevers, 4 Mason, 330; Keam v. Cannovan, 21 Cal. 299.) This rule, however, cannot be held to apply to a case where a person in the possession of a small tract—the usual size of a farm—makes a conveyance of a large tract, greatly exceeding his actual possession, when he has no color of title beyond his possession. The right of possession cannot be extended by any such means. The instruction asked by the plaintiff does not state the rule upon this subject with that clearness and accuracy requisite in cases of this kind; and we would not, therefore, be justified in reversing the judgment because it was refused.

At the trial the plaintiffs introduced in evidence the patent from the State, issued under the statutes relating to swamp and overflowed lands. The defendant proved that nearly all of the tract in controversy was dry, arable land, well fitted for cultivation. The Court gave the following instruction asked for by the defendant: "If the land is not swamp and overflowed land, within the meaning of said act, then the plaintiffs acquired no right to the land by virtue of the patent from the State." There was no evidence that the land had ever been certified to the State, or any patent issued therefor from the United States, or from the General Land Office, as swamp land or otherwise. The plaintiff contends that the Court erred in giving this instruction, in admitting the evidence, and in overruling the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against law and evidence. He contends that the decision of this Court in the case of Doll v. Meador (16 Cal. 295) fully determines this point in his favor.

The patent in that case was issued under the statutes of this State relating to the 500,000 acres of land granted to each State by the eighth section of the Act of Congress of Sept. 4th, 1841. (Wood's Dig. 744). It was issued under the provisions of the Act of 1859 (Stat. of 1859, 838), the fourth section of which provides, that "such patent shall vest in the grantee therein named a good and valid title, in fee simple, to the lands therein described." The act requires that the holder of the land warrant desiring a patent shall give public notice of his application for the patent, and prove fully to the Register of the State Land Office the location of the warrant according to law; the survey of the land by the United States; that the location has been made or filed in the United States District Land Office, and has been made with the consent of the Register and Receiver of such Land Office; and all persons holding adversely are entitled to appear before the Register of the State Land Office, and contest the application for the patent. But the provisions of the statutes relating to swamp lands are entirely different.

The source of the title of the State to the swamp lands depends upon the Act of Congress of September 28th, 1850 (Wood's Dig. 745), the first section of which grants to the State of Arkansas the whole of the swamp and overflowed lands "made unfit thereby for cultivation." Sec. 2 makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to make out an accurate list and plats of such lands and transmit the same to the Governor of the State, "and, at the request of said Governor, cause a patent to be issued to the State therefor; and on that patent the fee simple to the said lands shall vest in the said State of Arkansas, subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof." Sec. 3 provides "that in making out a list and plats of the land aforesaid, all legal subdivisions, the greater part of which is 'wet and unfit for cultivation,' shall be included in said list and plats; but when the greater part of a subdivision is not of that character the whole of it shall be excluded therefrom." Sec. 4 extends the provisions and benefits of the act to each of the other States of the Union.

The State of California has, by its legislation, attempted to sell and convey these lands in advance of any segregation thereof, or the issuing of certified lists or patents by the National Government; attempting, by ex parte proceedings, and often without any, or very insufficient proof, to determine, without any concert of action with the National Government, what lands she is entitled to under the Act of Congress. The Act of 1855 (Wood's Dig. 517) authorized the sale and patenting of such lands, without requiring any evidence whatever, not even the affidavit of the purchaser, showing that the tract sought to be purchased was of the character described in the Act of Congress. And the Act of 1858 (Stat. of 1858, 198) is of the same character. By the amendments of 1859 (Stat. of 1859, 340), the purchaser was required to state, in the affidavit made by himself, "that every forty-acre lot, or its equivalent subdivision, of the land sought to be purchased, is the greater part swamp or swampy, or subject to inundation at the planting, growing, or harvesting seasons, so as to endanger, injure, or destroy the crops, taking the average season for a reasonable number of years prior to the year 1850 as a rule of determination." This is making the interested party the only witness on his own behalf. The amendment to Sec. 10 also provides how "a contest for the certificate of purchase, or other evidence of title to the same tract of land," shall be tried. It is doubtful, however, whether, under this section, a person in possession as a preëemptor under the laws of the United States, and claiming that the land is not swamp land under the Act of Congress, can appear and contest the claim of the purchaser under the State. It is, apparently, confined to "a contest for the certificate of purchase or other evidence of title." If such is the proper construction (and we believe the Surveyor-General and Land Register of the State have so construed it), it follows that there is no provision of law by which the essential fact whether the land is swamp land, and whether the State has or ever will have any title to it, can be tried between conflicting and adverse claimants, or can be investigated or determined prior to the issuing of the patent; and if the patent, under such circumstances, is held conclusive upon adverse claimants, it follows that any man may be deprived of his land and improvements by any person who will take the oath prescribed, without any opportunity of having his rights tried in a Court of Justice. A more plain and direct deprivation of property, "without due process of law," could hardly be found or imagined.

In 1861 (Stat. of 1861, 355) the Legislature passed a law appointing a Board of Commissioners, one of the provisions of which is that the County Surveyors of each county shall proceed to segregate the swamp and overflowed lands within their respective counties from the high lands, and make maps of the same, and transmit duplicates of such maps to the Surveyor-General; and also making it their duty to take such testimony as they may be able to, procure, that such lands are swamp and overflowed lands, and transmit the same to the Surveyor-General; and the Governor is required to transmit these maps and testimony to the United States Land Office at Washington. Sec. 26 of this act provides, that after such segregation, the purchaser, in making his affidavit, may omit the statement that the land is swamp land, as required by the Act of 1859. All these proceedings on the part of the County Surveyors are entirely ex parte; adverse claimants have no notice thereof, and have no right to appear and contest the same any more than before.

It seems that the Legislature became aware, that, under these ex parte proceedings, lands might be sold and conveyed that were not, in fact, swamp lands, within the Act of Congress, and which might not belong to the State—as several provisions are made, in different statutes, that in such case the holders of the certificates of purchase or patent might select other swamp lands in exchange therefor. (Stat. 1859, 180; Id. 1861, 6; Id. 1862, 476; Id. 1863, 597.) The Legislature have been equally careful that these ex parte proceedings shall not bind or conclude adverse claimants. Sec. 7, of the Act of 1859, 200, after providing for issuing a patent, adds this clause: “Provided, that neither the patent provided for in this section, nor the certificate provided for in the sixth section of this act, shall have any legal effect or force, than as a quitclaim of all right, title, and interest, on the part of the State.” So, too, all certificates of purchase or of location, issued under the laws of this State, are only made “prima facie evidence of legal title.” (Stat. 1859, 227.) And only the same force and effect is given to certificates of purchase issued by the Register of the State Land Office, by the Statutes of 1863, 597, Sec. 17.

Taking into view the whole system of State legislation, regulating the sale of swamp lands, and all the provisions of the different statutes upon the subject, it is evident that the intention of the Legislature was, that certificates of purchase, and patents issued for swamp land, should not have a binding or conclusive effect upon adverse claimants, but should be only prima facie evidence of title, liable to be defeated upon proof that the land was not in fact swamp land within the Act of Congress. The statutes relating to the sale, and patenting of the 500,000 acres of land, under which the decision in the case of Doll v. Meador was made, differ so widely from the statutes relating to swamp lands, that that decision forms no proper guide in the present case.

The Act of Congress of September 28th, 1850, provides that the patent from the United States to the State, shall vest the fee simple to said lands in the State; and it may, perhaps, be doubtful whether any title vests in the State until such patent is issued. However this may be, as to lands that are unquestionably swamp lands, within the Act of Congress, it is evident that no right, title, or interest, can properly be deemed to have vested in the State, as to any but those lands undoubtedly swamp, until at least they have been segregated by the consent or action of the proper officers of the United States; and until that is done, as to lands not clearly swamp, bona fide claimants, in possession under the laws of the United States, have a right to prove the true character of the land, and that it is not swampy; and they are not concluded from so doing by a certificate of purchase, or a patent issued under the laws of this State.

It is clear that the State has no valid right to sell or convey land to which she has no vested or prospective right or title. Whether she has even a prospective or inchoate title to swamp lands, depends entirely upon the single question, are they swamp lands within the Acts of Congress? If they are not, neither the State nor its officers have any right, power, or authority, to sell or convey them. Nor has she, by her legislation, authorized the sale of lands, unless they are of that character. The first sections of the Acts of 1855 and 1858, only authorize the sale of "the swamp and overflowed lands belonging to this State," and her officers, acting under it, have no right, power, or authority, to sell and convey any other; and if they attempt to do so, they exceed their powers and jurisdiction, and their acts are therefore void.

This very question has been passed upon by this Court, in the case of Summers v. Dickinson (9 Cal. 554), which was concurred in by all the Justices, including Justice Field, who delivered the opinion in Doll v. Meador. In it they say that "the Legislature, by the Act of April, 1855, provided for a sale of these lands, and authorized the Governor to issue patents in favor of persons purchasing under this act. In issuing patents, the Governor acted as the agent of the State, under the powers conferred by the statute; his authority extended only to such lands as were granted to the State by the Act of September, 1850; and a patent issued by him, for any land not embraced in this grant, would be void for want of power to convey." The Court, in commenting on this decision, in Doll v. Meador, say: "Undoubtedly a patent issued by the Governor for any land not embraced in the grant to the State would be void for want of power to convey. * * * Nor do we question the further proposition, that the defendant might have disproved the evidence of title furnished by the patent, by showing that the land in question was not included in the Act of Congress, or was within the exceptions contained in the Act of this State. We only annex to the proposition the qualification that to do this, he must first have brought himself in some privity with the common source of title."

A person who has, in good faith, settled upon a tract of public land, as a preëmptioner under the laws of the United States, acquires a prior right to purchase the land at Government price, when the Government has made the proper surveys, and declared such land open for entry by preëmptioners. The interest in the land thus acquired by his bona fide occupation and residence, and his performing the acts required by the laws of the United States, giving him such prior right to purchase, is of such a character as the Courts will recognize and protect; and the Possessory Act of this State was adopted for that very purpose. We think these facts, upon being proven, give a bona fide occupant and preëmptioner such a status; brings him in such privity with the common source of title, to wit: the Government of the United States; as will entitle him to prove that the land in question was not included in the Act of Congress. In the case of Doll v. Meador, the defendants had let the time pass by within which, under the laws of the United States, they could have procured the Government title; and they were, for that reason, held to be strangers to the title; at least until further action by the Government on their behalf. In this case, it appears that the plats of the United States surveys of this land have not been sent to the proper Land Office; so that it is out of the power of the defendant to file his notice of claim to preëmption, or to enter and purchase the land under the United States laws; so he has done all in his power, and has lost no rights acquired under those laws.

Even if the holder of the State patent should recover the possession under his patent, if the defendant should afterwards establish his preëmption claim and procure a title from the United States, he could then undoubtedly recover back the land, with the intermediate rents and profits. So that there can be no essential advantage to the patentees in postponing the trial of this question of fact, so essential to his right to the land; while a contrary rule would work with great hardship upon bona fide occupants of the land. If, however, the State shall hereafter procure the title to this tract, the plaintiffs can then maintain an action for the possession, and for rents and profits, upon proof of that fact and the patent.

In Stoddard v. Chambers (2 How., U. S., 284), it was held that the issuing of a patent is a mere ministerial act, which must be performed according to law; and if it be issued for lands reserved from sale by law, it is void. So, too, it has been held, that a grant from the State is to be considered void where the State had no property in the land granted, or where the officers had no power to receive the entry and issue the grant. (Curle v. Barrel, 2 Sneed, 63.) Where the law forbids the entry of the vacant land, in a particular tract of country, a grant for a part of such land is absolutely void; and that fact may be shown in ejectment. In such case, the subject matter is not within the jurisdiction or capacity of the executive officers, who therefore transcended their powers in issuing the grants. (Stanwix v. Powell, 13 Iredell, 312.) Where the State has no title to the thing granted, or where the Governor has no authority to issue the grant, if the defect appears on its face, it is absolutely void, and may be impeached collaterally in a Court of Law, in an action of ejectment. (Winter v. Jones, 10 Ga. 190.) A patent which issues from the General Government, to land which has been previously appropriated by the Government, and reserved from entry, is void. (Hit-tuk-cho-me v. Watts, 7 S. & M. 363; Bercy v. Gamble, 8 Mo. 88; Perry v. O'Hanlon, 11 Id. 585; Wright v. Rutgers, 14 Id. 585.)

Waugenheim & Childs.

The evidence in this case, shows that the plaintiffs had the prior actual possession of the house, corral, orchard, and garden, formerly occupied by Stayton; and there is no proof of any abandonment of the right acquired by such prior possession; and the verdict of the jury as to this portion of the premises is contrary to the evidence.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WAUGENHEIM et al. v. CHILDS.

THE vendor of personal property is not a competent witness for his creditors, to impeach a sale made by him, or to prove the sale fraudulent, in a contest respecting it between his creditors and his vendee.

The case of Howe v. Scannell (8 Cal. 325) commented on and overruled.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

This action was commenced in the District Court on the tenth day of September, 1861, and no notice was given by the defendant of the intention to examine Bambour as a witness as required by the amendment of 1861 to the four hundred and twenty-second section of the Practice Act. The defendant recovered judgment in the District Court, and the plaintiff appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion.

George W. Tyler, for Appellant.

W. J. Graves, for Respondent.

Bambour was a competent witness. The rule that a vendor is in general incompetent to impeach the bona fides of his own sales, does not include him in limine. He was competent, at all events, to testify as to the change of possession, and to that was his testimony confined. The transaction, according to his testimony, between him and plaintiff, was one of mortgage. He borrowed money from the plaintiff, and gave him an absolute bill of sale of the property as security. The whole case turned on the fact of possession. About this Bambour could testify. Even if this were not so, the rule that a vendor cannot impeach the bona fides of a sale, has no application here. The exception to the rule is, where collusion is shown between vendor and purchaser. (Howe v. Scannell, 8 Cal. 325.) This case is within the exception.

It has been repeatedly decided that where a vendor is left in possession of property, and exercises acts of ownership over it after sale, this proves a combination to defraud creditors, and in that case the declarations, and, a fortiori, the sworn testimony of the vendor, would be evidence against his vendee. (Wilbur v. Strickland, 1 Rawle, 458; Withes v. Farley, 3 Car. & P. 395; Borland v. Mayo, 8 Ala. 113.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COFF, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages for the alleged taking and conversion by the defendant of certain personal property claimed by the plaintiff. The defendant set up as a defense that the property was owned by one Bambour, and that he took the property as Constable, under and by virtue of certain executions issued on judgments against Bambour. The plaintiff claimed the property under a bill of sale executed to him by the execution debtor, which the defendant contends was made to defraud creditors. On the trial, the defendant called Bambour as a witness; the plaintiff objected that he was interested in the result of the suit, and therefore not a competent witness against him. The Court overruled the objection and allowed the witness to testify; and this is assigned for error.

Sec. 392 of the Practice Act provides that a person who has a present, certain, and vested interest in the action shall be excluded as a witness. Sec. 393 defines the test of this interest as follows: "The true test of the interest of a person, which shall render him incompetent as a witness, shall be that he will gain or lose by the direct legal operation and effect of the judgment, or that the record of the judgment will be legal evidence for or against him in some other action; but nothing in this or the last section shall prevent a party calling as a witness the adverse party to the action, or a person whose interest is adverse, nor a party being a witness in the cases mentioned in Sec. 423." The witness in this case was clearly interested adversely to the plaintiff within the provisions of these sections. He had sold and conveyed the property to the plaintiff, and he was directly interested in defeating that sale and having the property applied upon the executions against him in satisfaction of his debts, and thus diminishing or paying liabilities outstanding against him. Such would be the direct legal operation and effect of a judgment in this case in favor of the defendant, and he would directly gain thereby.

It is no answer to say that he is liable to the plaintiff on an implied warranty of title in the sale made by him, and that therefore his interest is equally balanced; for if it is shown that the sale to the plaintiff was fraudulent and void, the plaintiff could not recover the value of the property in a suit against the witness on such implied warranty. The fraud would defeat all right of action. It has been decided in numerous cases, and upon the strongest reasons, that a vendor of personal property is not a competent witness to impeach a sale made by him, or to prove the sale fraudulent, in a contest respecting it between his creditors and his vendee. (Rea v. Smith, 19 Wend. 293; Bland v. Ansley, 4 Bos. & Pul. 331; Gardenier v. Tubbs, 21 Wend. 169; Pratt v. Stephenson, 16 Pick. 325; Bailey v. Foster, 9 Id. 139; Smead v. Williamson, 16 B. Monroe, 492, 535, 536; Seymour v. Beach, 4 Vt. 493; Clifton v. Bogardus, 1 Scam. 33; 3 Phil. Ev., C. H. & E.'s Notes, 691.) In numerous cases it has also been held that the vendor is in such cases a competent witness for his vendee. (Miller v. Dobson, 1 Gil. 572; Cox v. Hall, 18 Vt. 191; Mizell v. Herbert, 12 S. & M. 547; Ewing v. Carghill, 13 Id. 79; Forsyth v. Palmer, 14 Penn. 96; Wetmore v. Click, 5 Jones, 155; Hawkins v. Ingalls, 4 Blackf. 35; Bradbury v. Dougherty, 7 Id. 467.)

In the case of Howe v. Scannell (8 Cal. 325) the general rule was recognized that the vendor of goods is not a competent witness to impeach the validity of a sale made by himself; but an exception was made where evidence had been introduced showing a collusion between the vendor and purchaser to defraud the creditors of the former, in which case it was held that the declarations of the vendor were admissible, and he was therefore a competent witness against the vendee. We think the exception thus made is not sustained by the authorities, many of which we have already quoted. The Court, in its opinion, refers to the case of Borland v. Mayo (8 Ala. 112). An examination of that case shows that the vendor was made a witness by the vendee, and it was held that certain declarations made by the vendor were inadmissible as evidence for the creditors, because he was a competent witness. The Court below, in this case, erred in permitting the witness to testify on behalf of the defendant.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CONNOR v. MORRIS.

If a statement on appeal is served and filed within the time required by the three hundred and thirty-eighth section of the Practice Act, unless the respondent, within five days thereafter, prepares and serves amendments, he is deemed to have agreed to the statement; and no settlement thereof, or certificate of the Judge is necessary.

In an application for a writ to a County Treasurer, to pay county warrants, it is sufficient to aver in the petition, that the warrants were drawn by the County Auditor, as it will not be presumed that the Auditor has violated his duty in issuing the warrants; but the County Treasurer has a right to show, in defense, that the warrants were founded on a demand not legally chargeable against the county.

The Auditor of a county is the mere Clerk of the Board of Supervisors; and he has no power or authority to draw his warrant on the County Treasurer for the payment of a claim, unless the Board of Supervisors have made an express order, that the claim be paid.

The Board of Supervisors made the following order: "Account allowed J. J. Cloud, surveying Little Lake and Big River Road, $844.20."

Under this order, the Auditor drew a warrant on the Treasurer for the payment of the claim: held, that the order of the Board did not authorize the issuance of the warrant, and that the Treasurer could not be compelled to pay it.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Mendocino County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Wm. Holden, for Appellant.

Connor v. Morris.

The appellant submits that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action to entitle plaintiff to the relief prayed for. It must appear beyond a doubt, that the payment of these warrants was an official duty to be performed by defendant; and that he was invested with no official discretion in this matter. Before payment of these warrants, it was the Treasurer's duty to ascertain that these warrants, to be paid, were founded upon a just claim, legally chargeable against the county (Wood's Dig. 713, Sec. 6); and that the claim or claims upon which they were founded, had been duly "examined, settled, allowed, and ordered paid." Unless the amounts had been ordered paid, the Auditor had no authority to draw the warrants (Wood's Dig. Art. 8446, Sec. 1); and if they were drawn without authority of law, then they must be void. (Keller v. Hyde, 20 Cal. 593; Crandall v. Amador County, Id. 75; Wood's Dig. 696, Art. 3326, Sec. 16.) If, then, such was the duty of the Treasurer, and if these facts must exist before payment of the warrants can be enforced, must not the complaint contain averments that the claims upon which the warrants were founded were legally chargeable against the county, and that they had been ordered paid? No such averments can be found, the omission of which renders the complaint fatally defective; and which objections are of a nature to entitle appellant to raise them for the first time in this Court. (Prac. Act, Sec. 45.) If we say that the word allowed is sufficient to the Auditor to draw his warrant, then we fail to give meaning to the phrase "ordered paid," found in Wood's Dig. 715, Art. 8446.

B. McGarvey and John Currey, for Respondents.

In July, 1862, judgment was entered on the report of the referee in this action. On the twenty-second of July, 1862, the defendant's attorney served on the plaintiff's attorney a notice of a motion to set aside the report of the referee and for a new trial.

On the twenty-sixth of July, 1862, defendant's attorney served on plaintiff's attorney a notice that he had filed a statement to be used on said motion, for the purposes specified in the first notice. This statement does not appear to have been agreed to by the parties, or settled by the Court or referee. Hence it could not be properly regarded as a statement on the motion for a new trial. (Seaver v. Fitzgerald, 23 Cal. 85.) On the ninth of December, 1862, a statement was filed as alleged by defendant's counsel, and a copy served on the plaintiff's attorney by the Sheriff. A notice of appeal to this Court had been filed and served by defendant's attorney on plaintiff's attorney about the twenty-first of November, 1862. This appeal was from the order refusing the new trial, and ordering the peremptory mandamus to be issued.

In order to review the action of the Court below in denying the motion for a new trial, it is necessary to have the record of the case submitted to the Court below. The statement filed in July was no part of the record properly, because it was not settled or agreed to. The statement filed in December cannot be considered as a statement; because, first, it was not prepared within twenty days after the entry of the judgment or order appealed from (Pr. Act, Sec. 338); second, such statement does not contain the grounds on which the defendant intends to rely, and the evidence necessary to explain such grounds; third, the statement referring to the evidence elsewhere is not sufficient, nor in accordance with said Sec. 338, because the said section says that the appellant shall serve a copy of so much of the evidence as may be necessary upon the adverse party, to wit: on the respondent's attorney in this case.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an application for a writ of mandamus, to issue against the defendant, Treasurer of the County of Mendocino, to compel him to pay two certain county warrants. The case was sent to a referee for trial, who reported a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, which was entered accordingly, and from which the defendant appeals.

The respondent moves to strike out all that portion of the record purporting to be the statement on appeal, on the ground that it is not properly authenticated, not having been agreed to by the parties or settled by the Judge or referee. The judgment in this case was rendered in July, 1862; a motion for a new trial was overruled November 19th, and on the ninth day of December the defendant filed and served on the plaintiff a statement on appeal from the order refusing a new trial. The certificate of the Clerk, which is dated December 20th, 1862, states that no amended statement had been filed.

Sec. 338 of the Practice Act provides that the appellant shall, within twenty days after the entry of judgment or order appealed from, prepare and serve a statement, and the respondent may, within five days thereafter, prepare and serve amendments thereto. Sec. 339 provides that where a statement is made, and the respondent shall omit to prepare amendments within the time above limited, he shall be deemed to have agreed to the statement as proposed, "and no settlement of the statement or certificate thereto by the Judge shall be required." In this case the certificate of the Clerk shows that the respondent did not file any amendments to the statement within the time limited by the Practice Act; he is, therefore, to be deemed to have agreed to the statement as filed by the appellant, and no settlement thereof or certificate by the Judge is necessary. The evidence in the case was taken by the referee and reported to the Court, and consists wholly of written depositions and exhibits, and is sufficiently referred to as a part of the statement to authorize the Clerk to incorporate it in the transcript. The motion of the respondent is therefore denied.

The appellant contends that the petition for the writ does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. No objection to the sufficiency of the petition was taken, either by demurrer or answer. The statute (Wood's Dig. 715, Art. 3446) provides, that "the Auditor of every county may draw warrants on the county treasury for the payment of all claims and demands legally chargeable against the county, which are, according to law, examined, settled, allowed, and ordered paid by the Board of Supervisors of the county," etc. The appellant contends that the petition is defective in not averring that the claims on which the warrants in controversy were issued were examined, settled, allowed, and ordered paid by the Board of Supervisors. The complaint avers that the County Auditor drew the warrants, which are copied in full into the complaint, and this is clearly all that is necessary to aver in the petition, the presumption being that they were duly issued according to law, as it will not be presumed that a public officer has violated his duty in issuing them. But the County Treasurer has a clear right to show, in defense of an application for a mandamus against him, that the warrants are founded upon a demand not legally chargeable against the county, and upon such showing the writ will be refused. (Keller v. Hyde, 20 Cal. 594.) This objection is therefore untenable.

Numerous objections are made to the findings, on the ground that they are defective or insufficient. Sec. 187 of the Practice Act provides that "when the referee is to report the facts, the report shall have the effect of a special verdict." The referee in this case was not "to report the facts," but to try all the issues, both of law and fact, and "to report a judgment thereon." It was not therefore any part of the duty of the referee to report findings, and it is unnecessary to examine the objections thereto.

One of the warrants mentioned in the petition is payable "out of the State portion of the Poll Tax Fund," and it is objected that the evidence shows that there was no fund known by that name in the treasury of the county. This objection is not tenable, as it was the evident intention that it should be paid out of the moneys provided for by the Act of April 18th, 1859. (Stat. 1859, 323.)

The record shows that on the eighteenth day of August, 1859, the Board of Supervisors of Mendocino County, made the following order: "J. J. Cloud, surveying State road from Cloverdale to Long Valley, $678. Ordered to be paid from the Wagon Road Fund." Under this order the Auditor issued Warrant No. 32, for $300, payable "out of the State portion of the Poll Tax Fund." We think this variance between the descriptions of the fund out of which the warrant was to be paid, is not sufficient to render the warrant void. It is evident that the Board of Supervisors intended to make it payable out of the moneys arising under the Act of 1859, and that those moneys are sufficiently specified under either designation.

It also appears that on the eighteenth day of August, 1859, the Board of Supervisors made the following order: "Account allowed Rupley v. Welch.

J. J. Cloud, surveying Little Lake and Big River Road, $344.20." Under this order the County Auditor issued Warrant No. 30, for $344.20, payable out of the Road Fund. It is objected that this was a mere "allowance" of the claim, and that the County Auditor could not draw the warrant until it was "ordered paid," as required by the statute. (Wood's Dig. 715.) We think this objection well taken. The Auditor is a mere Clerk of the Board of Supervisors, and has no power or authority to direct a demand to be paid without an express order to that effect made by the board. Such is the evident meaning of the statute. It authorizes the County Auditor to draw his warrant on the County Treasurer only for the payment of claims which have been ordered paid by the board. Any other construction would leave the important words "ordered paid" without any meaning or effect. There may have been good reasons why the board did not order this claim paid. It is sufficient, however, that the statute has placed this power of ordering the payment of claims against the county in the Board of Supervisors, and not in the County Auditor.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the Court below to render judgment for the writ to issue commanding the defendant to pay the warrant, No. 32, for $300, out of the County Treasury.

RUPLEY v. WELCH et al.

THE construction of a reservoir across the bed of a ravine, for the purpose of collecting the water flowing down the same, to be used in irrigating a garden, or fruit trees, gives to the party constructing the same, a vested right of property in the reservoir, and the right to have the water flow into the same, of which he cannot be divested by persons subsequently entering for mining purposes; and a Court of Equity will enjoin miners thus entering, from injuring the reservoir, or diverting the water therefrom.

A person entering upon and possessing public lands, under the Possessory Act of April 20th, 1852, holds the lands subject to the right of any person to enter upon it, and work the mines of precious metals thereon. This right of the miner to enter upon lands thus held, is subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Legislature may see fit to impose; and the Act of April 25th, Rupley v. Welch.

1855, compelling the miner to give bonds to the owner of crops growing on such lands, before he can use the mineral lands on which crops are growing, is but a regulation of a right given by the Act of April 20th, 1852, and is not liable to any constitutional objection.

Where the miner, who desires to dig up crops growing on land held under the Possessory Act, offers to give the proper bond required by the Act of 1855, and the owner of the crops refuses to receive it, the miner acquires by such offer a right to enter and mine on the land, and cannot be treated as a trespasser. The miner is liable, however, for the damage to the growing crops, caused by his act, and if the owner of the crops should demand of the miner payment of the damage caused to the crop, and the miner should refuse to pay, a Court of Equity would restrain him from further working.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

This action was commenced on the thirtieth day of November, 1860. The reservoir of the plaintiff was constructed across the bed of the ravine, and defendants were digging and sluicing immediately above the reservoir, and had excavated a ditch, by which they had diverted the water from the reservoir. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hume & Sloss, for Appellants.

The Court erred in refusing to order judgment for plaintiff, on the complaint and answer. The answer does not put in issue any material allegation of the complaint. An answer which does not, when the complaint is verified, contain a specific denial of each allegation controverted by the defendant, is to be disregarded. Every material allegation of the complaint not specifically controverted by the answer, shall, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true. (Pr. Act, 46, 65; Dewey v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 149; Humphreys v. McCall, 9 Id. 59; Burke v. Table Mountain Water Co., 12 Id. 403.)

Conceding the correctness of the proposition laid down by this Court, in Burdge v. Smith (14 Cal. 383), that "there is no presumption that the person who goes upon mineral land is a trespasser," we insist that in this instance, that presumption is overthrown by the showing of the complaint—that the defendants had entered the plaintiff's inclosure, had destroyed, were actually engaged in destroying, and declare their intention to be, to continue to destroy the crops of the plaintiff.

McCallum & Upton, for Respondent.

We proceed to notice the propositions of the appellant, that the Court erred in refusing to order judgment for the plaintiff, on the pleadings. It is a sufficient answer to say, that defendants' answer sets up a distinct affirmative defense; setting up their offer to comply with the statute, and plaintiff's refusal to accept (Stat. 1855, 145), to which defense there was no demurrer, or objection of any kind, but to which plaintiff filed his replication, denying the plea; upon which issue the District Court found for the defendants. That the defendants had the right to enter, as miners, upon such land, and for the purpose of mining, this Court has decided in so many cases, that it is not regarded as an open question. (Buridge v. Smith et al., 14 Cal. 380; Hicks v. Bell, 3 Id. 227; Barrett v. Stokes, 5 Id. 39; Irwin v. Phillips, Id. 146; Conger v. Weaver, 6 Id. 548.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover damages of the defendants, for entering upon certain inclosed premises, and digging up and sluicing the same, for mining purposes; and for an injunction to restrain them from continuing these mining operations.

The premises are described in the complaint as a field of ten acres, inclosed with a rail fence, part of a larger tract in the plaintiff's possession, on which ten acres were growing crops of grain, consisting of barley, wheat, Chile, and red clover, and other grasses of natural and planted growth. The plaintiff also avers, that near the place where the defendants are at work, he has a garden and fruit trees, and for the purpose of irrigating them, he constructed a reservoir to receive the water flowing down a ravine on the premises in question; and that the works of the defendants will divert the water from the reservoir, and render it useless for the purpose of irrigating the garden and fruit trees. It does not clearly appear where the reservoir is located, but the inference, from the mode of stating is, that the reservoir, and the garden and fruit trees, are not on the ten acres. The plaintiff also avers, that he has suffered damages to the amount of two hundred dollars, from these acts of the defendants.

The answer directly admits some of these allegations, and the residue are to be taken as true, because the complaint is verified; and the answer only controverts them by a general, instead of a specific denial of each allegation. (Civil Pr. Act, 48, 65.)

But the answer sets up, as affirmative matter of defense, that the premises are public lands, and only held by the plaintiff by a possessory title, under the act entitled "An Act prescribing the mode of Maintaining and Defending Possessory Actions on Public Lands in this State," passed April 20th, 1852; that they contained mines of precious metals; and that the defendants entered upon them for mining purposes; and that before making such entry they offered to execute to the plaintiff their bond with good and sufficient surety, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An Act to protect Owners of Growing Crops, Buildings, and other Improvements in the Mining Districts of this State," approved April 25th, 1855; and that the plaintiff refused to accept the same; and they aver that they are now ready and willing to execute such bond, in accordance with the Statute of 1855, aforesaid. These allegations of the answer are also to be taken as true, because they are not controverted by the replication. (Civil Prac. Act. Sec. 65.) A judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff has appealed.

The main question involved in this case is the validity of the Act of April 25th, 1855; the defendants claiming that, having complied with the provisions of that act, they lawfully entered upon plaintiff's land, and were authorized to commit the acts complained of. The threatened diversion of water from plaintiff's reservoir is a clear violation of a vested right of property, acquired by the plaintiff by virtue of his prior appropriation of the water, and of which he cannot be divested for any private purposes or for the benefit of a few private individuals.

But the injury to the growing crops presents a different question. The Statute of 1852 relating to possessory actions, provides that the possession of public land, containing mines of the precious metals, for agriculture and grazing purposes, shall not preclude the working of such mines by any person desiring to do so. The cultivation of the land, and raising crops of grain or grass, is a use of the land purely for agricultural and grazing purposes, and therefore clearly comes within the proviso of the act. The plaintiff's possession of the land was subject to this right of any person to enter upon the land and work the mines of the precious metals thereon. This right of the miner has been fully recognized by this Court, but it has invariably been held to apply only to the possession of public lands held purely for agricultural and grazing purposes, and not extended beyond them. (5 Cal. 36, 97, 308, 395; 14 Id. 380.)

The Act of April 25th, 1855, provides that whenever any person shall, for mining purposes, desire to occupy or use any mineral lands then occupied by growing crops, etc., such person shall first give bond to the owner of the growing crop, etc., that the obligor shall pay to the obligee any damage sustained by reason of the destruction of the growing crops, etc., of the obligee. So far as this act relates to "growing crops," such as are usually raised upon lands used exclusively for agricultural or grazing purposes, it merely regulates a right previously vested in the miner, and to which the plaintiff's possession was subject; and to that extent, it is not liable to any constitutional objection. The right reserved to the miner, by the Act of 1852, is subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Legislature may see fit to impose; and the Act of 1855 is but a regulation of that right, requiring a bond to be given before it can be exercised. The defendants in this case, complied with the requirements of the Act of 1855, so far as they could, by offering to give the proper bond, which the plaintiff refused to receive. This was all that the defendants were required to do, before entering upon the premises. They could not tender such a bond as the act requires, because the law requires the sum to be fixed by three disinterested persons, one of whom was to be selected by the plaintiff; and this he refused to do, by refusing to receive any bond. The entry of the defendants upon the land upon which the growing crops were, for mining purposes, was therefore lawful, and cannot properly be treated as a trespass. They are, however, liable for the damage to the growing crops caused by their acts; and if the plaintiff should demand of them the bond required by the statute, or they should refuse to pay the damages thus caused by them, they might then be restrained from all further working or trespassing upon the land. But no such case is presented by the record in this action.

It follows, from these views, that the Court below erred in refusing the injunction against injuring the plaintiff's reservoir or diverting water therefrom.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

VAN WINKLE et al. v. STOW AND C. H. GRIMM, INTERVENOR.

Mellon v. Borland (28 Cal. 144) affirmed.

To enforce a lien under the Act of May 17th, 1861, for securing the liens of mechanics and others, no complaint need be filed, or summons issued; but in lieu thereof a petition is filed, and the Clerk issues a notice, which is published. When a proceeding is commenced to enforce a lien under the Act of 1862, persons having a lien by mortgage upon the property upon which the lien is sought to be enforced, have no right to intervene.

APPEAL from the County Court of Sacramento County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Harmon & Hartley, for C. H. Grimm, Intervenor and Appellant.

George R. Moore, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is a proceeding brought in a County Court under the Mechanics' Lien Law, to enforce a mechanic's lien upon the "I Street Railroad," in the City of Sacramento. C. H. Grimm claimed to hold three mortgages upon the property, and that they were liens thereon prior to those of the mechanics and material men. The case was tried by a referee, who reported findings of facts, and a judgment in favor of the holders of the mechanics' liens, from which the intervenor appeals.

The first object that we will notice is, that the County Court had no jurisdiction, because the amount of the lien of the plaintiff exceeded two hundred dollars, and therefore the action should have been brought in the District Court, which it is urged has exclusive jurisdiction of actions where the amount exceeds two hundred dollars, by the provisions of the Constitution. This objection is not tenable. This is not an action for the recovery of a sum of money, but a special statutory proceeding, in the nature of a proceeding in rem against the property alone, to subject it to the payment of the liens authorized by the statute; and under it no personal money judgment can be rendered against the owner of the property, but such judgment can only be recovered in some other Court of competent jurisdiction. (McNeil v. Borland, 23 Cal. 144.)

The next point raised by the appellants is, that the action was not commenced within the time required by the statute, and therefore the holders of the mechanics' liens were not entitled to any judgment. This objection is founded upon the fact that no summons was issued therein against the defendant, Stow, the owner of the road, or any other person. Sec. 6 of the Mechanics' Lien Law provides, that no lien provided for by the statute shall bind the property "for a longer period than six months after filing the same, unless suit be brought in a proper Court within that time to enforce the same." Sec. 22 of the Practice Act provides that, "civil actions in the District Courts and the County Courts shall be commenced by the filing of a complaint with the Clerk of the Court in which the action is brought, and issuing of a summons thereon." It has been held by this Court, that actions under the Mechanics' Lien Law must be commenced by the filing of the complaint, and the issuing of the summons thereon, within the six months prescribed by the statute; and if the summons is not issued within the time, the lien is lost, even though the complaint be filed within the time. (Flandreau v. White, 18 Cal. 639; Green v. Jackson Water Co., 10 Id. 374.)

But these cases were decided under statutes very different from the one under which the present action was brought. In the case of Green v. Jackson, the statutes under which the lien was claimed, provided that the lien might be enforced "by suit in any Court of competent jurisdiction, etc., and at the time of filing the complaint, and issuing summons, the plaintiff shall make publication," etc. (Stat. 1855, 158, Sec. 8.) In Flandreau v. White, the statute was slightly changed, it providing that the liens might be enforced "by suit in any Court of competent jurisdiction, on setting forth in the complaint," etc.; and there is no special direction about issuing a summons. (Wood's Dig. 538, Sec. 7.) But the Act of 1861 (Stat. 1861, 495), changes the character of the proceedings entirely, by providing that the liens may be enforced in the County Court, by any lienholder upon his filing a petition, upon the filing of which the Clerk is directed to issue a notice, which is to be published as therein required. The proceeding, under this amendment to the Lien Law, is no longer an action, but a special proceeding. No complaint is filed, or summons issued under it, as is in actions proper; but a petition is filed, and notice published in lieu thereof. This change in the statute requires a different rule of construction upon this point; and we think it clear that the "suit" which is required to be brought within six months after the filing of the lien in the Recorder's office, or the expiration of the credit, is properly "brought" when the petition is filed and the notice is issued by the Clerk, as required by the amendment of 1861. The petition was filed and notice was issued in this case within the time, and it follows that this objection is not well taken.

It is urged by the respondent that the intervenor, having only a mortgage lien, and not claiming any lien under the statute, had no right to intervene in the action. In the case of Whitney v. Higgins (10 Cal. 551) it was held by the Court, that all persons interested in the premises, prior to a suit brought to enforce a mechanic's lien, whether purchasers or incumbrancers, must be made parties to the suit, otherwise their rights would not be affected.

But under the change of the statute this rule has no proper application to the present form of proceeding. The "lienholders," mentioned in the amendment of 1861, to Sec. 7, properly include only such persons as hold the kind and character of the liens provided for and authorized to be enforced by the special proceedings there laid down. Any other construction would draw within the jurisdiction of the County Court, in a special proceeding of this kind, the determination and enforcement of all kinds of liens upon the property, by mortgage, judgment, or otherwise, and thus a mortgage might be substantially foreclosed in those Courts in such cases, by simply making the holder of the mortgage a party, or by his coming in as an intervenor. It is evident that the Legislature never intended to establish any such rule, and never intended to give such an extended significance to the term "lienholder." It is true, that a decree for the sale of property under these proceedings will not affect the rights of the holders of any other kinds of liens, and that great difficulties must thus necessarily arise as to the rights of the purchasers under such decrees; yet these difficulties arise from the fact that the Legislature has conferred jurisdiction over a most important class of cases, affecting the title to real estate, upon a Court of limited powers and jurisdiction, utterly unable in consequence thereof to fully adjudicate the rights and claims of different classes of lienholders or claimants of the title, so that a sale under its decree will not settle the title, but often result in merely laying the foundation for other lawsuits. By transferring jurisdiction of such cases to the District Court—a Court with full and ample powers—these difficulties might be avoided. That, however, is a matter for the Legislature, and not for this Court to act upon. It follows, however, that the objection of the respondent is well taken, and that the mortgagee, Grimm, had no right to intervene in the case.

Under the view we have taken of this case, the judgment of the Court below is correct, and it is therefore affirmed.

On petition for rehearing, SAWYER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—SANDERSON, C. J., SHAFTER, J., and RHODES, J. concurring.

We are satisfied, upon examination of the record, that Grimm, the intervenor, had no right, as mortgagee, to intervene in the proceeding in the Court below, for the reasons stated in the opinion of Justice CROCKER.

Upon this ground the petition for rehearing is denied.

BALDWIN et al. v. FERRE et al.

Whereas a statement is filed and served by the moving party, on motion for a new trial, and amendments thereto are made by the opposing party, and the only settlement of, or certificate to, the same was an indorsement by the Judge at the bottom of the statement, that the amendments to the statement were allowed: held, that the statement would not be considered on appeal.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourteenth Judicial District, Nevada County.

J. J. Caldwell, for Appellants.

A. C. Niles, for Respondents.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a quartz ledge in Nevada County, with a prayer for an injunction. The plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendants, two of whom, Baldwin and Latour, appeal to this Court. The appeal is from the judgment, and from an order overruling a motion for a new trial. The respondents contend that the statement on the motion for a new trial was never settled, and cannot, therefore, be considered as part of the record. The record shows, that the defendants filed their statement, on motion for a new trial, November 19th, 1861; that, on the twenty-third day of November, amendments thereto were filed; that, on December 2d, the statement was submitted to the Court, and taken under advisement; and at the end of the original statement appears the following clause, signed by the Judge of the Parsons v. City and County of San Francisco.

District Court, to wit: "The amendments to the within statement are hereby allowed."

The amendments, thus allowed, were not incorporated into one document, as they should have been, but appear in the transcript in separate papers; and this Court has repeatedly held, that in such case they do not constitute such a statement as will be noticed on appeal. (Marlow v. Marsh, 9 Cal. 259; People v. Edwards, Id. 291; Skillman v. Riley, 10 Id. 300.) The only errors assigned by the appellants are founded upon the statement; and as that cannot be noticed, they cannot be reviewed by this Court.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

PARSONS v. THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

THE act known as the Consolidation Act, passed in 1856, released the City and County of San Francisco from all liability for damages for injuries sustained by any person on its graded streets or public highways, in consequence of said streets or highways being out of repair.

Sec. 64 of said act is not unconstitutional.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The defendant recovered judgment in the Court below, and plaintiff appealed.

Cook, Brownson & Hittell, for Appellant.

John H. Saunders, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the City and County of San Francisco, to recover damages for injuries sustained by him, caused by falling down an embankment on Stockton Street.

The defendant sets up that she is not liable, under the provisions of Sec. 64 of the act known as the Consolidation Act (Stat. of 1856, 162), which determines the liability in such cases. Said section is as follows:

"If, in consequence of any graded street or public highway being out of repair, and in a condition to endanger persons, horses, or other animals passing therein, any person, while lawfully using said street or public highway, and exercising ordinary care to avoid the danger, suffer damages to his person; or if any horses, animals, or other property, being lawfully ridden, driven, or conveyed through such street or public highway, be injured, lost, or destroyed through any such defect therein, no recourse for the damage thus suffered shall be had against the City and County of San Francisco; but if such defect in the street or public highway have existed for the period of twenty-four hours or more, then the person or persons on whom the law may have imposed the obligation to repair such defect in the street or public highway, and also the officer or officers through whose official negligence such defect remained unrepaired, shall be, jointly and severally, liable to the party injured for the damage sustained."

The street in question was not a "graded street" at the time of the accident, and the appellant therefore contends that it could not be "out of repair," within the meaning of this section. The statute reads, "graded street or public highway;" and it is clear, that if it was not a graded street, it was a public highway, and therefore it was within the statute. The terms "public highway" are most general in their meaning, and include all kinds of thoroughfares in which the public have a right of way or passage. It clearly includes graded and ungraded, finished and unfinished streets. The statute says, "being out of repair, and in a condition to endanger persons," etc. These terms are not properly confined to graded, constructed, or finished streets, but include those public highways in a state of nature, or partially-graded condition, when they are in such a state as to endanger persons or animals passing therein.

It is urged, that the defendant did not show that the embankment, or other defect in the street which caused the injury complained of, had existed for twenty-four hours or more before the accident. The nonliability of the city does not depend, under the statute, upon any such fact. The act exempts her from liability in any event; but the liability of other persons and public officers, for the damages, is made to depend upon that fact. It was not, therefore, a matter which the defendant was in any way bound to plead or prove.

We do not think that this section is a violation of the State or National Constitution; or that it prevents any person from enjoying the inalienable rights of life and liberty, or acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, or pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness, as declared by the first section of the State Constitution; or that it has the effect of taking the property of the plaintiff for public use without compensation. The statute, while relieving the city from liability, affords an ample remedy against those whose acts or negligence were the cause of the injury; and there is evidently no violation of any constitutional right in such a provision.

The judgment is affirmed.

CREANOR v. NELSON.

WHEREAS all the proceedings required by law have been taken to condemn land for a public highway, and the damages to the owner have been assessed, and a warrant, drawn by the Auditor on the Treasurer of the county for the amount of the damages has been tendered to the owner of the land, but refused by him, a Court of Equity will not enjoin the Road Overseer from tearing down the fences and opening the highway to the public.

The County Judge who grants an injunction, may dissolve or modify the same, upon a proper application.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellant.

Cresnor v. Nelson.

At the present time, Courts interfere to prevent trespass to real estate when the title is not disputed, or when, if disputed, the facts are all before the Court, and it appears there is no just reason for disputing the title, and the injury will be continuous or irreparable. Formerly, the Courts only held such injuries irreparable as the skill of man could not repair; such as destruction of trees, removing of beds of mineral, etc. But the more modern decisions hold another kind of injury irreparable. That is an injury done by a trespasser who has not the pecuniary means or ability to repair the damage he has done. This kind of irreparable injury, is alluded to in many of the cases decided by the Supreme Court of this State. (Merced Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 329, 330; Bensley v. Mountain Lake Water Co., 13 Id. 313.)

That the threatened repetition would be a strong reason for the granting of an injunction, we refer to the remarks of Justice Burnett, in Coker v. Simpson et al. (7 Cal. 341, 342).

The justification turns upon a single point. Is it payment or compensation for a man's property, to give a warrant on an empty treasury? The proceedings to condemn this property for road purposes seem to be regular, except that they offer no payment for the property condemned, unless a warrant on a treasury without money is such. On this point the Supreme Court of this State has repeatedly held, that it is necessary, when taking private property for public use, that the money should be paid before or simultaneous with the taking; or, if not so paid, that the fund shall be provided, so as to pay as soon as the rights of the party deprived are determined by a Court of competent jurisdiction. (McCam v. Sierra County, 7 Cal. 124; McCauley v. Weller, 12 Id. 528, 531.)

Brown & Graves, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order dissolving an injunction. The complaint alleges that the defendant had entered upon the plaintiff's land, torn down the fences, and threatened to continue these acts. The County Judge granted an injunction upon the complaint alone. The defendant filed an answer justifying the alleged trespass, on the ground that the land in question was a public highway; that he was Road Overseer, and that he entered on the land as such Road Overseer, to open the highway—but did not aver that the money had been paid to the plaintiff as a compensation for the land taken. Upon this answer the County Judge who granted the injunction dissolved the same on motion of the defendant. It appears that the County Judge dissolved the injunction upon two grounds: 1st. That the complaint was insufficient to authorize the injunction; 2d. The defendant's answer showed that the injunction ought not to be continued.

The answer alleges that the road in question was duly declared a public highway by the proper authorities, all the steps required by law having been taken, and that he was duly ordered by the Board of Supervisors to open the road as surveyed and marked out, and cause the same to be kept open to the public; that the damages to plaintiff's land were duly assessed at five hundred dollars; that the Board of Supervisors had ordered that said sum be paid to the plaintiff from the General Fund of the county, and ordered the County Auditor to draw his warrant therefor on the County Treasurer, which was done; and before defendant entered on the land, said warrant had been duly tendered to the plaintiff, which he refused to accept; and the warrant is still ready to be delivered to the plaintiff on demand.

The granting of injunctions is an equitable proceeding, and the party seeking this peculiar equitable relief should show that he has a right under all the circumstances to this extraordinary writ. In a case like the present it must appear, that he will suffer "great or irreparable injury" if the defendant is suffered to continue the acts complained of; it must also appear, that the plaintiff is not in default in the matter.

Under the circumstances of this case, it is clear that the plaintiff will not suffer any injury whatever by the acts of the defendant. The land has been duly condemned to public use for the purposes of a public highway. The amount the plaintiff is entitled to as a compensation for his land thus taken for public use has been duly ascertained according to law, and the public officers have issued the proper warrant to the plaintiff, which is the only mode prescribed by law by which the money can be drawn from the public treasury, and the proper mode by which this compensation is payable to the plaintiff under the provisions of the statute. His refusal to receive the warrant and draw the money is his own fault, and affords him no just ground for saying that he has received no compensation, or a proper foundation for the writ of injunction. When he asks equity, he must show that he is not in fault. (Harper v. Richardson, 22 Cal. 251.)

In the case of Bruce v. The Delaware and Hudson Canal Company (19 Barb. 371), the defendants, in enlarging their canal — which they had a legal right to do — raised by a dam the waters of a creek on which the plaintiff had a mill, which was injured thereby: held, that the remedy for the injury was by an action for damages, or by proceedings under the statute for the appraisal and payment of the damages, and not by an injunction to restrain the act; that it is not every case, even of a clear violation of the plaintiff's rights, that entitles him to an injunction to restrain such violation. He must first show clearly that the act itself is illegal. To authorize a temporary injunction, it must appear the act sought to be restrained is unlawful. So, it has been held that an act done under a lawful authority, if done in a proper manner, will not subject the party doing it to an action for the consequences, whatever they may be. (Radcliff v. Brooklyn, 4 Com. 195.) So, where a party, whose land has been taken by a railroad company, might have insisted on receiving a compensation at the time, but neglected to do so, and forbears to assert his right until after the road is completed — and when an interruption of its business would be seriously injurious — an injunction should not be granted; at least, not until all ordinary means for obtaining an indemnity have failed. (Hentz v. Long Island R. R. Co., 13 Barb. 647.) Where an authority about to be exercised by a municipal corporation, is of a public nature, and for the interests, necessities, and conveniences of the public — and is lawful in its character — all private rights and interests are, to a certain extent, subordinate to it. (Ely v. City of Rochester, 26 Barb. 133.) We cite these authorities to show that the granting or continuance of an injunction in cases like this, where the public interests are involved, is not a matter of absolute right, but to be determined by a consideration of all the equities of the case.

It is also urged, that although the County Judge had power to grant the injunction, he had no power to dissolve it — and, therefore, the order dissolving it is void. Sec. 111 of the Practice Act authorizes a County Judge to grant the order, or writ, and his right to act under this section has been sustained by this Court. (Thompson v. Williams, 6 Cal. 88; Crandall v. Woods, Id. 449.) Sec. 118 of the Practice Act provides that, “if an injunction has been granted without notice, the defendant, at any time before the trial, may apply, upon reasonable notice, to the Judge who granted the injunction, or to the Court in which the action is brought, to dissolve or modify the same.” Under this statute, the County Judge, who has granted the injunction, may dissolve or modify it, upon a proper application; and the same reasons which sustain the power to grant, apply equally to the power to dissolve and modify. We see no valid constitutional objection to his exercising the powers vested in him by these sections.

The order is affirmed.

WARD v. PRESTON.

THE declarations of an agent, while acting as such, made in and about matters connected with and in the scope of his agency, are admissible in evidence against the principal.

When, in the course of a trial, irrelevant testimony is offered by one party, and objected to by the other, and admitted by the Court, and the Court afterwards strikes out the testimony, and directs the jury to disregard it, the error in admitting the evidence is cured, and affords no valid ground for reversing the judgment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Tehama County.

One Smith recovered a judgment against Kretzer and F. Crosby, partners in trade, for seven hundred and forty-one dollars and sixteen cents, and costs; and on the ninth day of January, 1861, assigned the judgment to plaintiff, Ward, and on the same day an execution was issued on the judgment, by virtue of which the Sheriff levied on and sold the hogs in controversy. Kretzer & Crosby were the owners of the hogs, when levied on. At the time of the sale by the Sheriff, Ward was absent in Mendocino County, and Lewis Crosby bid in the property for Ward. When Ward returned he satisfied the judgment, and directed the Sheriff to call on Crosby for some six hundred dollars, being the amount of the purchase more than the judgment. The defense was, that Ward never owned the hogs, but that they were purchased in his name by Crosby, who was the real owner. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Ward v. Preston.

W. H. Rhodes, for Appellant.

Injury will be presumed, where error is apparent. Every error in the Court below, in rejecting, and much more in admitting evidence, is, prima facie, an injury; and it rests with the other party, clearly, to show that no hurt would have been, or was done, by the error. (Jackson v. Feather River Water Co., 14 Cal. 25.)

The declaration, or admission, of a person competent to be a witness, and who is not shown to have acted on behalf of the adverse party, cannot be proved, even though, when subpoenaed, he absents himself from the trial. (Woodward v. Paine, 15 Johns. 493.) A party who can call a witness cannot give evidence of his declarations. (Alexander v. Maher, 11 Johns. 185; Bristol v. Darr, 12 Wend. 142.)

It was error to admit the papers in the case of Betts v. Crosby & Chapman. But it may be argued that the Court, on motion, struck out the evidence. The answer to this is apparent. It is the province of the Judge to control the admissibility of evidence; and he has no right to permit evidence to go before a jury, unless its relevancy and competency be first shown. In most cases, it is impossible to erase from the minds of a jury, the effect produced by incompetent proof, even though the Judge should instruct the jury to disregard it. The safest rule in cases of written proof, is to allow the instrument to be proven, and afterwards, on showing by other proof its relevancy, then to introduce it, and not till then. (Matter v. Brown, 1 Cal. 224; 1 Graham on New Trials, 240.)

Ward v. Preston.

W. H. Long, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of two hundred and fifty hogs. The plaintiff claimed the property, as purchaser at a Sheriff's sale, on an execution issued on a judgment owned by him, in which L. Crosby and another were defendants, and which were levied upon as the property of Crosby. It seems that the plaintiff requested Crosby, after the sale, to look after the hogs, and to make a contract with some one to fatten them. He made an arrangement with one Gill, and directed him to go to the plaintiff to make the bargain, which he did, and the plaintiff entered into a contract with Gill for the latter to fatten and market the hogs; that is, after fattening them, to sell them in the market to the best advantage; and they were to divide the proceeds equally between them. Gill took possession under this agreement, and soon after sold them to the defendant. The defendant recovered judgment, from which the plaintiff appeals.

At the trial, a witness was asked whether Crosby ever offered to sell the property, and what Crosby said when applied to to remove the hogs? The permission to ask these questions, is assigned for error. It seems that after the purchase at Sheriff's sale, Crosby, at the request of plaintiff, took charge of the hogs, and was authorized, to some extent, to act as agent for the plaintiff; and as such, his acts and statements connected therewith while thus acting as agent, were admissible as evidence. But even if they had not been strictly admissible, they could not have operated as a material injury to the plaintiff, nor would the error be such as to justify us in reversing the judgment.

It appears that one Betts recovered a judgment against Crosby and one Chapman, issued an execution, and procured an order for the examination of Gill, under Sec. 241 of the Practice Act, to testify as to any property he might have in his hands, belonging to Crosby. Gill appeared, and stated that he had sold certain hogs, belonging to Crosby & Preston, and had five hundred dollars of the money in his hands. Thereupon, the Court ordered Gill to pay this money to the Sheriff, to be applied on the execution. At the trial of this case, the Court permitted the defendant to introduce the record of these proceedings in evidence, and this is assigned for error. This evidence was clearly irrelevant to the matters in issue in this case, and not competent to be used against the plaintiff. He was not a party to those proceedings, had no notice thereof, and they cannot be held to bind or affect him in any way. But the Court afterwards struck out the evidence, and directed the jury to disregard it. The Court may have admitted it under the supposition that the defendant would show, that in some way, the plaintiff was bound thereby, but finding that was not done, ordered it stricken out. Under these circumstances, the error in admitting the evidence, was cured by this act of the Court, and it affords no valid ground for reversing the judgment.

At the trial, the Court gave the jury the following instructions, to which the plaintiff excepted, and now assigns for error: "You, gentlemen of the jury, are to try in this cause two principal questions: First, Did this property belong to Loomis Ward at all? and, second, if it ever did, did he authorize the man, James Gill, to sell the same to defendant? In the first inquiry, you can investigate the question—Was not L. Crosby the owner of the property? and, if so, you need not go any further; for if L. Crosby was the owner, the plaintiff has no right to complain, and cannot maintain this action. In order to ascertain whether L. Crosby was or was not the owner, the jury can take into consideration all the circumstances attending the sale by the Sheriff; the care and control of the hogs taken by Crosby, if any; the offer by him to sell them to Jaynes and others; and the conversation of witness Bell with plaintiff, Ward. This conversation is not admitted, to show an estoppel as against Ward, for such is not the effect of it, but it is admitted, with other testimony, to contradict or disprove Ward's claims of property in the hogs." We see no valid objection to these instructions. It drew the attention of the jury to the main questions of fact they were called upon to decide, and they violate no rule of law. The defendant clearly was not injured by them.

The judgment is affirmed.

Irvine v. McKeon.

IRVINE v. McKEON.

SECTION 14 of the general Corporation Law of April 22d, 1850, making the directors of a corporation jointly and severally liable for the excess of the debts of the corporation, over and above the amount of capital stock actually paid in, being a statute creating a forfeiture, or imposing a penalty, is to be strictly construed.

The parties to a deed are not estopped by the consideration expressed in it, from showing what the real consideration was.

In an action brought against one of the directors of a corporation, under Sec. 14, above referred to, it is necessary for the plaintiff to prove that defendant was a director when the debt was created, and was present at the meeting of the board when the same was passed upon.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

The plaintiff, in this case, was a judgment creditor of the corporation. The corporation had not been dissolved before the commencement of this action, by any proceeding under the statute; but its property had all been sold under execution about two years before the commencement of this action, and from that time it had ceased to hold meetings, elect officers, or perform any act in its corporate capacity. The Court, in its opinion, has not found it necessary to pass upon the question of its dissolution; but as the brief of appellant's counsel discusses the question, some portion of it is inserted.

John G. Hyer, for Appellant.

It is one of the most patent rules of interpretation, one too patent to need fortification with authorities, that when a statute makes a certain class of persons liable, under a given state of facts, and then states certain exceptions to the general rule, that a person who is prima facie liable as within the rule, if he desires to show that he is within the exception, must allege and prove such facts as will bring him within it. The only question upon which there can be any doubt, is as to the dissolution of the corporation. But under the state of facts shown: the property of the corporation being all sold out in 1859 at forced sale, they have held no election of officers or trustees since June, 1858; have performed no corporate act, done nothing whatever since September, 1858; have been regarded and have themselves regarded the corporation as dissolved, and treated it so. We contend that it makes no difference whether there had been any actual formal dissolution of the corporation or not; that the contingency has happened upon which, in the contemplation of the statute, the liability of the trustees to the creditors of the corporation should attach, for the excess of the debts of the corporation above the amount of the capital stock actually paid in. In Angell & Ames on Corporations, Chap. "Dissolutions," etc., 740-741, 3d Ed., the following argument is used: "But if a corporation suffer acts to be done which destroy the end and objects for which it was instituted, it is equivalent to a surrender of its rights. This doctrine has been maintained and applied by the Courts of New York, in the construction of the statute of that State concerning manufacturing corporations, which provides that for all debts due and owing by the company at the time of its dissolution, the persons then composing such company shall be held individually responsible to the extent of their respective shares of stock, and no further. Under this statute, if a corporation being indebted, suffer all its property to be sacrificed, and the trustees actually relinquish their trust, and omit the annual elections, and do no one act manifesting an intention to resume their corporate functions, the Courts may, for the sake of remedy against individual members, and in favor of creditors, presume a virtual surrender of the corporate rights, and a dissolution of the corporation. And an election of trustees, made after insolvency of the company, for the mere purpose of keeping it in existence, will not prevent such dissolution. In these cases, the Courts of New York did not decide that the companies had lost all their rights; but, that even if they had a right to reorganize themselves, the case had happened in which, with regard to their creditors, they were dissolved."

In this case, the same doctrine is sought to be applied (that is, on the hypothesis that the corporation is not dissolved) to enforce the statutory liability of the trustees, as was applied in New York (see the cases cited in notes to the above quotations) to the liabilities of stockholders upon dissolution. That the doctrine there laid down is correct in principle, will appear from the consideration, that if it were not so, a set of trustees could run a corporation into debt far above the amount of capital stock paid in—the statutory limit of their capacity to contract—and then by keeping up a show of corporate existence, prevent the attachment of the personal and individual liability. The law favors no such factitious theories. It says, in the event of dissolution, the trustees shall be liable for the excess of debts above the amount of capital stock actually paid in.

Irvine v. McKeon.

Dudley & Adams, for Respondents.

[No brief on file.]

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff, as a creditor of a corporation called "The Murray Creek Quartz Mining Company," against the defendant as trustee of said company, on the ground that the debts of the company exceeded its capital stock actually paid in. The case was tried by a jury, who found for the defendant, and from the judgment rendered thereon the plaintiff appeals.

This action is founded upon Sec. 14 of the general Corporation Law of April 22d, 1850 (Wood's Dig. 116), which is as follows: "The total amount of the debts which any incorporate company shall owe, shall not at any time exceed the amount of the capital stock actually paid in; and in case of any excess, the directors, under whose administration the same may have happened, except those who may have caused their dissent therefrom to be entered at large on the minutes of the said directors at the time, and except those who were not present when the same did happen, shall, in their individual and private capacities, jointly and severally, be liable for such excess to the said corporation; and in the event of its dissolution, to any of the creditors thereof, to the full amount of such excess, with legal interest from the time such liability accrued; and no statute of limitation shall be a bar to any suit against such directors for any sum of money for which they are made liable by this section. This statute provides for making one person individually liable for the debts of another, and prescribes how and under what circumstances he shall be held thus liable. Like other statutes which create a forfeiture or impose a penalty, it is to be strictly construed; and every intendment and presumption is in favor of the defendant in such cases. He is to be held liable only on full and strict proof of all the facts by the statute made essential to create the liability.

The evidence as to the "amount of capital stock paid in" was that a quartz mill and lode was put in, worth from $6,000 to $8,000, and that McKeon put in $1,095, and that the debts of the company, when it ceased to do business, amounted to $9,084. These facts would not be sufficient to show that the debts exceeded the amount of the capital paid in. There is no evidence that this was all the capital stock paid in, and that fact is not to be presumed. But it is urged that as the deed from the former owners of the mill and lode to the corporation expressed a consideration of only twelve dollars, therefore that is to be considered the amount paid in, instead of the real value of the property. We do not agree with the appellant on this point. The grantors in that deed were the members of the new corporation, and they evidently did not deem it important to insert the full value of the property as the consideration. The real consideration of a conveyance of property may always be inquired into, and the parties are not estopped by the deed from showing it. The value of the property thus conveyed was to be deemed as so much "capital stock actually paid in."

It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove also that these debts were contracted under the administration of the defendant, as one of the directors or trustees of the corporation, and that he was "present when the same did happen;" for "those who were not present when the same did happen" are expressly excepted from the liability imposed by the statute. In this case, there was no evidence whatever upon this material point. The verdict of the jury was therefore clearly in accordance with the law and evidence.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

In Matter of Estate of Pacheco.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF PACHECO.

When letters of administration have been granted to any other person than the surviving husband or wife, the child, father, mother, or brother of the intestate, and either of the persons occupying that relation to the deceased, present a petition to the Probate Court to have the letters of administration revoked, and to be appointed in place of the incumbent, it is the duty of the Probate Court to make the revocation, and appoint the petitioner, if he or she be competent to perform the duties of the trust.

The word "competent," as used in the sixty-ninth section of the Probate Act, and applied to a surviving husband, or wife, child, father, mother, or brother, means, not addicted to drunkenness, not imprudent, or wanting in integrity or understanding.

APPEAL from the Probate Court, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Chase and Brown, for Appellants.

Appellants submit that, as against the whole world beside, they have an absolute, unqualified, personal, statute right to have the appointment of respondents revoked.

Probate Act, Sec. 52, prescribes this absolute right, and the order of priority in cases of estates of intestates. Sec. 97 makes the same right and priority applicable to cases of estates devised, and where testamentary administration is sought. Sec. 67 grants the right of revocation, by petition, of letters granted to one not a relative. Such is the case at bar. Sec. 68 provides for issuance of citation to administrator to appear and answer such petition. Sec. 69 provides, that if the prior right of applicant be established, and he or she be not incompetent, the former letters "shall be revoked," and letters issued to applicant. Sec. 70 provides for the assertion of the prior right generally, even as against an administrator who is a relative, but has only a secondary right.

As to the foregoing provisions, it is submitted that they are expressed, each of them, in language too plain to warrant any attempt to construe or interpret them out of the natural import of the language used.

Appellants have, alike, absolute, unqualified, personal, statute right to have their nominees, in their petition named, appointed to administer upon said estate.

In the matter of this last proposition, the Probate Court had no discretion to exercise, save only in determining: first, whether the nominees, or either of them, were subject to statute disqualifications, as enumerated in Probate Act, Sec. 55; second, whether, in the case before him, the nominees were "equally entitled" with others. (Prob. Act, Sec. 54.) Sec. 66 provides, that one or more competent persons, though not legally entitled, may be appointed at request of those who are legally entitled. (Kirtlan's Estate, 16 Cal. 163.)

The statute grounds are the only grounds of disqualification, as against an applicant legally entitled, or entitled by request of one legally entitled. (Coope v. Lowery, 1 Barb. Ch. 45; Harrison v. McMahon, 1 Brad. Sur. 283.)

Where the applicants are equal in right, and not subject to statute disqualifications, then the majority of those in equal right, ceteris paribus, controls the minority, though the latter be in the same order of right. (Peters v. Public Administrator, 1 Brad. Sur. 207.)

Pratt & Clarke, for Respondent.

Under the provisions of our Probate Act, executors or administrators may be removed for the following causes:

1. For failing to render an exhibit, when required so to do by the Court. (Prob. Act, Sec. 227.)
2. For neglecting to give additional security, or file new bond, when so required by order of the Probate Court. (Sec. 81.)
3. For fraud, embezzlement, waste, removal from the State, or wrongfully neglecting the estate. (Secs. 281-283.)
4. When letters of administration have been granted to any other person, other than the surviving husband or wife, and a child, father, mother, or brother of intestate competent to the trust, applies for the revocation of such letters, and to have letters issue to such applicant. (Probate Act, Secs. 67-69.)

Of these several grounds for removal, the fourth and last is the only one upon which appellants rely in their efforts to remove respondent from the administration. Respondent contends that this ground is not tenable in this case, because—

1st. It is not a case within the provisions of Secs. 67–69. Those sections make provisions for such cases, and such cases only, as arise when a party dies intestate, and original letters of administration have been granted. Now, in this case, the record shows that Juana Sanchez de Pacheco, died intestate, and that respondent holds letters of administration, with the will annexed, duly issued after the original letters testamentary had been revoked. And, because,

2d. Under the provisions of Secs. 67–69, the applicant must not only be a child, father, mother, or brother of an intestate, but must in addition thereto, be by the Court adjudged “competent;” and the Court, in this case, passing upon the evidence before it, has adjudged the appellants not competent to the trust solicited.

The Court below refused to remove Emeric upon the showing of the petitioner, and until such removal, no new administrator can be appointed. With this action of the Probate Court refusing to remove Emeric, this Court will not interfere, unless it be clearly shown that there has been a gross abuse of discretion. (Deck's Estate, 6 Cal. 669.) This Court surely will not hold that the Probate Court has been guilty of a gross abuse of discretion, in refusing to remove an administrator whom it decreed both capable and faithful, that it might appoint one whom it adjudged not competent to the trust.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

Juana Sanchez de Pacheco died in 1853, leaving a last will and testament, appointing therein two executors, who administered upon the estate until their letters were revoked on account of mismanagement of the estate, and the respondent in this proceeding, Emeric, was duly appointed administrator, with the will annexed. Some time after the appointment, several of the children and grandchildren of the deceased, and who are the appellants herein, united in a petition praying that Emeric be removed from the administration of the estate, and that one of their number, Rosa Pacheco de Sibrian, and one Penniman, be appointed in his place, on the ground that he was not entitled to the position by any relationship to the deceased or interest in the estate; that his appointment was not requested by any of the children of the intestate; and other objections are urged in the petition filed by the appellants. The application was heard by the Court, who found the following facts: "That the estate of Juana Sanchez de Pacheco is one of great value, to wit: of the value of at least $100,000; that the acts of the present administrator in all respects meet the approval of this Court; that the petitioner, Rosa Pacheco de Sibrian, is wholly incompetent to perform the duties that would be devolved upon her as administratrix of said estate, and the applicant, Penniman, is a trespasser upon the property of the estate, and is a very improper person to be intrusted with an estate to the prosperity of which he is shown to be in interest opposed. The Court therefore, now, on this ninth day of December, denies said petition with costs against said applicant." From this judgment the applicants appeal.

The first point urged by the appellants is, that they have an absolute, unqualified, personal statutory right to have the appointment of the respondent revoked; and second, that they have the same right to have the applicants for letters appointed to administer upon said estate. One ground of objection to the continuance in office of the present administrator is, that the estate consists of a large tract of land, which has never been partitioned between the heirs; that several of the heirs are and have been for several years residing upon and occupying portions of the land, and that he has brought several suits against them to eject them therefrom, and to recover large sums for back rents, when he has means of the estate in his hands more than sufficient to pay all liabilities against the estate.

Sec. 67 of the Probate Act provides, that "when letters of administration have been granted to any other person than the surviving husband, or wife, the child, the father, mother, or brother of the intestate, any one of them may obtain the revocation of the letters by presenting to the Probate Court a petition praying the revocation, and that letters of administration be issued to him or her." The next section provides for issuing a citation to the administrator, and Sec. 69 is as follows: "At the time appointed, the citation having been duly served and returned, the Court shall proceed to hear the allegations and proofs of the parties; and if the right of the applicant is established, and he or she be competent, letters of administration shall be granted to the applicant, and the letters of the former administrator be revoked." The appellants contend that the incompetency referred to in this section must come within the disqualifications prescribed in Sec. 55 of the same act, which was amended in 1861, as follows: "No person shall be entitled to letters of administration who shall be, first, under the age of majority; or, second, who shall have been convicted of any infamous crime; or, third, who upon proof shall be adjudged by the Court incompetent to execute the duties of the trust by reason of drunkenness, imprudence, or want of integrity or understanding." (Stat. 1861, 632.) On the trial, it was admitted that one of the applicants, Rosa Pacheco de Sibrian, cannot read, write, or speak the English language; that she cannot read or write the Spanish; that she is sixty-nine years old, a Californian by birth, and a daughter of the intestate. It is not claimed that the other applicant, Penniman, is subject to any of the disqualifications mentioned in Sec. 55, nor is the other applicant properly included therein. The fact of her great age, and that she cannot read or write, and cannot speak English, do not show any want of understanding within the statute. It is true, they may render it difficult for her to perform some of her duties properly, yet they do not render it impossible.

In the case of Coops v. Lowerrre (1 Barb. Ch. 45), it was held by the Court of Chancery of New York, in construing a similar statute, that the Surrogate had no discretion to exclude a person declared by the statute to be entitled to a preference, except for some of the causes specified in the statute. And it was held, that no degree of legal or moral guilt or delinquency was sufficient to exclude a person from the administration, as the next of kin, in the cases of preference given by the statute, unless such person had been actually convicted of an infamous crime. In that case, the administration was granted to a person proved to be dishonest, and against whom a large judgment had been recovered in a case of crim.

Phoenix Water Company v. Fletcher.

con. The same principles were affirmed in the case of Harrison v. McMahon (1 Brad. 283), where the administration was granted to one charged with being addicted to gambling and betting, and who had no regular business except that of a gambler. We therefore hold that under the admissions and evidence in this case the daughter, Rosa Pacheco de Sibrian, was entitled to letters of administration.

The evidence in relation to the character and fitness of the other applicant, Penniman, is clear and conclusive in his favor; in fact, no evidence seems to have been introduced impeaching it. The finding of the Court was, that he was a trespasser upon the property of the estate; but the appellants offered to prove, on the trial, that he and his partner were the owners of five hundred acres of the land formerly belonging to the estate, and which he purchased from one of the heirs; but the Court refused to admit the evidence. How the Probate Judge could make such a finding, after excluding the evidence offered to disprove it, we cannot conceive. But even if the findings on this point were true, they form no just ground for his exclusion, where he is the choice of so large a proportion of the children as in this case. Under the admissions and evidence in this case, we think it clear that both the applicants are entitled to be appointed to administer upon the estate. All the facts necessary to show that the applicants were entitled to administration, were admitted by the parties at the trial, and it is not, therefore, necessary to send the case back for a new trial.

The orders appealed from are therefore reversed, and the Probate Court is directed to enter an order in accordance with this opinion.

PHOENIX WATER COMPANY v. FLETCHER et al.

The prior appropriator of a stream of water for mining purposes, has a right to have the water flow down above the point of his appropriation without interruption or diminution in quantity.

One who enters upon a stream of water above the prior appropriator and erects hydraulic works, must so construct them as not to impede the regularity of the flow of the water, if its irregular flow would injure the first appropriator.

Phoenix Water Company v. Fletcher.

A mere temporary or trivial irregularity in the flow of the water, such as does not cause actual injury to the prior appropriator below, will not be actionable; but if a sensible or positive injury be caused, such as would diminish the value of the water right, an action will lie, not only to recover damages, but to enjoin the future commission of the wrong.

Where special issues are submitted to a jury, they should include all questions of fact raised by the pleadings and necessary to determine the case, and should be separately and distinctly stated, so that each question should relate to only one fact.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, Tuolumne County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. P. Barber, for Appellants.

Let us examine the reasons assigned by the Court below for its decision:

1st. "That the dam was necessary for defendants' mill."

Admit this; but it by no means follows that the necessities of defendants can deprive us of prior vested rights.

2d. "That the water was suffered to flow into plaintiffs' ditch after its use by the mill."

True; but it was returned in an impure and deteriorated condition, being filled with refuse bark and sawdust, which is not attempted to be excused even on the plea of "necessity," and which would be a legitimate ground of action, even if defendants had been prior instead of subsequent locators. A proprietor above cannot use the water so as to corrupt or impair its quality to the injury of others, as in permitting sawdust to fall into it. (Lewis v. Stein, 16 Ala. 218.) We make no complaint as to the mere user of the water by defendants, but they cannot destroy its utility for our user—a fortiori where we have a prior right.

3d. "That the injury was damnum absque injuria."

This is certainly a novel application of the rule. (20 Barb. 645.) Broom (Legal Maxims, 156) says: "It frequently happens in the ordinary proceedings of life, that a man may lawfully use his own property so as to cause damage to his neighbor, provided it be not injurious; or he may, while pursuing the reasonable exercise of an established right, casually cause an injury which the law will regard as a misfortune merely, and for which the party from whose act it proceeds will be liable neither at law nor in conscience."

All these conditions are wanting in the present case.

I. The deterioration of the water by sawdust and refuse bark was not a lawful use of it.

II. This was not defendants' "own property." So far as prior appropriation could establish the right, it was that of plaintiffs'.

III. This abuse of defendants' user was "injuriousum" to plaintiffs'.

IV. Defendants, as against us, were not in the exercise of any "established right," for our rights being prior in point of time were superior in law. (Tuolumne County Water Co. v. Chapman, 8 Cal. 392; Angell on Water Courses, 159, Sec. 140; Id. 412, Sec. 335.)

As to the user by defendants of the water for over five years, that makes no difference; it is not the use, but the abuse of this user that we complain of. They have not pleaded any right to accelerate or retard the natural flow of the water; nor to throw sawdust or refuse bark into it. The rule of law is, that until plaintiffs sustained damage from the abuse of defendants' user, no claim of prescription would lie against them—the Statute of Limitations running, not from the date of the lawful use, but the unlawful abuse. (Murtrugoza v. Robinson, 7 Ellis & B. 391.)

We refer to the following authorities as showing the decisions of this Court as to water rights acquired by prior appropriation: (5 Cal. 145, 146; 6 Id. 108; 7 Id. 49, 262, 329; 8 Id. 336; 11 Id. 154; 12 Id. 47; 13 Id. 38, 233; 15 Id. 181; 3 Kent. 595.)

There are three legal maxims peculiarly applicable to this case: "Qui prior est in tempore potior est in jure;" "Ubi jus ibi remedium;" "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas."

John Reynolds, for Respondents.

In the case cited by appellants' counsel, from 20 Barb. 644, the Court held, that it was no answer to the violation of a clear legal right, that the injury was nominal. So in this case, if the defendants had no right in common with the plaintiffs to use this water, then the finding that the injury was nominal would be no answer, according to this authority. But in the case at bar, the defendants have a clear right to use the water for mill purposes, if they use it in a reasonable manner—if no actual and material injury results therefrom to the plaintiffs. And the defendants have a right to use the water for mill purposes in any manner they please, if no material injury results to the plaintiffs.

In the case of Bear River Co. v. York Mining Co. (8 Cal. 336), this Court say:

1st. The ditch owner is entitled to have the water flow, without material interruption, in its natural channel.

This right would seem to be compatible, in general, with the fair use of the water above.

2d. He is entitled to the water, so undiminished in quantity, as to leave sufficient to fill his ditch as it existed at the time the locations were made above.

In the case of Butte Canal and Ditch Co. v. Vaughn (11 Cal. 153), the Court say: "The first appropriator of the water of a stream passing through the public lands in this State, has the right to insist that the water shall be subject to his use and enjoyment to the extent of his original appropriation, and that its quality shall not be impaired so as to defeat the purpose of its appropriation. To this extent his rights go, and no further. In subordination to these rights, subsequent appropriators may make such use of the channel of the stream as they think proper."

The special findings show that the defendants used the water in subordination to these rights of plaintiffs; that no damage was done to the waters which materially affected the use of the water by plaintiffs for the purposes for which they had appropriated it.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who are the owners of a sawmill on a stream, the waters of which the plaintiffs claim by prior appropriation for mining purposes, from interfering with the regular flow of water to plaintiffs' ditch, and from throwing sawdust and other refuse into the water, to the plaintiffs' injury. Special issues were submitted to a jury, who returned the following special verdict: "First. At what time did the plaintiffs' grantors appropriate the waters of Sugar Pine Creek for mining purposes? Answer: March, 1852. Second. At what time were the waters of Sugar Pine Creek appropriated by defendants' grantors for mill purposes? Answer: July, 1852. Third. Is the injury inevitable, and can the defendants have and enjoy the mill in the place they do, without creating the injury? Answer: Yes. Fourth. Do defendants use the water in running their mill in a reasonable way, and if any injury is had to plaintiffs, is it nominal, merely? Answer: Yes." The plaintiffs moved for perpetual injunction, to restrain the defendants from doing the acts complained of; which the Court denied, and ordered that the restraining order, issued at the commencement of the action, be dissolved, and that the bill be dismissed with costs; from which judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The injuries complained of are: first, that the defendants' dam, which is above the plaintiffs' ditch, causes the water to flow irregularly, at times holding it back, and suffering but a small quantity to flow to the plaintiffs' ditch, and at others letting it down in greatly increased quantity; second, that the sawdust and refuse bark of the sawmill is thrown into the stream by the defendants, clogging and filling the plaintiffs' ditches and reservoirs, and thereby diminishing their capacity to flow and hold water. The evidence shows that these are serious injuries to the plaintiffs, causing them considerable loss and damage; but after the evidence was closed, the plaintiffs' counsel stated to the Court and jury that they did not care about the amount of damages, and would consent that they should be considered as merely nominal, as the suit was brought for the purpose of protecting plaintiffs' rights, and not for the amount of damages. This may have induced the jury to find that the damages were merely nominal. The Court refused the injunction and dismissed the action, "on the ground that the dam was necessary for the defendants' mill, that the water was flowed into plaintiffs' ditch after its use by the mill, and that the injury was damnum absque injuria," to which the plaintiffs excepted.

It is not controverted that the plaintiffs have a prior right to the use of the water of the stream, and that the defendants have done and continue to do the acts complained of; and the real question is, whether the injuries are of such a character as to entitle the plaintiffs to a remedy by injunction, to restrain the defendants from the future commission of the acts complained of.

First, then, as to the injury caused by the irregularity of the flow of water. The importance of a regular flow of water to mining ditches is apparent. The profits of the business of mining depend, to a very great extent, upon a steady, constant supply of water, flowing with regularity to the reservoirs constructed to receive and hold it, and regularly distributed to the miners who depend upon it for their supply. The rule of law is well established, that the owner of hydraulic works on the stream above, has no right to detain the water unreasonably. He must so construct his mill, or other works, and so use the water, that all persons below him, who have a prior or equal right to the use of the water, may participate in its use and enjoyment without interruption. Still, a mere temporary or trivial irregularity in the flow of water, such as does not cause actual injury to the proprietor below, will not amount to an actionable injury. The question, in such cases, will turn upon the nature and extent of the injury. It is said that the proprietors above have a right to a reasonable use of the water; but the true test of this is, whether such use causes any positive or sensible injury to the prior appropriator or proprietor below, by diminishing the value of the right. (Angell on Water Courses, Secs. 115-118; Merritt v. Brinkerhoof, 17 J. R. 306; Tyler v. Wilkinson, 4 Mason, 401.)

In this case the jury found that the defendants could enjoy the mill in the place it was located, without creating injury; but the dam was necessary for the defendants' mill; evidently predicated its action upon the idea that if it was necessary for the use of the mill, the plaintiffs had no right to complain. This is clearly an erroneous view of the principles governing such cases, as we have already shown. It is true that the jury found that the defendants used the water in a reasonable way, coupled with a finding that the plaintiffs' damages were merely nominal. But, as already stated, the latter finding may have been predicated upon the statement of the plaintiffs' counsel that they would only ask nominal damages, as they were not the main object of the suit.

Besides, the third and fourth questions were submitted to the jury, at the request of the defendants, the plaintiffs' counsel objecting thereto, and one of the assignments of error is, that the Court erred in submitting them. Each question submitted to a jury as a basis for a special verdict, should relate only to one fact; and grouping together several facts, as was done in these two questions, was very objectionable. The evil of this practice is evident, when we consider the answer to the third question in this case, which is in the affirmative as to the two facts stated in the question. The answer as to one of these facts, to be consistent, should be directly the contrary of the other. They answer that the injury was inevitable, and yet the defendant could have enjoyed the mill without creating the injury. Although the same contradiction does not exist in the answer to the fourth question, yet the two facts submitted therein should have been separated, and put in two questions instead of one. The great difficulty in applying the principle of law to the case, arises from the manner in which those questions were framed and submitted. The Court therefore erred in overruling the objection.

The next question is as to the right of action caused by throwing sawdust and refuse bark into the stream, causing damage thereby to the plaintiffs. This kind of injury to water is a peculiar one, as, while the actual quantity of the water in the stream is not thereby materially diminished, yet these acts so affect the water as to materially diminish the quantity the plaintiffs are able to take from the stream and use for mining purposes. Practically, it is well known to be a serious injury, very materially diminishing the value and profits of the ditch property. As prior appropriators the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for such injuries, and to be protected from future loss. The prior appropriator is clearly entitled to protection against acts which materially diminish the quantity of water to which he is entitled, or deteriorate its quality, for the uses to which he wishes to apply it. This rule was applied to a case where sawdust from a mill was thrown into a stream near the City of Mobile, which injured the water for the use of the parties below. (Lewis v. Stein, 16 Ala. 214.) So it has been applied to a tannery. (Howell v. McCoy, 3 Rawle, 256.) So to water corrupted by mining operations. (Magor v. Chadwick, 11 A. & E. 571.) So to throwing dead animals in a spring. (Tate v. Parrish, 7 Monroe, 325.) In the case of Hill v. King (8 Cal. 336) and The Bear River and Auburn Water and Mining Co. v. The York Mining Co. (Id. 327), the question as to the liability of mining companies, on a stream above a ditch, for damages caused by mixing the water with mud and sediment, was examined, and one conclusion was that the prior appropriator below was entitled to the water so as to fill his ditch as it existed at the time of subsequent locations above; and that such subsequent locators had no right to so use the water as to diminish the quantity to which the prior appropriator was entitled.

The evidence shows that there was no necessity for throwing that refuse of the mill into the stream; and that prior owners of the mill wheeled it away; and the jury found that the defendant could enjoy the mill without creating the injury. The evidence also shows that these acts cause very material injury to the plaintiffs; but there is no finding of the Court or jury upon this important question. It is true that the Court gave, as a reason for dismissing the action, "that the injury was damnum absque injuria;" but it would seem that this remark was intended to apply solely to the first ground of the action, to wit: the irregularity of the flow of water; but if it was intended to include also the acts we are now examining, then it is clearly contrary to the evidence. It is probable, however, that this reason was intended as an announcement of a principle of law, governing both classes of injuries complained of; and if so, it is clearly erroneous. So that in any view of the case, there is error in the proceedings of the Court below. In cases where special issues are submitted to a jury, it is important that they should include all questions of fact raised by the pleadings and necessary to determine the cause, and that they should be separately and distinctly stated. The record in this case is very defective in this respect. Not only are some of the questions objectionable for not stating the points separately, but several important issues were not submitted to the jury. Under these circumstances, the plaintiffs are entitled to a new trial.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

McDermott v. Higby.

McDERMOTT v. HIGBY.

WHEN the jury are directed by the Court to find a general verdict, and also to make a special finding of facts upon questions submitted to them—and a general verdict is returned in favor of one party, while the findings upon the special issues are in favor of the other party—the Court should render judgment in accordance with the special findings, if they embrace all the issues raised in the pleadings. If, however, there is any one issue in the pleadings, not covered by the special findings, the judgment should be rendered on the general verdict.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tod Robinson, for Appellant.

Wm. Higby, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages for an alleged diversion of water claimed by the plaintiff. The defendant, among other defenses, sets up an abandonment of the water right claimed by the plaintiff, by those under whom he claimed. The case was tried by a jury who were directed to return a general verdict, and also a special verdict upon several questions submitted to them by the Court. They accordingly returned a general verdict for the defendant, and a special verdict upon the questions submitted in favor of the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered for the defendant; and it is contended that in this the Court erred. Sec. 175 of the Practice Act provides, that "where a special finding of facts shall be inconsistent with the general verdict, the former shall control the latter; and the Court shall give judgment accordingly." It is urged, that the judgment rendered in this case is in violation of this clause of the statute. It would undoubtedly be so, if the special verdict had been upon all the issues in the case; but none of these special findings are upon the issue of abandonment; and if the jury founded their general verdict, in favor of the defendant, upon that one issue alone, the special verdict is not "inconsistent" with the general verdict. A special verdict upon a single point may often determine the whole case, either for the defendant or plaintiff; and in such case the special verdict would control any general verdict to the contrary. But where the special findings do not have such controlling effect — if they do not include issues which, if found for the defendant, would sustain a general verdict in his favor — the special verdict cannot properly be deemed "inconsistent with the general verdict." This was probably the view taken by the Court below in rendering the judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

NATOMA WATER AND MINING CO. v. McCOY et al.

THE owners of a ditch, by which the waters of a stream have been first appropriated, are entitled to recover damages for injury or loss sustained, caused by dams or other obstructions having been erected on the stream, above the head of the ditch, by which the regularity of the flow of its waters is so disturbed as to cause actual injury or loss to the proprietors of the ditch.

On the trial of an action to recover such damages, proof that in consequence of the irregularity of the flow of water, the owners of the ditch have lost their customers, is competent evidence.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, City and County of Sacramento.

This action was commenced on the twenty-first day of June, 1861. The complaint averred, that plaintiffs for four years had owned and possessed a water ditch, starting out of Alder Creek, about one mile below Prairie City, by which ditch plaintiffs had appropriated and used the waters of said Alder Creek for mining purposes, during all that time, except as disturbed by defendants; and that defendants, about the first day of June, 1861, had erected a dam across Alder Creek, about one-half a mile below Prairie City, by which they had obstructed the flow of water in Alder Creek; and that plaintiffs had suffered great loss by means of the irregularity of the flow of water, and would sustain a loss of one hundred dollars per week, in future, etc. The answer set up that defendants were miners, and had entered upon the bed of Alder Creek, for mining purposes, and had erected a dam and placed some twenty sluice-boxes in the bed of the creek, each about twelve feet long, and that by means of the dam, they conducted the water through the sluice-boxes, and emptied it again into the creek, about one-fourth of a mile above plaintiffs' dam. The answer also denied that plaintiffs had sustained, or would sustain any injury from defendants' acts. The jury found a verdict for defendants. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, which was denied by the Court; and from the order denying a new trial, plaintiffs appealed.

A. P. Catlin, for Appellants.

Defendants are liable to the plaintiffs for the damages sustained by them, by the detention of the body of water confined in the dam and reservoir of the defendants. (Bear River Co. v. York Mining Co., 8 Cal. 327.) Second, defendants are liable for the damages caused by the irregularity in the flow of water caused by them. (Id.) This is not a case of conflicting evidence upon any of the facts. The defendants simply claim that they, as miners, have a right to use the water in the manner in which they did use it. In regard to their manner of using it, there is no conflict of evidence. The only evidence introduced by the defendants, is to the effect that the natural and usual flow of Alder Creek varied upon different days, being more on some days and less on others. If this were so, it does not justify defendants in causing additional irregularities.

Frank Hereford, for Respondents.

I deem it entirely unnecessary to file any extended brief in reply to the argument of the appellants, or the authorities cited by him. As to the objection that the Court erred in striking out evidence, which tended to prove a loss of customers, I think the authorities cited by the appellants show that the Court was correct in holding that it was too remote.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover damages, arising from an irregularity of the flow of water to the plaintiffs' dam and ditches, on Alder Creek, caused by a dam erected by the defendants on the creek above. The right of the prior appropriator of water to recover damages for such an injury was settled by this Court, in the case of The Phoenix Water Co. v. Fletcher (23 Cal. 481).

Murray v. Board of Supervisors of Mariposa County.

'At the trial, the Court excluded the evidence offered by the plaintiffs, to show that the irregularity of the flow of water was a material injury to them, as in consequence of such irregularity they lost their customers, who refused to purchase water from them. In the case above referred to, it was held that a mere temporary or trivial irregularity in the flow of water, such as does not cause actual injury to the proprietor below, would not amount to an actionable injury. The question will turn, in such cases, upon the nature and extent of the injury. In such cases, evidence of the kind offered by the plaintiffs, was clearly admissible, as showing that the damage to the plaintiff was not trivial or temporary, but of such a character as to cause actual and serious injury to him. More pertinent evidence to prove that fact, could hardly be produced. The Court, therefore, erred in excluding it. The fact that the defendants are miners, and hold the water back, causing it to flow irregularly to the plaintiffs, who are prior appropriators of the waters of the stream, does not take the case out of the rule laid down in the case of The Phoenix Water Co. v. Fletcher.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MURRAY v. BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF MARIPOSA COUNTY.

THE District Courts have power to grant writs of certiorari, to review the action of a Board of Supervisors in granting a ferry license.

A complaint which avers that plaintiff is the owner of a ferry franchise over a stream, and that the Board of Supervisors have granted license to another person to establish a ferry within less than one mile of plaintiff's ferry, without having published the notice required by statute; and that such ferry is not required by public convenience, nor rendered necessary by the intervention of any creek or ravine; and that the reason given by the board, in their minutes, for granting the license, was, that no legal excuse was shown why it should not be granted, states sufficient facts to authorize the issuance of a writ of certiorari.

Murray v. Board of Supervisors of Mariposa County.

APPEAL from the District Court, Thirteenth Judicial District, Mariposa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Coffroth & Spaulding, for Appellant.

The Board of Supervisors had no power to grant the second license, until it should affirmatively appear in evidence before them that public convenience, or some other one of the reasons enumerated in Sec. 6 of the act, existed at the time. (Wood's Dig. 460.) No such fact was established before the board; and the record of the board shows that no evidence, whatever, was taken before them. Thus the facts disclosed in the petition show that the Board of Supervisors acted without jurisdiction in granting the license above referred to. Certiorari is the proper remedy. (The People v. Supervisors of El Dorado Co., 8 Cal. 61.)

H. H. Hartley, for Respondents.

The petition of plaintiff shows no grounds for the issuance of the writ, and the demurrer was properly overruled. It exhibited on its face, the fact, that the Board of Supervisors heard his remonstrance, and decided that he had given no legal excuse why the ferry license complained of by him should not have been granted. This was conclusive of the case. It was not necessary for the board to have spread upon their records the reasons why they had come to the conclusion they did. It was sufficient that the appellant had a hearing before them, and they decided against him. The Board of Supervisors of each county is vested with almost exclusive control over ferries, bridges, and roads; and their action is almost final, and will not be disturbed, except in cases of the most manifest abuse of their discretion. (Waugh v. Chauncey, 13 Cal. 11; 7 Id. 287.)

In this case, the appellant, himself, shows that the Board did recite in their record, that he had had a hearing before them; and that they had considered the reasons assigned by him, but found them insufficient. The writ, therefore, was properly refused, and the judgment of the Court below should be affirmed.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an application for a writ of certiorari to issue to the defendants, commanding them to certify to the District Court the proceedings of the Board of Supervisors, relating to the granting of certain ferry licenses, and that their action therein be vacated and set aside. The defendants appeared, and demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or to authorize the writ. The Court sustained the demurrer, and rendered final judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint avers that the plaintiff is the owner, and has been for a long time, of a franchise, sometimes a bridge, and at others, a ferry franchise, over the Merced River, at a certain place; that the Board of Supervisors, without the notice required by statute, granted a ferry license to one Nelson, to run a ferry across said river, about twenty rods above the place of plaintiff's ferry; and that such ferry is not required by public convenience, nor is it rendered necessary by the intervention of any creek or ravine; that he appeared before said Board of Supervisors and opposed the granting of the license to Nelson, on the ground that the granting of the license was in violation of the statute; that the reason given by the board, in their minutes, for granting the license, was, that due notice of the application had been given, and no legal excuse was shown why it should not be granted.

Although the complaint is very imperfectly drawn, and is not very clear in its averments, still there are sufficient facts stated to authorize the issuing of the writ. The objections to the proceedings appear to be: 1st, that the proper notices had not been published or served, as required by the statute, to give the Board of Supervisors jurisdiction in the matter; 2d, that the record of the board merely shows that the license was issued on the ground that no legal excuse was shown against it, when it should show affirmatively that it was required by the public convenience, or by the situation of a town or village, or the crossing of a public highway, or that the intervention of some creek or highway renders it necessary under the provisions of Sec. 6 of the Act concerning Ferries and Toll Bridges. (Wood's Dig. 460.) Sec. 456 of the Practice Act authorizes the writ of certiorari to issue "in all cases where an inferior tribunal, board, or officer, exercising judicial functions, has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the Court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

There can be no doubt of the power of the District Courts to grant a writ of certiorari to review the action of a Board of Supervisors in granting a ferry license. (Waugh v. Chauncey, 13 Cal. 11; Fall v. Paine, 23 Id. 302; Robinson v. Board of Supervisors of Sacramento, 16 Id. 208; People v. Supervisors of El Dorado, 8 Id. 58.) The District Court has a clear right, upon the return of the writ of certiorari, to determine at least whether the board had jurisdiction of the proceeding in which the license was issued, and whether it was a case within the provisions of the statute authorizing a ferry to be established within one mile of a regularly established ferry or toll-bridge. The averments of the complaint are sufficient to show that in fact it was not such a case as would authorize them to issue a license for a new ferry, and that the proper notices necessary to give the board jurisdiction of the matter had not been served or published. Those are questions to be determined upon the return of the writ.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, and the defendants are required to answer the complaint within ten days from the service of notice of the filing of the remittitur in the Court below.

BULLOOK v. HUBBARD et al.

B. & L. were partners. B. & L. as a partnership was also a member of two other firms—B., L. & S., and B., L., S. & D. The firms all failed, and their property was attached by creditors. The creditors of B., L. & S. and B., L., S. & D. obtained the first attachments, and placed them in the hands of the Sheriff, before the creditors of B. & L. placed their's in his hands. The Sheriff levied all the writs on the property in the order in which they were placed in his hands. The Sheriff had in his hands a sum of money received from the sale of the property of B. & L. to apply on the executions issued on judgments rendered in the actions:

Bullock v. Hubbard.

Held, that the creditors of B. & L. were entitled to the money; and that, where a partnership is composed of two or more firms, the creditors of one of the firms are entitled to a preference in the payment of their debts, over the creditors of the whole partnership, out of money the proceeds of the property of that firm.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

Bishop & Long were general partners. The partnership extended to several kinds of business, including farming, and buying, and selling, and raising stock. The firm of Bishop & Long, as a partnership, entered into a partnership with Seifert & Dodsworth, in the butchering business. The firm of Bishop & Long, as a partnership, also entered into a partnership with Stewart, in buying, raising, and selling sheep.

Hubbard, Hall, and Allen were creditors of Bishop & Long and Seifert & Dodsworth; and were also creditors of Bishop & Long and Stewart. Duncan was a creditor of both said partnerships. Reed was a creditor of Bishop & Long. The partnerships failed, and said creditors procured attachments. The attachments of Hubbard, Hall & Allen, and Duncan, were issued and placed in the Sheriff's hands, before Reed procured his. When the Sheriff made the levy, he had all the attachments in his hands, and made a levy on all the property, by virtue of each, but in the order in which they had been placed in his hands.

Judgments were rendered in all the actions on the same day, and executions issued on the judgments and placed in the Sheriff's hands on the same day. The money received from the sale of the property of Bishop, Long, Seifert & Dodsworth, and Bishop, Long & Stewart, did not satisfy the executions against those firms; and the Sheriff then had remaining in his hands about $1,800, the proceeds of the property of Bishop & Long. Hubbard, Hall & Allen, Duncan, and Reed, each, claimed this money—Hubbard, Hall & Allen, and Duncan, because their attachments were prior in point of time — and Reed, because he was a creditor of Bishop & Long. The Sheriff commenced an action requiring the creditors to litigate their respective rights to the money. The District Court rendered judgment awarding the money to Reed and Hubbard, Hall & Allen; and Duncan appealed. It was stipulated that the decision should be made according to the principles governing Courts of Equity in such cases.

A. S. Higgins, for Appellants.

The firm of Bishop & Long occupied the position of an individual member of the partnerships of Bishop, Long, Seifert & Doda-worth, and Bishop, Long & Stewart. Bishop had no separate interest in either of said partnerships—nor had Long. Reed, then, was a creditor of an individual member of each of the said firms, to wit: Bishop & Long.

The contract of a partnership is in its character joint and several, and not simply a joint contract. All are liable, both collectively and individually, and the creditor has a right to look for the satisfaction of his debt, either to the partnership or its individual members, or to both; and his attachment or execution may in the first instance be levied upon the joint property or the property of the individual members, or any of them. This conclusion is irresistible, if the partnership contract is in its character joint and several—for it must be considered like any other joint and several contract.

“Every partnership debt is joint and several, and in all such cases resort may primarily be had for the debt to the surviving partners, or to the assets of the dissevered partners,” etc. (Story’s Eq. Jur. 6th Ed. 676; Id. on Part. Sec. 362; 7 Eng. Ch. 588.) “It is now established beyond controversy, that in the consideration of Courts of Equity, a partnership debt is several as well as joint.” (Coll. on Part. Sec. 580, and cases cited.)

The indebtedness being in its nature joint and several, and creditors entitled to pursue their remedy against the joint assets, or the individual property of the respective parties, or both, is there any rule of law by which the private creditor of an individual partner can be preferred before a partnership creditor in his remedy against the private estate? It is true, that a partnership creditor is preferred to the extent of partnership assets, before a private creditor of an individual partner; and the reason of the rule is too obvious to require a statement. But no such reason exists in the other case; neither does the rule itself. In the one case, it is impossible to ascertain the interest of the individual partner until partnership debts are paid, for his interest only relates to the surplus which may remain; while in the other, his interest and property is definite and certain, having no connection with the rights or interest of others. Again, in the case of partnership, each partner is entitled to the payment of the partnership debts out of the partnership fund; and thus the partnership creditor is preferred through the operation of the equities between the partners themselves.

It will be found that all the cases giving to private creditors preference over the partnership creditor upon the private estate, arise under the old rule in bankruptcy, or voluntary assignment of a debtor for the benefit of creditors, when a Court of Equity distributes the assets of the bankrupt or insolvent, giving to each class of creditors priority and preference upon the particular property belonging to its class; and this has been adopted even in such cases, more as a rule of convenience, than as founded in law and equity.

In the case of Tucker v. Oxley, Assignee (5 Cranch), Chief Justice Marshall holds, that a joint creditor has a right to go upon the private estate of an individual partner equally with his private creditor, in the absence of a statute of bankruptcy, and cannot be restrained, to the preference of any individual creditor, without the power of a Court of Equity; and this rule in bankruptcy is "an equitable restraint on the legal rights of parties." (See also Dorr v. Shaw, 4 Johns. Ch. 18, 19.)

I have been unable to find any cases in our American Reports controverting the position above taken, while there are numerous cases supporting it. The English cases relied upon in support of the preference of the private creditor upon the private estate are, without exception, based upon the rule of distribution in bankruptcy; and even under that rule, the English cases present great doubt and conflict of authority.

Bullock v. Hubbard.

The question is very ably considered and numerous and leading cases collated in the case of Bed et al. v. Newman (5 Scarb. & R. 77), particularly in the opinion of Duncan, J. (Id. 95-100). The Court will observe that the particular rate of distribution in that case was adopted because of the express requirement of the statute; but the general reasoning and law of the case apply directly to this, and support the position taken by the appellant Duncan, and his right to priority in claim upon this fund.

Another case, presenting directly the point in this, and sustaining the position that, "the separate property of each member of a copartnership is liable to be attached for the debts due from the copartnership, and having been thus attached, the lien thus acquired is not to be defeated by a subsequent attachment by a separate creditor. (Allen v. Wells et al., 22 Pick. 450; Bardwell v. Perry et al., 19 Vt., 4 Wash., 292.)

If the position which we have assumed be correct, then the judgment of the Court below is erroneous, in preferring separate creditors subsequent in attachment and lien upon the separate property, to partnership creditors, who are first in these attachments; and appellants are entitled to a reversal of the judgment and relief accordingly.

Tuttle & Hillyer, for Respondent.

It is a general principle in equity, that the creditors of a partnership have a prior claim to the funds of the copartnership for the payment of their demands; and that creditors of separate members of a firm have, in like manner, a prior claim to the separate funds; and though this rule had its foundation in bankruptcy cases, yet it is now applied in all cases where funds of either character are to be distributed; and equity will interfere to prevent any different distribution.

In England, with the exception of one or two decisions made by Lord Thurlow, the cases are uniform. (3 Vesey, Jun. 288; 9 Id. 118; 2 Russ. 191.)

In America, there is some conflict, but the best authority supports the proposition as stated. (3 Kent's Com. 65-77, 9th Ed.; 3 Paige's Ch. 168; 1 Har. & Gill. 96; 6 Mass. 42; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 675; 5 Johns. Ch. 60.) Appellant relies upon 22 Pick., 5 Serg. & Rawl., and 19 Vt. The case in 22 Pick. is an admitted departure from the general rule, based upon no authority, except one previous decision of that Court. It is not this case, because the fact of insolvency did not appear, and because Bishop & Long are not an individual, but a partnership, whose creditors have the equitable lien of partnership creditors. The inequity of the rule there laid down is shown in the statement at the close of the opinion, that the Legislature had revived the old rule. The case in 3 Serg. & Rawl. is authority for nothing. Three Judges rendered opinions, and no two agreed. Probably Justice Gibson had the best of the argument. The case in 19 Vt. 278, is not an authority against us, but in our favor. Two cases in this Court (the only ones touching the question) affirm the old rule, to this extent: that the creditors of a partnership have a lien upon the partnership property for their demands, which will prevail against a prior attachment by an individual creditor; and this without reference to the fact of insolvency or the tribunal in which this question is raised. (Conroy v. Woods, 13 Cal. 626; Chase v. Steel, 9 Id. 64.) The reason of the rule is stated to be, that the partnership creditors, when they become such, trust to the partnership fund, and the individual creditors to the separate estate. This reason, whether of much or little force, applies with its full strength to a case of two firms situated as these were.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action in the nature of a suit in equity, brought by the plaintiff, Sheriff of Placer County, against the defendants, who are the judgment creditors of three partnership firms: one composed of "Bishop & Long," the second of "Bishop, Long, Siefert & Dods-worth;" and the other of "Bishop, Long & Stewart," to determine which of said creditors are entitled to a sum of money in his hands — the proceeds of the sale of certain partnership property, owned by the firm of "Bishop & Long." It seems that the same Bishop & Long were members of each of these partnership firms, and each firm was engaged in carrying on separate kinds of business—each owning its separate partnership property. The property levied upon and sold by the Sheriff, was owned by the firm of "Bishop & Long," and none of the others, as partnership firms, had any interest therein. The Court below held, that the creditors of the firm of "Bishop & Long" were entitled to the money realized from the sale in order of the priority of their several attachment liens; and judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the other defendants appeal.

The judgment of the Court below is correct. It has been repeatedly decided by this Court, that the creditors of a partnership are entitled to a preference over the creditors of the individual partners in the payment of their debts out of the partnership property, or moneys arising therefrom, without regard to the priority of attachment liens. (Chase v. Steel, 9 Cal. 64; Conroy v. Woods, 13 Id. 626; Dupuy v. Leavenworth, 17 Id. 262; Burpee v. Bunn, 22 Id. 194.) And the same principle applies as between the creditors and several partnership firms as in the present case.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUGHES v. DEVLIN.

Persons claiming and in the possession of mining claims upon the public lands of the United States, are as between themselves, and all other persons except the United States, owners of the same, having a vested right of property founded on their possession and appropriation of the land containing the mine.

When a mining claim upon the public lands is claimed and possessed by several as joint tenants, tenants in common, or as coparceners, or even as partners, such several interests or estates are in the nature of an estate of inheritance, and liable to be partitioned between the several claimants the same as other real property.

The mere fact that a mining claim is owned and worked by several persons as partners, is no valid objection to a partition of the same between the owners, where the answer does not set up, and it is not shown, that a suit in equity is necessary to settle the accounts and adjust the business of the partnership; and all the material allegations in a complaint for partition of real property which are not denied by the answer, are deemed admitted for the purposes of the trial.

Hughes v. Devlin.

APPEAL from the District Court, Ninth Judicial District, Shasta County.

The complaint averred that plaintiff and defendant were, and for a long time had been, tenants in common, owners and holders of certain mining claims, and a water ditch (describing the same), and that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the undivided two-thirds part, and the defendant of the undivided one-third part of said property. The complaint further averred, that plaintiff was desirous of having and demanded partition of said property, and every parcel thereof, according to the respective rights of the parties in interest; and that on the hearing of the cause, plaintiff would show that the property, from its nature and peculiar character, could not be divided without great prejudice to the rights and interests of the respective owners.

The following is a copy of all the material portions of the answer:

"The defendant admits that he has and holds a possessory and usufructuary interest of the one-third part or share of all and each and every piece and parcel of the estate and property named and described in the complaint; but this defendant denies that he has or holds an estate of inheritance in the said property, or any part thereof, and avers that the said plaintiff has not, and that he never had or held an estate of inheritance in the said property, or in any part or parcel of the same; but, on the contrary thereof, this defendant alleges that the mining grounds in the said complaint described, are of and belong to the public lands and domain of the United States; and this defendant says, that neither himself nor the said plaintiff has or holds any right or title under the United States or any person, and that neither this defendant nor the plaintiff has, holds, or possesses the said property, or any part thereof, by any right or tenure, which gives them or either of them, an estate of inheritance therein.

And the defendant further shows, that the said plaintiff and this defendant are partners in the business of mining, and that they are carrying on the business of mining with and upon the said mining grounds, and by means of the said ditch, and the waters therein flowing; and that the said ground, claims, ditch and waters constitute the capital stock and means upon and by means of which the said copartnership business is carried on and conducted to the great benefit and advantage of the said plaintiff and defendant.

The plaintiff demurred to the answer; the Court sustained the demurrer; defendant declined to amend; and the Court without hearing any evidence gave plaintiff judgment in accordance with the prayer of his complaint.

Defendant appealed.

Robinson & McConnell, for Appellant.

The first point relied on by appellant is, that the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer to defendant's answer. The demurrer admits the truth of the facts alleged in the answer. (Selkirk v. Sacramento County, 3 Cal. 326; Tuolumne Water Co. v. Chapman, 8 Id. 397.) Anything may be pleaded which will abate the action, or bar the petitioner's right to a judgment. (1 Whitaker's Practice, 499; Buel v. Child, 4 How. 125.) The question then is, whether the facts set up in the answer constitute a defense to the action.

The complaint sets up the fact that the mining claims and water ditch, for which partition is asked, are held by the plaintiff and defendant as tenants in common, and that the plaintiff and defendant each have in the premises in question an estate of inheritance.

These allegations are substantially denied by the defendant, and the answer shows that the plaintiff and defendant are partners in the business of mining, and that they are carrying on the business of mining with and upon the said mining grounds, and by means of the said ditch, and the water therein flowing. There being then, a partnership between the parties, it is hardly necessary to say that the present action cannot be maintained; that the only remedy of the plaintiff is by the bill in equity to dissolve the partnership and obtain an account. (Nugent v. Locke, 4 Cal. 320; Stone v. Fourie, 3 Id. 294; Wilson v. Lassen, 5 Id. 116; Barnstead v. Empire Mining Co. 5 Id. 299.)

The answer having set up the partnership of the parties, and the truth of the same being admitted by plaintiff's demurrer, it constitutes a complete defense to plaintiff's action, and the Court therefore erred in sustaining the demurrer. The second point made by appellant is, that the Court erred in rendering judgment for the sale of the premises in question, without evidence. The statute only authorizes a sale of the property when it appears to the satisfaction of the Court, by the evidence, that the premises are so situated that partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners. (Pr. Act, Sec. 275.)

"In general, a partition should be denied rather than a sale. The latter course is authorized only in cases where an actual partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners. If, therefore, a sale would be equally prejudicial, an actual partition should be made." (Willard's Eq. Jur. 703; Smith v. Smith, 10 Paige, 470.)

The third point upon which the appellant relies is, that the Court erred in rendering a judgment for the sale of the premises in question without having ascertained the title by proof to the satisfaction of the Court. The statute expressly requires that before the judgment of sale shall be made, the title shall be ascertained by proof, to the satisfaction of the Court; and where service of the complaint has been made by publication, like proof shall be required of the right of the absent or unknown parties before such judgment is rendered. (Pr. Act, Sec. 271.) A Court cannot render judgment declaring the rights, titles, and interests of the parties to an action of partition, without first ascertaining the facts in relation thereto as described by statute; and in case the defendant omits to answer the complaint, the plaintiff must still exhibit proof of his title. (Ripple v. Gilborn, 8 How. 462; Porter v. Lee, 6 Id. 491; Griggs v. Peckham, 3 Wend. 436.)

R. T. Sprague, for Respondent.

The question raised by the demurrer is, whether possessory claims upon the lands of the United States, for mining purposes, in this State, are estates of inheritance. These possessory claims upon the public land, have been uniformly regarded by the Supreme Court of this State as real estate, and persons in actual prior occupancy, as possessing valid titles as against all the world, except the United States Government. (Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 302.)

These estates are estates of inheritance. (Bouvier's Law Dic. Title "Real Estate," 2-11; Tomlon's Law Dic. 196; Jacob's Law Dic. 446.) It is such a right, property, interest, and estate in lands, as will, by the operation of law, pass to the heirs of the intestate holder or owner (Bouv. Law Dic. 633), and therefore is the subject of partition under the statute of this State.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action for a partition of a mining claim and water ditch connected therewith, the plaintiff claiming an undivided two-thirds, and the defendant the undivided one-third thereof. The two hundred and sixty-fourth section of the Practice Act provides that "when several persons hold and are in possession of real property, as joint tenants, or as tenants in common, in which one or more of them have an estate of inheritance, or for life, or lives, or for years, an action may be brought by one or more of such persons for a partition thereof, according to the respective rights of the persons interested therein; and for a sale of such property, or a part of it, if it appear that a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners." The action was brought under this section of the statute.

The defendant contends that the interest of miners in mining claims and ditch property upon the public lands, is not an estate of inheritance, or any of the other kinds of real estate mentioned in the statute; and therefore the same are not liable to be partitioned between the owners under the act. In this he is clearly in error. In Merritt v. Judd (14 Cal. 64), this Court say, in commenting on the Law of Fixtures: "From an early period of our State jurisprudence, we have regarded these claims to public mineral lands as titles. They are so practically. Our Courts have given them the recognition of legal estates of freehold, and so, to all practical purposes — if we except some doctrine of abandonment, not, perhaps, applicable to such estates — unquestionably they are, and we think it would not be in harmony with this general judicial system, to deny to them the incidents of freehold estates, in respect to this matter." So, too, they have been held to be "real property," respecting which a suit will lie under the two hundred and fifty-fourth section of the Practice Act, against a person claiming an adverse "estate or interest therein." (Merced Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 319.) They are held to be real estate within the act relating to the place of trial of civil actions. (Watts v. White, 13 Cal. 324.) So, too, they are held liable to levy and sale on execution, like other real estate. (McKeon v. Bisbee, 9 Cal. 142.)

The ownership of a right to a mine, with the right to work the same, situated on land belonging to another, is a very common interest in mining countries. It has been held to be such an interest as would descend to the heirs of an owner. The mere right to work such mines, is held to be an incorporeal hereditament in the land of other persons. But in such cases it is held that it is indivisible, because a division of the right would create new rights, and would prejudice the owner of the soil; and it has been, therefore, held that the coparceners must work the mines jointly with one stock, or each enjoy the right at successive periods of time. (Bainbridge on Mines, 115, 116.) But a different rule prevails where a distinct right of property in mines descends in coparcenery; and the coparceners in such case are entitled to a partition, as their rights would not thereby interfere with the property of others. They are seized, not of a bare right, but of an estate in fee, divisible in its nature. (Id. 116.) And the same rules apply to joint tenants and tenants in common of mines. (Id. 117; Collier on Mines, Secs. 5, 12; Rockwell on Mines, Secs. 47-49.) The distinction between the right to mine in the land of another and a distinct right of property in a mine, as to this right of partition, has no application to the public mineral lands in this State. Although the ultimate title in fee in our public mineral lands is vested in the United States, yet as between individuals, all transactions and all rights, interests, and estates in the mines are treated as being an estate in fee, and as a distinct and vested right of property in the claimant or claimants thereof, founded upon their possession or appropriation of the land containing the mine. They are treated, as between themselves and all persons but the United States, as the owners of the land and the mines therein; and as such, where the land or the mine is claimed by several, as joint tenants, tenants in common, or as coparceners, or even as partners, such several interests or estates are in the nature of an estate of inheritance, and liable to be partitioned between the several claimants, the same as other real property.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

On petition for rehearing, CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

It is urged in the petition that the property in controversy being used as partnership property, an action for a partition will not lie, and that a suit in equity must be brought to dissolve the partnership, and for an account of the partnership business. It does not appear in this case, that any suit in equity is necessary to settle and adjust the business of the partnership. The mere fact that real estate, owned by persons as tenants in common, or even as partners, is used in a partnership business, affords no valid objection to an action to partition the same between the owners. The property was of such a character, and the owners had such an interest therein, as afforded a proper ground for an action for a partition, as has been shown by the previous opinion of this Court; and as the answer did not deny any of the allegations of the complaint, but merely set up the facts upon which the claim that a partition would not lie was founded, the demurrer to the answer was properly sustained.

It is objected that no evidence or proof was offered to show that the property was not capable of being partitioned without great prejudice to the owners, to authorize the Court to order a sale. The fact was averred in the complaint, and was not denied by the answer, and it was therefore properly deemed admitted, like any other material fact affecting the rights of the parties, or the form of the remedy to which they might be entitled. The terms of the two hundred and seventy-fifth section of the Practice Act are a little peculiar upon this subject, but it does not vary the rule laid down in other sections, as to what facts are to be deemed admitted. No objection of this kind was made in the Court below; and even if such proof were necessary, it may properly be deemed to have been waived under the circumstances, the defendants evidently relying upon their answer being a sufficient defense to the action. The same remarks apply to the objection that there was no proof of the title to the premises. The title and ownership was averred in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, and no objection of this kind was raised in the Court below. If it had been, and the Court had ruled that proof was not necessary, then such ruling might have been reviewed by this Court. But the objection should not be raised here for the first time.

The Court appointed a referee, to make sale of the property, in accordance with the decree, to which no objection appears to have been made in the Court below; but it is now contended that the Court should have appointed three instead of one. Sec. 275 of the Practice Act provides, that if a sale is not directed to be made, the Court shall order a partition, and shall "appoint three referees therefor." This does not apply to a case like the present, where a sale, and not a partition is ordered; and such sale can be as well conducted by one as three referees. This objection is not, therefore, well taken.

The rehearing is denied.

BLACKMAN et al v. PIERCE.

THE vendor of goods who has sold them on credit to one who is insolvent, has a right to stop the goods and take them into his possession at any time before they arrive at their place of destination, and go into the possession of the purchaser.

This right of stoppage in transitu is paramount to any lien on the goods claimed by third persons through the purchaser, and may be exercised to defeat an attachment or execution levied upon the goods by a creditor of the vendee.

When a warehouseman, who has goods in charge, states to one who is about to take possession of the same, by a legal process, that he has no charges on the goods, this is a waiver of the warehouseman's lien for charges, if any he had.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Tehama County.

After the sale of the goods by Blackman & Co., at San Francisco, to McDaniel, Blackman & Co. shipped the same to McDaniel, the vendee, at Trinity Center. The bills of lading were made out in the name of the vendee. The goods, in ordinary course of transportation, arrived at the head of steamboat navigation, at Red Bluff, where they were placed in the hands of Pierce, Church & Co., warehousemen, who had orders from the vendee to forward them to him. Defendants, Pierce, Church & Co., defended on the ground of right of property, in the vendee, McDaniel. The Sheriff, Johns, justified under the attachment issued in Fuller v. McDaniel. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. S. Long, for Appellants.

The right to stop goods in transitu ceases, whenever the goods come into the actual or constructive possession of the vendee. (1 Parsons on Cont. 484-490, and the notes referred to by the author; also, Parsons' Merc. Law, 60-64, and notes.)

The goods were delivered to the vendee as soon as they were put on shipboard at San Francisco, because the bills of lading were made out to him, and not to the vendors. The transit stopped at Red Bluff, and the defendants, Pierce, Church & Co., as the agents of McDaniel, received them, and kept them, under instructions from McDaniel, until he would send for them.

W. H. Rhodes, for Respondent.

The right of stoppage in transitu continues in force until the goods sold arrive at the point of destination. (Markwald v. Creditors, 7 Cal. 213; Abb. on Ship. 521, Ed. 1854.)

The right is not defeated by process of attachment, at suit of a creditor of vendee. (Abb. on Ship. 520, Ed. 1854; Smith's Merc. L. 654; 15 B. Mon. 270.)

Possession taken by an agent of consignee, but before the goods reach the actual possession of the vendee, is not sufficient to terminate the transitus and destroy the right. (Markwald v. Creditors, 7 Cal. 213.)

Even a resale by the first vendee, and payment to him, will not destroy the right. (Hill on Sales, 218, Sec. 102; Craven v. Ryder, 6 Taunt. 433.)

Absolute insolvency of vendee, not absolutely necessary to justify the exercise of the right. (14 B. Mon. 324; 17 U. S. Dig. 512, Sec. 107.)

Blackman v. Pierce.

When the defense set up is the existence of a lien in behalf of warehousemen, the lien must be asserted at the time of the demand, or else it is waived. (Smith's Merc. L. 664, and Note; 6 Wend. 608; 20 Id. 267; 15 Id. 475; 2 Bing. 23.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought against Pierce, Church & Co., warehousemen at Red Bluff, and Johns, the Sheriff of Tehama County, to recover the value of a lot of goods sold by the plaintiffs, merchants in San Francisco, to one McDaniel, of Trinity Center, Trinity County; and which they claim by the right of stoppage in transitu, the purchaser having become insolvent after the sale of the goods. It appears that the goods were duly marked to McDaniel, care of Pierce, Church & Co., Red Bluff; that the plaintiffs shipped them on a steamer at San Francisco, and they duly arrived at Red Bluff, the point of transshipment from the river steamer to wagons, to be transported to their final destination; that Pierce, Church & Co. put them in their warehouse, advised McDaniel of their arrival, and he wrote them that he would send a team after them; that while they were thus in the warehouse at Red Bluff an attachment was levied upon them by the Sheriff, issued in an action brought by one Fuller against McDaniel; that after the purchase of the goods McDaniel became insolvent, and the price remained unpaid; that after the levy the plaintiffs, by their agent, gave notice to the warehousemen and the Sheriff that McDaniel had become insolvent; that the goods had been sold to him by them; that the price was unpaid, and that they claimed the right of stoppage in transitu, and demanded the goods of them, and they refused to deliver them.

The right of a vendor who has sold goods on credit, when the vendee is insolvent, to stop and take them into his possession, at any time before their arrival at the place of destination, and going into the actual or constructive possession of the purchaser, is well established. Depositing them at an intermediate point, with an agent of the purchaser, for the purpose of being forwarded, does not terminate the transitus. (Markwald v. His Creditors, 7 Cal.

Hale v. Brennan.

213.) It is clear, therefore, that the mere fact that the goods had come into the possession of Pierce, Church & Co., to be forwarded to the purchaser, did not terminate the transitus or divest the plaintiffs of their right of stoppage in transitu.

This right of stoppage in transitu is paramount to any lien on the goods claimed by third persons against the purchaser. Thus it may be exercised to defeat an attachment or execution levied upon the goods by a creditor of the vendee; for the lien acquired by the levy operates only upon the interest of the debtor, but cannot defeat the paramount right of a stranger. (Hilliard on Sales, 217.) The Court found that the warehousemen stated to plaintiffs' agent, at the time of the demand, that they had no charges upon the goods. This was stated in reply to a question of the agent, who told them he was ready to pay their charges if any they had. By this, the warehousemen waived their lien for charges, if they had any. (Everett v. Saltus, 15 Wend. 474; Everett v. Coffin, 6 Id. 608; Saltus v. Everett, 20 Id. 268.)

The judgment is affirmed.

MARTHA HALE et al v. JAMES BRENNAN, EXECUTOR, ETC.

A brought an action against B to recover for the value of services alleged to have been rendered by A, for B, in keeping a hotel. The defense was, that A and B were partners. On the trial, B, after introducing some evidence, which tended to show a partnership, offered in evidence the books of the hotel, as further evidence of the partnership: held, not to be error, and that if the books afforded any evidence of a partnership, the entries were admissible.

The books of a partnership are evidence in actions between the partners, and when kept subject to the inspection of each, must be admitted as correct until the contrary is shown.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Cruz County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Joseph H. Skene, for Appellants.

Hale v. Brennan.

The account books of the deceased, the defendant's testator, were his own written declarations, made without the knowledge of the plaintiffs, and inadmissible in favor of the executor representing him in this action. (1 Phillips on Ev., Cowen, Hill & Edwards' Ed. 37.)

The entries made by his servant were equally inadmissible to prove a partnership existing between his employer and the female plaintiff; made as they were without her knowledge, and by a person not under her authority, and coming within no exception to the general rule excluding hearsay evidence. (1 Phil. on Ev. 357.)

Error is presumed from the admission of improper testimony, until the contrary is shown. (Grimes v. Fall, 15 Cal. 63.)

Robinson & McConnell, for Respondent.

A proper foundation was laid for the introduction of the book in evidence. And the rule is well settled, that the books, in such cases, are admissible in evidence. (1 Greenl. on Ev. Secs. 116-118; Landers v. Turner, 14 Cal. 574; Le France v. Nevitt, 7 Id. 186.) The fact of the death of said James Skene, is not material to the admissibility of this kind of evidence. (1 Greenl. on Ev. Sec. 120, and authorities cited.)

The second point relied on by the appellant is, that the entries in the books were inadmissible to prove a partnership. That the entries in the books were admissible in evidence, as being part of the res gestæ, there cannot be a question of doubt. (1 Greenl. on Ev. Sec. 120; Dr. Pattershall v. Turford, 3 B. & Ad. 890; Poole v. Dieas, 1 Bing. N. C. 654.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action brought by husband and wife, for services rendered by the wife before her marriage, for the defendant's testator, in keeping the Santa Cruz Hotel. The defense was, that she was a partner of plaintiffs' testator in keeping the hotel, and not his servant. The defendant recovered judgment, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

The only error assigned is the admission in evidence of the books.

of the hotel. It was admitted at the trial that she was the owner of one-half of the hotel, and of the furniture and fixtures therein, at the time of the performance of the alleged services. It was also proved that the business was carried on, and the books kept in the name of "The Santa Cruz Hotel;" and upon the death of the testator she took these books out of the trunk of the testator, in his room, and examined them; and that the executor afterwards took charge of them. They were proved to be the books of the hotel by a witness who, as clerk, had kept them in part; and that all the entries not in his handwriting were in the handwriting of the testator. It seems there was also other evidence tending to show a partnership. The books were then offered to show that several charges appeared therein against the testator, and also against her.

Under the circumstances of the case, there was no error in admitting the books. They may have afforded very little evidence upon the main question, whether or not there was a partnership existing between the female plaintiff and the testator during the time of the alleged services, but if they afforded any, they were admissible. The possession of books and documents, or the circumstance that a party had access to them, has been considered a ground for affecting him with the admission of the facts stated in them. (1 Phil. Ev., C., H. & E's Notes, 446.) So, although the books of an individual are not evidence in his favor against others, yet, from the very nature of the case, the books of a partnership must be evidence between the partners themselves. Such books, kept subject to the inspection of each, must be admitted as correct until the contrary is shown. (Id. 448, note.) The record does not show all the evidence introduced preliminary to the offer of the books, and it is to be presumed that there was sufficient to authorize the Court to admit them, as error in the action of the Court is not to be presumed. If it was shown that she had access to the books during the time they were kept, that would be a strong circumstance to hold her bound by the statements therein, if any there were. The record does not disclose what entries therein were used in evidence, so that we are unable to determine whether they were material or not.

The judgment is affirmed.

Bishop v. Hubbard.

BISHOP v. HUBBARD et al.

A & B were partners, and as such, owned two tracts of land. A for several years had resided upon one of the tracts with his family, using it as a homestead. The firm becoming embarrassed, they made a division of their lands, and B executed to A a deed of his interest in the homestead tract; and A executed to B a deed of his interest in the other tract. These deeds were executed for the purpose of enabling A to file a declaration of homestead on the tract deeded to him, and thereby preventing the creditors from selling it in payment of their debts. A soon after, executed and recorded a declaration of homestead on the land:

Held, that the conveyances were fraudulent and void as to creditors; and that, notwithstanding the homestead claim, the land was still liable for the debts of the firm.

Where a partnership, in embarrassed circumstances, converts its means, upon the strength of which it has obtained credit, into real estate, to be claimed as a homestead by one of the firm, for the purpose of placing those means beyond the reach of the creditors, the land is liable to the executions of the creditors, notwithstanding the declaration of homestead.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, Placer County.

Bishop & Long were general partners, and had been for several years engaged in ranching, and raising, buying, and selling sheep and cattle. They owned two tracts of land which had been acquired with the partnership funds. Their circumstances had become embarrassed, and their creditors were pressing them. On the twentieth day of May, 1861, they made a division of their real estate, and executed mutual deeds. Bishop had been residing on one of the tracts for several years with his family, and in the division this tract fell to Bishop, who on the same day executed and recorded thereon a declaration of homestead. The deed and declaration of homestead were both recorded on the same day. Two days afterwards, the creditors commenced suits against the firm, and among other property, attached the land claimed by Bishop as a homestead. Judgments were rendered in the actions by default; and on the fourth of June thereafter, executions were issued on the judgments, and the property claimed as a homestead advertised for sale. Bishop filed a bill in equity to enjoin the sale, claiming that the same would create a cloud upon his title. Defendants set up in their answer that the sale from Long to Bishop was a fraud upon the creditors, and asked that the deed be canceled. The question of fraud was submitted to a jury, who found that the sale was fraudulent. The Court thereupon rendered judgment for defendants, and also canceling and annulling the deed from Long to Bishop.

Hale & Smith and Hereford & Williams, for Appellant.

Bishop & Long were each liable upon all of the judgments to their full amount, and it was impossible for the conveyance from Long to Bishop to operate as a hindrance to the defendants in the enforcement of their judgments, because the property was as much and as completely liable after the conveyance as before. Until Bishop withdrew the property from its liability to execution by his declaration of homestead, the defendants' right to execute it was as perfect as when it belonged to the firm of Bishop & Long.

The case is very different from that of a conveyance to a third party, or one who is not liable for the debts, because in the latter case the conveyance operates as a withdrawal of the property from its liability to execution; while, as we have shown before, a conveyance from one debtor to his joint debtor has no such effect. The only effect of the latter conveyance, is to change the title of the property as between the debtors.

If correct in our conclusions upon this proposition, we compel the defendants (respondents) to sustain the charge of fraud to the effect that the declaration of homestead was fraudulent in law, or their case falls.

We have examined the question with some care, and have not been able to find a case where the act of claiming property as exempt from execution has been held fraudulent, because done to hinder and delay creditors. And we cannot conceive it possible for any Court to so hold. On the contrary, instead of making it fraudulent, the law contemplates that the creditor will by his action delay his creditors. It authorizes him to do so, and makes his acts lawful, instead of declaring them void.

Every claim of exemption of property from execution sale, operates as a delay of the creditor that far. And the effect of such claim in fact, so far as the creditor is concerned, is precisely the same as that of a sale of the property to a third party to avoid the debt. But the effect or consequence in law is very different, because in the former instance the law declares the act valid and legitimate under all circumstances, while in the latter it declares it void. The only case in our reports having any bearing upon the question under discussion which we have been able to find, is that of Randall v. Buffington (10 Cal. 491.) In that case, this Court held, that where an insolvent sold goods liable to execution, and applied the proceeds to the relief of his homestead by discharging a mortgage resting upon it, the transaction was not liable to impeachment for fraud in delaying creditors. In other words, that the act of relieving the homestead, so as to exempt it entirely from execution or from the reach of creditors, was not fraudulent.

S. Heydenfeldt, for Respondents.

It may be considered well established, that fraud in the transmutation of partnership property from one partner to another, will not prevail as against the creditors. In Ex Parte Ruffin (6 Ves. 125), although the circumstances did not call for an expressive decision of the points, yet the remarks of Lord Eldon, in his opinion, make it clear that such was his understanding. On page 127 he says: "A bona fide transmutation of the property binds the creditors." "When the effect is a bona fide transaction of this sort, it would be much better to examine the bona fides of each transaction than," etc.

From these quotations it appears evident, that a partition or sale among partners of partnership effects, is not free from inquiry into the good faith of the transaction; and if it lacks this essential quality it will, like all other fraudulent acts, be void.

In Anderson v. Malby (2 Vesey, Jr. 245), a retiring partner withdrawing funds as for his share, was declared fraudulent, and compelled to account. There must be a fair transmutation of the partnership property by the outgoing partner to the remaining partner, to enable the joint property of the firm to become the separate property of the remaining partner. (1 Montagu on B. L. 408.)

In Yale v. Yale (13 Conn. 190), the Court emphatically decide that an appropriation of the joint property by one partner to pay his individual debt, would be fraudulent and void as against the partnership creditors.

The plaintiff says it is no fraud to dedicate a homestead. This proposition nakedly and abstractly we admit. So also, nakedly and abstractly, it is no fraud to pay a private debt. But here, the fraud consists in appropriating the partnership property; and it must be equally fraudulent, whether it be done for the one purpose or the other, or for any purpose which defeats the partnership creditors.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

Bishop & Long were partners engaged in an extensive business, and as such owned the tract of land in controversy, on which is a dwelling-house, the house and land having been occupied by Bishop, with his family, as their homestead for several years. Becoming embarrassed, they made a division of their real estate, and executed mutual deeds to each other under it, by which the title to this property became vested in Bishop, who duly filed and had recorded his declaration of homestead. The defendants are creditors of Bishop & Long, and as such obtained judgments on their debts and levied upon the property. Bishop then brought this action, claiming the property as a homestead, and therefore not liable to sale on execution, and prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling it under their executions. The defendants contend that the division of the property between the partners was a fraud upon them as creditors, and therefore void as to them; that the property is still partnership property, and as such liable to the judgment of their debts, which cannot be defeated by the claim of homestead. The case was tried by a jury, who found a verdict for the defendants, upon which a judgment was duly rendered against the plaintiff, from which he appeals.

It has been repeatedly decided by this Court, that a homestead could not be established upon property held in joint tenancy, or tenancy in common. (Wolf v. Fleishacker, 5 Cal. 245; Reynolds v. Pixley, 6 Id. 165; Giblin v. Jordon, Id. 416; Kellersberger v. Kopp, Id. 565.) It follows that while the debtors owned the property as tenants in common, it was liable for their partnership debts; and the fact that it had been and was occupied by one of them as a homestead, would not have affected that liability.

In the case of Riddell v. Shirley (5 Cal. 488), a debtor in embarrassed circumstances made a sale of certain personal property for the purpose of raising funds with which to discharge certain debts, which were a lien upon his homestead, for the purpose of saving it to himself—of all which the purchaser had full knowledge at the time of his purchase. It was held that it was a transaction calculated to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors, and therefore the property was liable, in the hands of the purchaser, for the debts of his vendor. The Court say: "Although the law secures the homestead from execution arising from ordinary indebtedness, it is yet made chargeable for debts by the acts of the parties interested in its preservation, and in some cases by operation of law. Where such cases exist, it would seem to be only fair that the homestead should remain answerable for the debts charged upon it, and not, after becoming a source of credit, be relieved, intentionally, by the disposition of all the other property of the debtor, leaving nothing for the satisfaction of the other creditors." So in the present case, the land in question, before the division, was chargeable with the debts of the partnership by operation of law, and it was a source of credit to the parties while it remained in that condition; and it would not seem just and right that the debtors, after having thus obtained credit thereon, should, by their own act, without the consent of their creditors, place it beyond the reach of such creditors, who may have dealt with them on the faith of the liability of this property to be applied in payment of their just debts. The conveyance from Long to Bishop was a means of placing the property in a situation by which it might be put beyond the reach of the creditors; and if done for that purpose the jury were justified in finding that it was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, or defrauding creditors, and therefore void.

The case of Randall v. Buffington (10 Cal. 491), referred to by the appellant, differs from the case of Riddell v. Shirley and the present, in this, that there the insolvent debtor paid money in his hands in discharge of a debt which was an incumbrance upon his homestead, and the Court held it to be valid, because "there is no rule of law which prevents a debtor in insolvent circumstances from the application of his property to the payment of one debt rather than another." In that case there was no assignment or conveyance to be held void for fraud. In the case of Riddell v. Shirley, and the present, there were conveyances made of property, the effects of which were, directly or indirectly, to put property beyond the reach of creditors. The question whether the conveyance in this case, from Long to Bishop, was made with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, seems to have been fairly submitted to the jury, and we see no good reason for disturbing their verdict.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

HENDERSON v. ALLEN et al.

It is doubtful whether in an action for a forcible entry, or a forcible detainer, the title of the premises can be involved in the controversy. But where the action is against a tenant, for unlawfully holding over lands after the termination of a lease, the title may become involved, in some cases; and in such cases the statute authorizing the removal of actions from a Justice's Court to a District Court, would be applicable.

In an action commenced before a Justice of the Peace, under the Forcible Entry and Detainer Act, an answer which denies generally the allegations of the complaint, is sufficient.

A, who claimed to be in possession of a tract of coal-bearing land, made a verbal agreement with B & C, by which they were to prospect for coal until they struck a particular seam, or ledge, and before they struck this ledge they were to do all the work and have two-thirds of the claim; but after the ledge was struck, the work was to be prosecuted by the parties jointly. A to bear one-third of the expenses, and B & C two-thirds: Held, that this agreement did not create the relation of landlord and tenant between A & B and C, but that it made them tenants in common, or partners in mining; and that the action of unlawful detainer was not the proper remedy for A, if excluded from the premises by B & C.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Contra Costa County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Henderson v. Allen.

G. F. & Wm. H. Sharp, for Appellants.

M. S. Chase, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This action was commenced before a Justice of the Peace, the plaintiff claiming to be the owner of a certain tract of land containing a coal mine, which he had leased to the defendant, Clark, under whom the other defendants claimed, and put him into possession, under an agreement by which the plaintiff was to have one-third of the coal taken from the mine in opening the same. The complaint avers that the term of the lease had expired, and the defendants refused to surrender the possession, and prays for restitution. The defendants Allen and Lander, filed an answer, denying the allegations of the complaint, and set up that they were owners of the premises; that the title was necessarily involved, and prayed that the cause be certified to the District Court for trial. The cause was afterwards so transferred, and at the trial, in the District Court, a judgment of nonsuit was rendered against the plaintiff; from which, and from a motion refusing a new trial, he takes this appeal.

The first point we will notice is, that the District Court had no jurisdiction of the action, it having been commenced before a Justice of the Peace. It is doubtful whether, in an action purely for a forcible entry or detainer, the title can be involved in the controversy, the question being one relating solely to the possession. This Court seems to have held both ways upon this point. (Larue v. Gaskins, 5 Cal. 507; Dickinson v. Maguire, 9 Id. 50.) But where the action is against a tenant and others for unlawfully holding over lands after the termination of a lease, and other actions not founded upon a forcible entry or detainer, the title may properly become involved, in some cases, and the statute authorizing their removal to the District Court would be applicable. (Cullen v. Langridge, 17 Cal. 67.) This point is therefore overruled.

It is objected that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment in the Justice's Court, for want of a sufficient answer. The answers deny generally the allegations of the complaint, and this was sufficient in an action before a Justice of the Peace, where the strict rules of pleading do not apply. Secs. 19 and 20 of the act under which this action was brought, fully provide for such cases, the latter providing that "all matters of excuse, justification, or avoidance of the allegations of the complaint, may be given in evidence under the answer." The objection that the defendants had no right to file an amended answer in the District Court, is not well taken.

It is further urged, that the Court erred in granting a nonsuit. It appears that the land in controversy is public land; that the plaintiff claimed to have entered under the Possessory Act of this State; that he made a verbal agreement with the defendants, by which they were to prosecute the proper work thereon until they struck coal, to receive two-thirds of the claim until they struck coal on a particular lode or seam, and after that the work was to be prosecuted by the plaintiff and defendants jointly, the plaintiff to pay one-third of the expenses and the defendants two-thirds; that the coal was not struck at the point designated. The plaintiff was also to build a house upon the claim and hold possession thereof for the defendants, which he failed to do. Nor had the plaintiff performed the acts required by the Possessory Law to entitle him to hold or claim the land under that act. It appears that the defendants afterward located the tract, under the Possessory Act. Under these facts the nonsuit was properly granted, and the plaintiff must seek his remedy, if any he has, under a different kind of action. The relation which existed between the plaintiff and the defendants was not that of landlord and tenant, but that of tenants in common, or partners, in the nature of a mining partnership; and therefore this kind of action will not lie. It has been repeatedly held, that even the letting of land to a person to cultivate—the crops to be divided between the owner and the cropper, in certain proportions—did not amount to a lease, or create the relation of landlord and tenant between them. In such case, the owner is held to be in possession of the land, and the parties are joint tenants in the crop. (Bradish v. Schenck, 8 J. R. 151; Foote v. Colvin, 3 Id. 216; DeMott v. Hageman, 8 Cow. 220; Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill, 234.) In such case, it is an agreement to work on shares, and not a lease to render rent, for which an action will lie against the tenant.

McCrea v. Craig.

(Caswell v. District, 15 Wend. 379.) So in the present case, the agreement is to work the mine on shares, and not a lease of the land to render rent; and this kind of action will not therefore lie.

The judgment is affirmed.

MCCREA v. CRAIG et al.

THE lien given by the statute to the mechanic or the material man, for work and labor performed or materials furnished in the construction of a building, commences and attaches to the property at the time of the commencement of the work, or the beginning to furnish the materials.

The reasonable construction of an allegation in a complaint, that "plaintiff furnished the materials between the sixth day of April, 1862, and the twenty-eighth day of June, 1862," is, that plaintiff commenced furnishing the materials on the sixth day of April, and continued furnishing the same from time to time up to June 28th.

Where the contract was made, and the materials were furnished, while the Lien Law of 1858 was in force, but the notice of lien was not filed in the Recorder's office until after the Lien Law of 1862 went into effect: held, that the lien was not lost, but must be enforced in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1862.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

J. M. Williams, for Appellant.

The demurrer of defendant Allen was sustained to the complaint, upon the ground that plaintiff never acquired any lien upon the property of Allen; and this decision was based and is now sought to be upheld upon the single ground, that as the Statutes of 1856 and 1858 were superseded by the Statutes of 1862, after the contract was made and the materials purchased, and before any notice of lien was filed or given, that plaintiff could not have any lien upon the building, though the time allowed for filing had not passed. Appellant invites the Court to the consideration of the following propositions: Under the Mechanics' Lien Law, the lien is acquired by the subcontractor, as material man, by doing the work or furnishing the materials. The radical error in the respondents' view of the case is, that they suppose the lien to be acquired by the filing in the Recorder's office and giving notice to the employer; whereas, the lien is acquired by the work, or the furnishing of the material, and the filing and notice only preserve it or make it effectual. The statute, it would seem, is sufficiently clear upon this point. (Stat. 1856, 203; Id. 1858, 225.) After the work has been done or the materials furnished and used, thirty days are allowed to file the claim. Can it be said that, during those thirty days, he has no lien? If he does not file, he loses his lien, but not until the thirty days have passed.

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Respondents.

Even supposing that the materials were furnished anterior to the twenty-sixth of June, 1862 (the date of the repeal of the Statute of 1858), which the complaint does not aver, there was no lien acquired. An act had been done, which, if followed up properly, would—otherwise would not—ripen into a lien; but which did not of itself constitute a "lien acquired" within the reservation of the twenty-fourth section of the Act of 1862 (Laws 1862, 390), and was therefore not saved thereby. "When an Act of Parliament is repealed, it must be considered, except as to those transactions passed and closed, as if it never existed." (Butler v. Palmer, 1 Hill, 333.)

The plaintiff, not having acquired any lien under the Act of 1858, of course could not acquire any lien afterwards under the Act of 1862, because the Act of 1862 was passed subsequently to the making of the contract of March 4th, 1862, between the builder, Craig, and the respondent Allen (Donahy v. Clapp, 12 Cushing, 441); and because it does not appear from the complaint, that the materials were furnished since the twenty-sixth of June, 1862. The Act of 1862 does not give a lien by reason of a furnishing of materials anterior to its taking effect. "Nova constitutio futuris formam imponere debet," is the maxim, unless the statute itself expressly declares to the contrary; * * * "and it is well settled that, in the absence of express words to that effect, a law can only operate upon future, and not upon past transactions." (Grimes' Estate v. Norris, 6 Cal. 625.)

McCrea v. Craig.

The respondent Allen therefore insists that appellant acquired no lien under the Statute of 1858; because: First, it does not appear from the complaint that any materials were furnished; second, nor that appellant complied with the provisions of that statute while it was in force; third, but it does appear that the statute itself (1858) was repealed before the appellant had any "lien acquired," and a mere "possibility" or "potentiality" of a lien was not saved by Sec. 24 of the Act of 1862. And that the appellant did not acquire a lien under the Act of 1862; because: First, the Act (1862) was passed after the fourth day of March, 1862, when the respondent Allen made the contract with McCrea, the appellant, to build the house; second, it does not appear that appellant furnished any materials under that act (1862).

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to enforce a mechanic's lien. The building was owned by the defendant Allen. Craig was the original contractor who agreed to construct it; and the plaintiff furnished materials for its construction between April 6th and June 28th, 1862. On the third day of July, the plaintiff filed a notice of his demand and lien in the Recorder's office, and within five days thereafter gave Allen notice thereof; and July 3d, he presented his account to Craig, who admitted in writing thereon that it was correct. On the seventeenth day of July, 1862, the plaintiff again gave Allen notice of his lien, in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1862 — the sum of $2,000 then being due and unpaid under the contract from Allen to Craig; and also filed an account of his demand and lien in the Recorder's office. The building was completed August 20th, 1862. Allen demurred to the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that it did not show that the plaintiff had any lien upon the property. The Court sustained the demurrer and rendered final judgment for the defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals.

On the twenty-sixth day of April, 1862, a law was passed in relation to liens of mechanics and others, which took effect June 25th, 1862, the last section of which repealed all prior laws upon the subject; but the twenty-fourth section provides that "Nothing contained in this act shall be deemed to apply to or affect any lien heretofore acquired." (Stat. of 1862, 384.) Although the lien in this case is created by and depends upon a compliance with the terms of the statute, yet it is a favored lien, because the very property upon which the lien attaches has been created by the labor or materials furnished by the person claiming the lien. The lien virtually commences when the labor or materials are begun to be furnished; and although such lien can only be enforced by filing and recording the proper notice in the Recorder's office, and commencing suit and performing the other acts required by the statute within the proper time, yet all these acts relate to, and the lien is deemed to have accrued at the time of the commencement of the work, or the beginning to furnish the materials. (Tuttle v. Montford, 7 Cal. 358; Soule v. Dawes, Id. 575; Crowell v. Gilmore, 13 Id. 54.) The evident intention of Sec. 24 of the Act of 1862, was to save and preserve to the claimants all rights and liens acquired under the preëxisting laws which were then repealed, and which, but for such saving clause, would have been liable to be lost by such repeal. The fair and reasonable construction of the averment in the complaint is that the plaintiff commenced furnishing the materials for the building on the sixth day of April, and continued furnishing the same from that time up to June 28th. Although he did not file any notice of lien until after the new law went into effect, yet his lien is to be deemed to have been acquired, and his notice will relate back to the time he commenced to furnish the materials; and such lien comes properly within the saving clause of the statute. After the new statute went into effect, all subsequent acts and proceedings relating to the lien or its enforcement were governed by and must have been in accordance with its provisions. The averments of the complaint show a substantial compliance with the new statute on the part of the plaintiff; and the complaint sets forth, therefore, a good cause of action. It follows, that the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer. The case of Donahy v. Clapp (12 Cushing, 440) is essentially different from the present, as that was evidently a new statute enacted where none had existed before; and not, like the present, the enactment of a new and revised law, saving previously-acquired rights, under a former statute upon the same subject.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions that the defendants answer the complaint within ten days after service on them of notice of the filing of the remittitur in the Court below.

CUMMINS v. SCOTT.

WHEREAS an undertaking on appeal is filed within the statutory time, and the sureties are excepted to, and appellant gives notice that they will justify, and both parties appear before the officer at the time fixed for justification, and a new undertaking is then filed in place of the old one, the appeal will not be dismissed because the undertaking was not filed within five days after filing notice of appeal.

It is an essential averment in the complaint, in an action of forcible entry and unlawful detainer, that at the time of the alleged forcible entry, plaintiff was in the actual possession of the premises; and in order to maintain the action, plaintiff must prove this averment on the trial.

APPEAL from the County Court, Marin County.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the County Court, and defendant appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

John Reynolds, for Appellant.

H. H. Hartley, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the undertaking on appeal was not filed within five days after the service and filing of the notice of appeal, as required by Sec. 348 of the Practice Act. The notice of appeal was served and filed February 24th, 1863, and the undertaking was filed March 11th. The record shows, however, that a matter of justification of sureties, on the appeal bond, was heard before the County Judge, on the eleventh day of March, at which a new bond was presented, and approved by the Judge. It states, that "both parties being present, by their counsel, and consenting to a hearing before me, this eleventh day of March, 1863, and a new bond being furnished, with Benjamin Miller and James T. Stocker as sureties, the following proceedings were had," etc. This new bond is the one copied into the record, and the whole proceedings show that it was a substitute for one previously filed, and which had been objected to, on the ground of the insufficiency of the sureties; and no objection appears to have been made that the first undertaking was not filed in time. The motion is therefore overruled.

The action is brought for an alleged forcible entry upon the land of the plaintiff. The complaint alleges, that the plaintiff had been for a long time, and was at the time of the alleged forcible entry, in the actual possession of the premises; and this is an essential averment, necessary for him to prove, under Sec. 9 of the Forcible Entry Act. The plaintiff claims, under a declaration filed in the Recorder's office, in pursuance of the Possessory Act. A portion of the land included in his claim appears to be in dispute, between the plaintiff and the defendant; the latter claiming an adjoining tract and a portion of the tract claimed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff does not seem to have ever had this disputed tract inclosed, or to have had any other actual possession. He commenced putting up a fence to inclose it, when the defendant interfered, stopped the work, and tore down part of the fence already built, a short time before the commencement of this action. The evidence leaves it uncertain where the dividing line between their respective claims is located, and the greater part of the testimony is directed to that point. The case has been previously before this Court, and will be found reported in 20 Cal. 83.

It is clear, from all the evidence in the case, that it is not within the provisions of the Forcible Entry Act; but the controversy between the parties is one which should be tried in a proper suit, in the District Court, where all questions relating to priority of settlement, location of boundary lines, and the validity and sufficiency of their possessory claims, filed under the Possessory Act, can be fully adjudicated, which they cannot be in the present action. The evidence does not show an actual possession, by the plaintiff, of the premises in dispute, which is a material fact to sustain the action. The verdict was therefore against law and evidence.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Dyson v. Bradshaw.

DYSON v. BRADSHAW et al.

IN an action of ejectment, where the plaintiff in his complaint avers title of the demanded premises in himself, and the answer denies the averment, the defendant has a right to show, on the trial, that the plaintiff has divested himself of the title before the commencement of the action, by executing a deed to a third party, although the defendant does not connect himself with the title of such third party.

A deed takes effect only from the time of its delivery, and where a deed is placed in the hands of a third person, as an escrow, with an agreement between the grantor and grantee that it shall not be delivered to the grantee until he has complied with certain conditions, the grantee does not acquire any title to the land, nor is he entitled to a delivery of the deed, until he has strictly complied with the conditions.

The right of one who enters upon the public lands of the United States without the consent of the Government, to take possession of and hold more than one hundred and sixty acres, discussed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The complaint in this case averred, "that heretofore and prior to the wrongful entry and ouster hereinafter set forth, to wit: on the twenty-eighth day of February, 1852, plaintiff was lawfully seized and in the possession of the following described property, to wit:— [here follows the description] — and being seized and possessed thereof, the above named defendants afterwards, to wit: on or about the first day of March, 1858, unlawfully and wrongfully entered into and upon said premises, and ousted the said plaintiff therefrom, and are still in the unlawful possession thereof, and wrongfully withhold the possession of the same from the plaintiff."

And plaintiff further says, "that said defendants, on or about the first day of March, 1858, unlawfully entered upon the premises aforesaid of the said plaintiff, and ejected, put out, and removed said plaintiff from the possession and occupation thereof, and kept him so removed for a long time, to wit: from the day and year last aforesaid until the present time," etc.

The pleadings were not under oath, and there were several defendants who answered separately, all denying, generally, the allegations of the complaint. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Cook & Hittell, for Appellant.

The rule is stated, and the reasons for it adverted to, in Bird v. Lisbros (9 Cal. 1); Piercy v. Sabin (10 Cal. 22), and Coryell v. Cain (16 Cal. 567); and these cases have, ever since their adjudication, been regarded as a correct exposition of the law in California, and referred to in later decisions as high authority. They establish the doctrine, that a defendant who is a trespasser upon the prior possession of a plaintiff, cannot justify by showing the true title outstanding in a third person. The circumstances of these cases were different from the facts in the case at bar; but the reasoning applies, so far as it goes, with much force.

In Bird v. Lisbros (9 Cal. 1), the plaintiff claimed title under the prior possession, not of himself, but of his grantor. The defendant denied this alleged title, and attempted to prove that plaintiff had never in fact acquired the possessory title of his grantor, and, we admit, it was perfectly competent for him to do so. But the Court distinctly recognized the rule, that a trespasser upon the actual possession of a plaintiff cannot show title in a third person, and illustrated it with the following remarks: "We will suppose," said the Court, "A has the true title, but not the actual possession of real estate; and B takes possession, and C then ousts B of his possession. In a suit by B to recover possession from C, the latter cannot set up in bar the outstanding title of A. The possession of C gives him a prima facie title, but the prior possession of B proves superior to this prima facie title of C. If it were otherwise, and a mere trespasser upon the prior actual possession of a party could justify his act by showing the true title outstanding in a third person, no party to the suit, then a prior possessor might never gain any repose by virtue of his adverse possession, and could never gain a title under the Statute of Limitations."

In Piercy v. Sabin (10 Cal. 22), the plaintiff relied on his own prior possession, and defendants attempted to set up the outstanding title of one Ludlum, who had located a preëmption claim over the premises. This the Court below refused to allow; and on appeal, the Supreme Court said: "There is no error in this. The defendants did not claim under Ludlum, and the plaintiff did claim by virtue of his own possession, and also under Crowell, who had formerly been in the actual possession of the premises. Whether plaintiff's or Crowell's possession was older or better than that of Ludlum, was a question that defendants could not raise as between themselves and the plaintiff."

If we correctly understand these decisions, they establish the doctrine, that when a person intrudes, without claim of right, upon the actual possession of another, he will not be permitted to show title in any third person whatsoever, but must restore the possession which he has illegally gained. The offer to show that the deed from plaintiff to Woods was placed as an escrow in the hands of of Sharp, to be delivered to Woods when certain conditions were performed, and that Woods never performed the conditions, was not an attempt to vary the terms of a written contract; for the proof of a delivery, in the very nature of things, must almost always rest in parol. And the rules of law upon this subject are so plain that we do not deem it necessary to collate authorities at any great length. We may refer to the very full and able note in Cowen & Hill's Notes to Phil. on Ev. (part 2, 826, note n), and particularly the case of Barns v. Hatch (3 N. H. 304) there cited, which shows that even the placing of a deed on record by a grantor, is not conclusive evidence of delivery. We may also invite the attention of the Court to Elsey v. Metcalf (1 Denio, 323), where it is held "that a presumption of delivery never obtains where a deed is proved to have been in the hands of the grantor at a period subsequent to its date," and that "the sending of a deed by the grantor to a stranger, or the deposit of it in a public office, is not a delivery to the grantee, unless it is so sent or deposited for his use."

In Hatch v. Haskins (5 Shepley, 397), Justice Shepley said: "The possession and production of a deed by the grantee, is prima facie evidence of its having been delivered; and for like reasons, in the absence of all contradictory testimony, the presumption arises, when found in the possession and produced by the grantor, that it has not been delivered." See also, Cutts v. York Manufg Co. (6 Id. 191).

In Stiles v. Brown (16 Vt. 565) Justice Hubbard said: "The case finds that the deed of the land and the note for the purchase of the same, together with the contract, were all deposited with a third person, to be by him delivered, upon certain conditions; and that those conditions were not complied with. The deed seems to have been duly executed and recorded, and plaintiff offered it in evidence. The defendant objected to it on the ground that it had not been delivered. The delivery of a deed or other writing is as necessary to its validity as its execution, and it only takes effect from its delivery. (Clayton v. Levirman, 4 Dev. & Batt. 239.)

John Currey, for Respondent.

It is insisted, on behalf of appellant, that it was not competent for defendants to show an outstanding title in Mr. Woods, without showing connection with that title. The defendants, by producing the Woods deed in evidence, did not admit any title in him or in the plaintiff at any time; nor does the implication arise, that thereby the defendants conceded that plaintiff or Woods ever was the owner of the land, or had any cause of action against them, as the plaintiff's counsel seem to believe. It would be quite as logical to hold that the production of evidence in contradiction of a fact alleged, admits the truth of the alleged fact, as to say that such a consequence follows from the production of the Woods deed in evidence.

In Bird v. Lisbros (9 Cal. 5, 6) the Court held, that prior possession is evidence of title; and that this evidence may be destroyed by abandonment; and the Court say: "In ejectment, the plaintiff must show title in himself, as against the defendant." This is a cardinal doctrine in ejectment, that has never yet been overthrown by this Court, notwithstanding the repeated efforts that have been made to induce such a result. The Court also say: "Suppose that the defendant had proved that Ralph Bird had previously conveyed the property in controversy to another party. He certainly could have done so, and that would have defeated plaintiff's action." In Schauber v. Jackson (2 Wend. 48) Senator Oliver said: "Suppose the plaintiff produces and proves a prima facie regular paper title, and the defendant shows conclusively that the whole claim of title is a forgery, is this unavailable to him because he is a naked possessor? Is not his possession good against all the world, except the legal owner? Has it ever been questioned that a defendant in ejectment, though a naked possessor, may defend himself by showing that the plaintiff has sold and conveyed his right to the premises to a third person, before the commencement of the action?"

Did the defendants do otherwise, in the case at bar, than is said, in the two cases last cited, it was competent for them to do? It is argued on the part of the plaintiff, that a defendant cannot show an outstanding title to a third person, without connecting himself with it, when the plaintiff relies on prior possession; but it is admitted that he may do so, when the plaintiff predicates his right to a recovery, on what they denominate "strict title." And, in order to render his status invulnerable to the attack of the defendants, because of his relinquishment to Woods of all his alleged right and title in and to the premises, the plaintiff's counsel disclaim any right for their client subsisting in title, saying: "He relied upon his prior possession, and was therefore in the position, in which, as we claim, an outstanding title could not be set up against him."

The instances in which a defendant is not permitted to controvert the plaintiff's right to recover, by showing the title to be in a third person, when he does not show directly his connection with it, are exceedingly few, and the reasons for the rule that prevails in those cases are obvious, and are necessary to the preservation of the law as a system. These instances may be arranged as follows: 1st, when the defendant enters into possession under, or claims the possession through the plaintiff; 2d, when the plaintiff claims under a valid judgment or decree against the defendant, and purchase of the premises duly made by authority of such judgment or decree; 3d, when the defendant, without claim of title, is an intruder into and upon the plaintiff's actual possession of the premises demanded. (Schauber v. Jackson, 2 Wend. 62.) It will be seen in the first and second of these cases, there is a direct privity existing between the parties, in relation to the subject matter; and in the third, the objection is threefold against allowing the defendant to show a paramount title in a third person, without connecting himself with it. The first of which is, that the actual possession of the plaintiff, of which he has been tortiously deprived by the defendant, is of itself evidence of the title in fee in the plaintiff, or evidence that he holds in subordination to the title in whomsoever it may be. The second is, that the defendant, as a naked intruder and tortfeasor, cannot be permitted to avail himself of a status which he has acquired by wrong, to put the plaintiff to other proof of his right to the possession, than the very actual possession of which the defendant tortiously deprived him. And the third is, that the law does not accord to one who acquires possession by force and violence, the presumption that he entered upon the actual possession of the plaintiff in subordination to the better title, in the absence of affirmative evidence establishing his connection with it. It is stated also in objection to the Woods deed, that it was executed and placed in the hands of Solomon A. Sharp, in escrow, to be delivered to Mr. Woods, on performance by him of conditions alleged; and that these conditions were not performed. Nothing of this kind appears upon the face of the deed; nor is it pretended that any written contract was entered into by Mr. Woods with the plaintiff, to do anything whatever as a consideration for the plaintiff's release and quitclaim. The consideration expressed in the deed was $5,000, and its payment was acknowledged, and the right of the plaintiff to contradict the truth of his acknowledgment in the deed of that consideration, is at least, questionable. But suppose the Woods deed was placed in the hands of Mr. Sharp, upon the condition alleged by the plaintiff. This condition might have been waived, or discharged without its performance; and the presumption is, that its performance did not continue a condition to be performed before delivery of the deed; for otherwise it must of necessity be assumed, that not only was Mr. Woods guilty of fraudulently obtaining the deed, but that Mr. Sharp was equally guilty with him, by delivering the deed before performance of the condition. Such a presumption will not be indulged, without affirmative proof of facts, from which as a legitimate deduction the presumption must follow. (Starr v. Peck, 1 Hill, 272; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. Sec. 190.)

The entry of the Treats in Sept., 1850, was a trespass on the Government domain. (U. S. Stat. at Large, 445, and Brightly's Dig. 487, Sec. 171.) So was that of the plaintiff. Neither the Treats, nor the plaintiff, were authorized to make an entry under any Federal or State law. The plaintiff did not claim any right as a preëmtor under any law of the United States; nor a right under the Possessory Act of this State, passed in 1852, because then he would have been required to limit his claim to one hundred and sixty acres; but he relied, say his counsel, upon his prior possession. The evidence shows that plaintiff entered into the employment of George Treat, in 1851. He must be presumed to have known that Treat did not and could not acquire a right or title to so large an area by putting up an old fence across the neck that connected this peninsula with the main land. He must have known that the possession of Treat to the extent of his occupation was a trespass; and that the quitclaim deed executed by him operated only as a release of the possession of the portion of the land actually occupied, and could not become the basis of an adverse possession to any land not actually occupied by the releasor. Such deed could not have the effect to extend, by construction, the plaintiff's right beyond that which he actually occupied, and of which he had, in the language of the authorities, the possessio pedis; and it may well be doubted whether the possession which plaintiff obtained, if any, could be tacked to the prior possession of Treat. (King v. Smith, Rice, S. C., 11; Beadle v. Hunter, 3 Strob. 331, 336.) In Lessee of Potts v. Gilbert (3 Wash. C. C. 475) Judge Washington expressed himself as clear, that where several persons enter into possession, the last cannot tack the possession of his predecessor to his own; and even if there had been conveyances, he asks, "what had any of them in point of title to convey?" The plaintiff did not, as we have already said, claim any right as a preëmtor under the laws of the United States; nor any right under the "Possessory Act" of this State. He well knew that by such a claim he would be limited to one hundred and sixty acres—a quantity entirely too inconsiderable to satisfy one of his comprehensive grasp. Hence, he has sought by this action to extend his claim (though thereby he trenched on the rights of the Government and its policy, as well as upon the rights of her citizens, who were allowed under the Act of Congress of 1853—10 U. S. Stat. at Large, 246, Sec. 6, extended by an Act of 1854; Id. 268—to settle on the unsurveyed public lands) to the whole peninsula of

Dyson v. Bradshaw.

1,500 acres. If he could thus extend his right to the possession of 1,500 acres, why could he not have gained by the same means a right to 15,000 acres, if the Potrero Nuevo had contained so much? Will it be pretended that one who thus enters on a large tract of land surrounded by water that affords a barrier to the ingress of cattle, thereby acquires a right to the exclusive possession of the whole land? (Preston v. Kehoe, 15 Cal. 318; Wolf v. Baldwin, 19 Id. 313.)

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of a large tract of about 1,000 acres of land in the City and County of San Francisco, known as the Potrero Nuevo. The tract claimed by the plaintiff is bounded on three sides by Mission Creek, Precita Creek, and the Bay of San Francisco; and on the other side by a line running from one creek to the other. It seems that one Treat, in 1850, erected a house and corral on the tract, which was then vacant, and built a stone wall and fence from one creek to the other, thus making, with the bay and creeks, an inclosure in which cattle and horses were pastured. In 1852, Treat conveyed the tract to Dyson, under which Dyson took and held possession, and claims the title thereto. The defendants entered and took possession of portions of the tract at different times, without title. In April, 1853, the plaintiff conveyed a portion of the premises, by quitclaim deed, to Robert E. Woods, under an agreement that Woods was to remove the settlers from the Potrero; and the deed was placed in the hands of one Sharp, as an escrow, and was not to be delivered to Woods until the latter had removed all the settlers, as per agreement. The case was tried by a jury, who found a verdict "in favor of the defendants, in consequence of the description contained in the deed from the plaintiff to Robert E. Woods — the land occupied by the defendants having been conveyed to said Woods."

The first point urged by the appellant is, that the Court below erred in admitting in evidence the deed from the plaintiff to Woods, on the ground that it was not pleaded, and the defendants did not connect themselves with the title of Woods. The plaintiff avers, in his complaint, that he was the owner of the premises, which is denied by the answer, and the deed was clearly admissible to disprove this averment and sustain the denial, as it showed that plaintiff had no title to that portion of the premises described in the deed. The objection that the defendants did not connect themselves with the title of Woods is equally untenable. The appellant, to sustain this point, refers to several decisions of this Court, wherein it was held that in an action to recover the possession of real estate, brought solely on the prior actual possession of the plaintiff, a defendant, who is a mere trespasser, cannot justify his act by showing the true title to be outstanding in a third person. (Bird v. Lisbros, 9 Cal. 1; Piercy v. Sabin, 10 Id. 22; Coryell v. Cain, 16 Id. 567.) This rule has no application to the present case. It properly applies to a case where the title of such third person is superior or better than that of the plaintiff, or adverse thereto, and it has no application in a case like the present, where such outstanding title was derived from the plaintiff. In such case, it shows that the plaintiff has divested himself of all right to the possession by his own act, and that the right to maintain the action under his own claim of title is not in him, but in a third person. It defeats his action more effectually than proof of an abandonment, which is clearly sufficient. (Bird v. Lisbros, 9 Cal. 1; Gluckauf v. Reed, 22 Id. 468.)

The next point is, that the Court erred in excluding the evidence offered by the plaintiff to prove that Woods failed to comply with the agreement, which was a condition precedent to the delivery of the deed. A deed takes effect only from the time of its delivery; and where a deed is placed in the hands of a third person as an escrow, as in this case, the grantee was only entitled to a delivery of the deed upon a strict compliance with the terms of the agreement, which was clearly a condition precedent to its delivery. (Beem v. McCusick, 10 Cal. 538.) As was said in that case, a compliance with the agreement was "the only condition whereby Beem, the grantee, could acquire title;" and not having complied, it was held that the grantor had a right "to hold the contract void." So here, the removal of the settlers from the Potrero was a condition precedent to the delivery of the deed to Woods, and to the vesting of any title in him; and if true that he did not comply with or perform that agreement, then he acquired no title by the deed, and the plaintiffs had a right to treat the contract as void, Woods having died in the meantime. The Court therefore clearly erred in excluding this evidence; and this is fatal to the verdict, which shows by its own terms that it was founded entirely on this deed.

The learned and able counsel for the respondents urges with much force, that the land being a part of the public domain of the United States, Treat and the plaintiff were trespassers on the land, and had no right, under the Federal or State laws, to enter upon or take possession of more than one hundred and sixty acres, that being the quantity to which settlers upon the public lands are limited, by the Federal as well as by the State laws, except in cases of swamp and certain school lands under the State laws. There is certainly much force in the argument of the counsel, that to hold otherwise would defeat one of the wisest and most important provisions of our National and State land system, and open the door for an unlimited monopoly of the public lands, by those able to inclose them in large tracts. The contrary doctrine was, however, early established by this Court, and has been maintained ever since. The same point was distinctly raised and overruled in Hicks v. Davis (4 Cal. 67), which was very similar in its facts to the present case; and also in Bradshaw v. Treat (6 Id. 172), which was for a portion of the premises in controversy in this case. (See also Plume v. Seward, 4 Id. 94.) We do not feel at liberty to overrule a law of property so long established, and which might produce disastrous consequences. Besides, it is a point not necessary to be determined on the present appeal, as the judgment must be reversed for the reason before given.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Gyle v. Shoenbar.

GYLE v. SHOENBAR.

A BROUGHT an action against B, and averred in his complaint that C was indebted to A; that B promised A to pay C's debt if A would release C, and that in consideration of the promise A did release C: held, that the release of C, being the alleged consideration of the promise of B, was an essential fact to be proved, and that unless proved A could not recover.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifteenth Judicial District, Tehama County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

W. P. C. Whiting, for Appellant.

Admitting that the promise laid in the complaint, is not within the Statute of Frauds, yet "that plaintiff released Levinson," was an essential averment, necessary to be proved, and without which the promise laid is void, not only by reason of the statute, but for want of any consideration, and because the release was ex vi termini, a condition precedent upon the performance of which only the promise was to take effect.

Far as the Courts have gone in upholding claims which, to an ordinary understanding, would seem to be not only within the plain letter of the statute, but to present in themselves excellent illustrations of the very evils the statute was intended to remedy, they have thus far uniformly held, that in cases of promises to pay the debt of a third party, in consideration of his release, "the discharge of the original debtor must be complete and must be proved." (Corbett v. Cochrane, 3 Hill, 41; Harrington v. Rich. 6 Vt. 666.) And particularly the case of Forth v. Staunton (1 Saund. 211), in a note in which the following language is used: "The question whether each particular case comes within this clause of the statute or not, depends on the fact of the original party remaining liable, coupled with the absence of any liability on the part of the defendant or his property, except such as arises from his express promise."

W. S. Long, for Respondent.

Gyle v. Shoenbar.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the sum of four hundred and ninety-four dollars and seventy-four cents, which the complaint alleges the defendant promised to pay the plaintiff, if he would release one Levinson from the payment of a debt which the latter owed the plaintiff. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff did release the Levinson debt, and that the defendant was therefore liable to pay the sum agreed upon; and the Court found that fact in favor of the plaintiff, and accordingly judgment was rendered in his favor, from which the defendant appeals.

The assignment of error is, that there was no evidence to sustain the finding that the Levinson debt had been released by the plaintiff. It appears from the evidence that Levinson was engaged in selling goods in Tehama, when, becoming heavily indebted to various persons, especially the defendant, the latter purchased his stock of goods, notes, and book accounts, in satisfaction of the debt due to him, and for other considerations, as is alleged. The plaintiff testified as a witness on his own behalf, and stated that at the time the defendant bought out Levinson, he promised to pay him his debt against Levinson, which amounted to the sum before stated; that defendant told him he wanted him to stay in the store, and he would pay him his debt, and the same wages that Levinson had paid him; that he saw defendant afterward in San Francisco, in April, 1861, when he promised to pay him in two weeks. The plaintiff does not state that he ever released Levinson from the payment of the debt, and after a careful examination of the evidence we are unable to find any evidence to that effect. This release was the alleged consideration of the promise of the defendant, and is an essential fact to be proved, it having been put in issue by the pleadings. (Lewis v. Myers, 3 Cal. 475.) It may be that it was a mistake of the pleader in averring that such was the consideration of the promise; but if so he should have corrected the mistake by amending the complaint. Not having done so, his proof must conform to his pleading. No other consideration for the promise is alleged in the complaint or found by the Court; and this being unsustained by any evidence, the Court erred in its finding in this respect, and such error constitutes a proper ground for reversing the judgment and ordering a new trial. (Cummings v. Scott, 20 Cal. 83.)

The judgment is therefore reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WALDEN v. MURDOCK.

AN appeal from an order refusing a new trial, although taken more than one year after the rendition of judgment, brings up the whole record, and the Supreme Court, if satisfied that the Court below erred in refusing a new trial, may reverse the order and grant a new trial, the effect of which will be to vacate the judgment.

When an appeal is taken from an order granting or refusing a new trial, no statement on appeal need be made or filed after the entry of the order, but the statement prepared and used on the hearing of the motion in the Court below, will be sufficient in the Supreme Court.

A bona fide purchase made by a creditor of the goods of his debtor, who is in insolvent circumstances, is not fraudulent, merely because such creditor thereby obtains a preference over other creditors, and may be aware at the time that his purchase will have the effect of delaying or defeating the other creditors in the collection of their debts.

A bona fide sale of cattle roaming at large over the plains, upon a defined or certain range, is not fraudulent as against the creditors of the vendor, merely because the sale is not followed by an immediate delivery of possession; but the parties are entitled to a reasonable time after the sale, to prepare for a rodeo, and give the proper notices thereof, in order that they may separate the cattle purchased from stock owned by others, and to properly mark and brand them; and in the meantime the rights acquired by the purchaser will not be lost.

Where cattle, roaming at large, purchased in good faith, are collected together and marked with the brand of the purchaser, and then allowed to pasture on their accustomed range, these acts constitute a good delivery and continued change of possession.

A mere execution of a bill of sale of cattle roaming at large, in which the brand with which they are marked, is described, accompanied by a delivery of the branding iron, does not constitute a delivery of possession of the cattle.

APPEAL from the District Court, Thirteenth Judicial District, Stanislaus County.

Walden v. Murdock.

The cattle levied on by the Sheriff, and for which this suit was brought, were that portion of the herd sold by Wells to Walden, roaming at large over the plains, and of which Walden had not, previous to the levy, taken actual possession.

The verdict was rendered and the judgment entered up June 14th, 1861. On the same day plaintiff filed and served notice of motion for a new trial, and within five days thereafter filed and served his statement on motion for new trial. No other statement was made on appeal from the order.

The other facts are stated in the opinion.

John B. Hall, for Appellant.

I. The point is made by the respondent's counsel that more than a year having elapsed between the entry of the judgment and the appeal, this Court has no jurisdiction to hear it so far as the judgment is concerned; and that the record showing no statement of the case, made and filed after the order refusing a new trial, the statement in the record cannot be referred to the order, and "the whole case rests on the judgment roll," and the order of refusal must be affirmed.

Our statute provides for the immediate entry of a judgment on the verdict, unless the case be reserved for argument. (Prac. Act, Sec. 197.)

By the English rule, on the contrary, no judgment was entered on the verdict until the first four days of the next succeeding term had expired. (3 Black. Com. side p. 387-396.) But if before the end of that term a motion for a new trial came, the entry of the judgment was thereby suspended. (Id.) The same effect was formerly allowed (our statutory provision to the contrary) to the motion in many of the District Courts of this State, and the entry of the judgment was not made by the Clerk until the Court or Judge decided the motion against the moving party; and until then all proceedings subsequent to verdict were suspended. This practice regarded the motion, when perfected by the statement, as equivalent to a reservation of the Court for argument of the question, Shall judgment be entered on the verdict, or shall the issue be retried? The motion stood for argument by the statute. (Id. 195.)

Walden v. Murdock.

The decision in Hutchinson v. Bours (13 Cal. 50) suggests a different practice, and pursuant thereto the judgment was entered by the Clerk, although the motion and statement intervened. But this decision has not made a material change in the effect of the motion. It only enlarges its effect if granted, and causes the order to extend to setting aside the judgment as well as the verdict. (Hutchinson v. Bours, 13 Cal. 50; Lurvey v. Wells, 4 Id. 106.)

Now, the appellant maintains the converse of respondent's proposition, and says that the judgment which rests on the verdict follows the motion, and whether it is to continue to exist or perish depends exclusively and absolutely on the fate of the motion.

What is a new trial? "A reëxamination," says the statute, "of an issue of fact in the same Court after a trial and decision by the jury, Court, or referee." (Prac. Act, Sec. 192.) "The former verdict or other decision may be vacated," etc. (Id. 193.)

The motion brings up the single question, Shall the verdict be set aside or vacated? If the verdict be set aside, the judgment falls necessarily, and it would not require a declaration to that effect in the order of the Court. If the verdict be not canceled the judgment stands in full force and effect, still remaining subject to the power of the appellate tribunal to order that to be done which the Court below refused.

If, then, the power vested with the Court at the date of its action on the motion, either to vacate or to ratify the verdict, the right to appeal was saved to either party deeming himself aggrieved by the order, and to seek at the hands of the appellate tribunal a correction of the alleged wrongful exercise of the power. And if the higher tribunal shall order that to be done which was done by the order appealed from, the same consequence follows as though it had been so ordered by the inferior Court, viz.: the verdict is set aside, and the judgment which never had more than contingent vitality, also falls for want of a foundation. And the Supreme Court acquires full power over the judgment, although no appeal is directly taken therefrom by means of the order made on the motion from which an appeal is taken. (Lower v. Knox, 10 Cal. 480; Hanscom v. Tower, 17 Id. 518; Burdge v. Gold Hill Co., 15 Id. 198.)

To enable the Court to review the judgment on the appeal from the order, the statement filed on making the motion, if filed within twenty days after judgment is entered, is sufficient, and no other statement is necessary. (Loucks v. Edmondson, 18 Cal. 203, 204.)

The plaintiff asked the following instruction :

That if the jury shall believe, from the evidence, that Wells was indebted to the plaintiff, on the twenty-eighth day of November last, in the sum of two notes, the one from Wells to Walden for eight hundred and thirty-six dollars and interest; and the one, Wells as principal and Walden surety, to Crow, for six hundred and fifty dollars and interest, in all, the sum of $1,800, or thereabouts, it was lawful for Wells to sell, and Walden to buy, all Wells' cattle for a fair price, and in payment of said debt; although the jury should further believe, that said Wells was, at the time, in insolvent circumstances, and Walden knew it; and although such sale and transfer operated as a preference to Walden over any other creditor, or creditors; and although said Walden may have known that other creditors would thereby be defeated of his or their debts.

The Court refused this instruction, and thereby declared the rule therein embodied, as applied to the hypothetical state of facts, was not the law. This was error, which necessarily under the condition of the proofs, must have operated to the prejudice of the plaintiff's case when under deliberation by the jury. The instruction is no abstract proposition of law, having no reference to the case in hand; but it announces a rule which results from facts directly put in issue by the pleadings, and as to which most testimony has been offered.

One of the chief defenses, is a fraudulent and fictitious sale. It is a right of a creditor to protect himself by his vigilance, and if need be, to save himself by means of a purchase of his debtor's property, either in part, or in the whole, although the debtor may be in extremis of pecuniary embarrassment, and the sale work a preference over as well as actually to defeat equally meritorious claims, even with the knowledge of both contracting parties. The principle of law, not now to be questioned in this State, embodying this rule, is briefly and forcibly expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in these words: "The debtor may prefer one creditor, pay him fully, and exhaust his whole property, leaving nothing for others, equally meritorious." (Clark v. White, 12 Peters, 178, 200.)

It may become the highest duty (says this Honorable Court) of an insolvent to sell his property in order to pay his debts. (Kinder v. Macy, 7 Cal. 206.) The rule announced in words, so few and cogent, by the Supreme Court of the United States, is adopted, without limitation or qualification of any kind, by this Court in the case of Dana v. Stanford et al. (10 Cal. 269, 277), in which the correlative right of the creditor in this State: "A creditor violates no rule of law when he takes payment on security for his demand, though others are thereby deprived of all means of obtaining satisfaction of their own equally meritorious claims." Now, the plaintiff's instruction simply announced this principle of the law of debtor and creditor, and requested its application to the facts.

II. The next ground of error is extracted from the action of the Court, in having refused the plaintiff's third instruction, and in having granted the defendant's two instructions, all on the subject of the sufficiency of the delivery. The law, as given to the jury, was, that the established facts shown by the plaintiff, fell short of the delivery demanded by the statute; and that the property being cattle grazing on the plains, within certain ranges, a delivery could be legally made, in order to avail against the attaching creditor, in this single manner, viz.: by being collected together, picked out, and actually delivered by Wells to Walden, or his agent. This Court, in commenting upon the statutory rule of delivery in Chapin v. Doub (14 Cal. 384), say: "although delivery be requisite, in cases of sale, yet what will constitute a delivery, must depend, in some measure, upon the character of the article sold, and the peculiar circumstances of the case." It is respectfully urged that the doctrine adopted by the Court below, wholly ignored the nature of the property, and the attendant circumstances of its condition.

The Legislature has declared that contracts for property of this kind shall be evidenced by "a written descriptive bill of sale;" and this requirement, it is insisted, has not been imposed without a reason or an object. (Wood's Dig. 542, Art. 2815.) The act is subsequent in date to that requiring immediate delivery from vendor to vendee, of things sold. It is to be presumed that the provision for the execution of a bill of sale, was enacted with an intelligent reference to the nature of the property, its ranging at large for grazing, and the but periodical actual possession for the purpose of actual delivery of its owners, the condition of the country, and the requirements of trade and barter, and with full knowledge also, of the then existing general act, demanding immediate delivery in all sales of personalty. Sales are made, as was this, out of the season of rodeos, and a large force must be employed, and much time occupied and heavy expense incurred to comply strictly with the rule of immediate delivery, if, as the Court below hold, there must be a gathering together of the cattle, a separation, and actual turning over into the manual custody. To do all this, rodeos must be had at various points, within the exterior lines of the range; the owners of like property everywhere within the exterior boundaries of the range, and their cattle, must be put in motion, and, oftentimes, to the detriment of owners and property. Besides, the performance of this essential may be called for at a time and under circumstances, to wit: of season, condition of rivers, woods, and country generally, occupied by the cattle, as that performance may be either impossible, or so difficult and expensive, as to operate as an effectual suppression of contracts in this kind of property. If by immediate delivery is meant a delivery at the instant of time, or within the hour, or day, after the terms of sale are agreed upon, the rule as to property of this sort, in this State, will prove impracticable oftentimes, and "an actual and continued change of possession," if required to be so marked as, per se, to notify every one of the change, the conditions of performance will impose burdens on the buyer or else sacrifices, which must operate greatly in restraint of trade of which cattle are the subject. The article requiring a written descriptive bill of sale, was evidently intended to meet and to obviate these difficulties. It should receive a liberal construction, and be allowed a corresponding legal effect. It should be permitted to stand in lieu of the "immediate delivery" where at the time of the sale, the situation of the property renders immediate delivery impracticable, and where all the circumstances attending the transaction manifest a purpose on the part of the vendor to transfer full possession and control to the vendee.

H. P. Barber, for Respondent.

The first point made by respondent is, that this Court has no jurisdiction over the judgment, the appeal not having been taken within one year from the entry thereof. Sec. 336 of the Practice Act provides, that an appeal from a judgment may be taken within one year after rendition of judgment. Sec. 333 says, a judgment or order may be reviewed as prescribed by Title 9, and not otherwise. It is therefore plain that the judgment cannot be disturbed.

Let us now see if the order refusing a new trial can be reviewed on appeal, where the judgment must stand, and if the whole case does not rest on the judgment roll. An order granting or refusing a new trial is not a judgment. (Duane v. N. Y. R. R. Co., 4 How. 364.) Where a party wishes to render an appeal from an order refusing a new trial effectual, he must also appeal from the judgment within statute time; for of what avail can an order for a new trial be, while the judgment stands against him unreversed and a final estoppel? The Practice Act, Sec. 336, gives an appeal within sixty days from an order refusing a new trial, and from any order made after final judgment. But by Sec. 338, the statement explaining the grounds of error in such order must be filed, or prepared within twenty days after the entry of such order. The same reasoning will apply as to a statement filed before the order appealed from, as to filing a bond on appeal, before filing the notice. (Dooling v. Moore, 19 Cal. 81.) Now, if the judgment be not appealed from in time, the statement, so far as it can affect the judgment, fails, or falls with the appeal, for want of jurisdiction. Nor can such statement, on motion for a new trial, be considered as appurtenant to the order refusing the motion; for it is not filed after the order, as required by statute, but before it. If the statement on motion for a new trial be used in this case as a statement on appeal, the same objection applies. It was filed June 14th, 1861, and the order overruling a new trial was not made till June 10th, 1862; so that the statement, instead of being filed twenty days after the order, was filed nearly a year before. When the statement, as settled by the Judge, is used as a statement on appeal, it becomes a part of and wholly appurtenant to the judgment; it becomes, in fact, a part of the record, like a bill of exceptions; and the appeal from the judgment failing, the statement falls with it. Upon this point we submit these propositions:

The appeal from a judgment, being taken after the expiration of one year, is a nullity.

If the appeal be considered as from an order refusing a new trial, the statement being filed before, instead of after the order appealed from, cannot, under Sec. 336 of the Practice Act, be considered as a statement on appeal from such order.

If it be considered as a statement on appeal from the judgment, the appeal from the judgment being a nullity, the statement is unavailable.

By Sec. 342, the statement, if from a final judgment, is to be annexed to the judgment roll (as in this case); if from an order, then to such order, or a copy thereof; but if the statement be on appeal from an order, it must be prepared after the entry of such order. Here, the record shows it was prepared and filed nearly a year before the order. In all cases either of judgments or orders, the statement on appeal must be prepared after the entry of such judgment or order, and can be referred as belonging solely to a judgment or order made antecedent to its filing or preparation.

As to the errors assigned by appellant. The first charge requested by him contains three errors. It requests the Court to charge, that if the jury shall find "that Wells was indebted to the plaintiff," etc. This is a case in which fraud was set up as a defense. The charge entirely omits the words "bona fide," or the question whether Wells was, bona fide, indebted to the plaintiff. Wells might very well have been indebted to plaintiff, and the indebtedness been perfectly good as between them, and yet fraudulent and void as against creditors. The least consideration for the notes would have been good as between Wells and plaintiff, but not so as against creditors. (Proyne's Case, 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 1.) The third instruction requested by the plaintiff and refused was, that if a part of the cattle were within an inclosure, and delivered to the plaintiff, and the rest were remaining on their usual range, and not actually delivered (except by the bill of sale and transfer of the marking irons), that the actual delivery of the cattle in the inclosure constituted a valid delivery of the whole, as against creditors. Wood's Digest, Art. 403, Sec. 15, provides, that the sale must be accompanied with "an immediate delivery and an actual and continued change of possession." The instruction assumes, that a mere verbal delivery of the cattle running at large, would be sufficient. We apprehend this is not law. The Court laid down the law correctly in its own charge, "that if it is within a reasonable possibility for the vendee to receive or get actual possession, it must be done to make the sale valid as against creditors." This we believe is the correct doctrine, and plaintiff's requested charge, that it was absolute law that a verbal or symbolical delivery of cattle running on a range was sufficient, was properly refused. The delivery of the bill of sale and branding irons, is by no means an "actual" delivery of the cattle; and it was a question for the jury, under the circumstances of the case, as to whether there was any difficulty in the vendor making actual delivery, and whether he had made any endeavor so to do.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring specially.

The plaintiff sues to recover damages for the seizure and conversion of one hundred and seventy-five head of cattle, claimed by him. The defendant justifies under a writ of attachment in his hands, as Sheriff, issued at the suit of one Wilson against one Wells, the plaintiff's vendor. The cattle in controversy were part of a large lot bought by the plaintiff of Wells on the twenty-eighth day of November, 1860, in consideration of the plaintiff's note for two thousand dollars and a debt of eight hundred and thirty-six dollars, besides interest due from Wells to the plaintiff; and also a debt of six hundred and fifty dollars due one Crow, on which the plaintiff was surety. A bill of sale of the property was executed to the plaintiff on the twenty-ninth of November. The attachment had been issued at the time of this sale, but it was not levied on the property until the thirtieth of November. On the part of the defendant, it was contended, that there was no delivery or continued change of possession in the sale to the plaintiff, as required by Sec. 15 of the Statute of Frauds; that it was therefore fraudulent and void as against the defendant, who was a creditor of the vendor. The verdict and judgment in favor of the defendant was rendered June 14th, 1861, and an order overruling a motion for a new trial was made June 10th, 1862, and the notice of appeal from the judgment and order was filed August 4th, 1862 — within sixty days from the date of the order overruling the motion for a new trial, but more than one year from the rendition of the judgment.

The respondent contends, that this Court has no jurisdiction of the appeal from the judgment, it not having been taken in time; and that this Court cannot take any action affecting the judgment, under the appeal from the order denying a new trial, for the same reason. In the case of Hanscom v. Tower (17 Cal. 518), there was no appeal from the judgment, but only from the order refusing a new trial; and the Court in that case say, in answer to the same objection: "The appeal from the order refusing a new trial brings up the whole record; and there is nothing in the point that error cannot be assigned upon the judgment roll." Under this appeal, this Court has a clear right, should it be satisfied that the Court erred in refusing a new trial, to reverse the order and grant a new trial, the effect of which is to vacate the judgment. This objection is therefore overruled.

It is also contended, that the statement filed in the Court below, on the motion for a new trial, having been filed before the order appealed from, must be disregarded. The rules relating to statements and bills of exceptions were fully laid down by this Court, in the case of Towdy v. Ellis (22 Cal. 650). Under the principles as there announced, this objection is untenable. So, in the case of Loucks v. Edmondson (18 Cal. 203), it was held, that on appeal from an order granting or refusing a new trial, there is no necessity for preparing a statement on appeal, the statement on motion for new trial being sufficient.

At the trial, the plaintiff asked the Court to give the following instruction, which was refused, and this is assigned as error: "If the jury shall believe from the evidence that Wells was indebted to the plaintiff on the twenty-eighth of November last in the sum of two notes — the one from Wells to Walden for eight hundred and thirty-six dollars and interest, and the one from Wells as principal and Walden as surety to Crow for six hundred and fifty dollars and interest — in all some $1,800 or thereabouts — it was lawful for Wells to sell and Walden to buy all of Wells' cattle at a fair price and in payment of said debt, although the jury should further believe that said Wells was at the time in insolvent circumstances, and Walden knew it; and although such sale and transfer operated as a preference to said Walden over any other creditor or creditors, and although Walden may have known that other creditors would be thereby defeated of their debts." If the instruction had been limited to a statement that a bona fide sale of property by a debtor in insolvent circumstances to his creditor, in payment or satisfaction of his debts, is not fraudulent, merely because such creditor thereby obtains a preference over other creditors, and he may be aware at the time that it will have the effect of defeating the collection of other debts, it would have been proper, under the decisions of this Court. (Dana v. Stanford, 10 Cal. 277; Kinder v. Macy, 7 Id. 206.) But such sale must be bona fide, a point which is ignored in the instruction as asked; and it is therefore erroneous to that extent, and the Court did not err in refusing to give it in that form. Besides, the refusal did not injure the plaintiff, as the Court gave another instruction, embodying substantially the same principle relied upon in this instruction.

The important question involved in this case relates to the delivery of the cattle to the vendee. It seems that the sale from Wells to the plaintiff was of about five hundred head of cattle, about two hundred of which were at the time in a field of the vendor's; and the plaintiff, immediately on the day of sale, drove them over to his own ranch and put them in an inclosure of his own. There is no doubt as to the sufficiency of the delivery of this portion of the cattle. The remainder not thus driven from Wells' field to the plaintiff's were ranging upon open, uninclosed lands in the neighborhood, with the cattle of other persons, as far as twenty or twenty-five miles around. The vendor went out on the plains with the plaintiff and pointed out to him about fifteen to twenty head, which the latter took possession of, and the vendor pointed out the range and told the vendee to take the whole; but no further act of delivery or taking possession seems to have occurred, except the execution of the bill of sale, in which the cattle are described as having the brand of the vendor, which is set forth therein. It was these cattle that were attached, and are now in controversy. On this point the Court, at the request of the defendant, gave the following instructions, which are now assigned as error: "That if, in the present case, the cattle alleged to have been sold by Wells to the plaintiff were susceptible of actual delivery, and could have been brought under the actual control or within the actual possession of the plaintiff, as by being collected or picked out and actually delivered to him or his agents, and this was not done, the sale was void as against the creditor, Wilson, and the defendant is entitled to a verdict. That the sale of cattle grazing on the plains within certain ranges, if they can be collected together and delivered, is not valid as against attaching creditors without such delivery; that if they can be collected and brought within the personal supervision and control of the party purchasing, a mere transfer by bill of sale, while they are running loose on the plains, is not good in law as against such attaching creditors."

This question as to what will constitute a valid delivery and a continued change of possession in a sale of stock ranging at large over the immense uninclosed plains in this State, is a most important one, deeply affecting the interests of those dealing in that kind of property. It not only affects the right of the vendee as against the claims of the creditors of the vendor, but also as against his subsequent vendees. The difficulties attending a delivery by securing to the vendee the actual control of such stock, often wild and hard to manage, are great; but if in addition to that he is required to keep them under his actual control, and not allow them to pasture upon their accustomed range, in order to establish a continued and exclusive possession, the difficulty becomes almost insurmountable. The difficulties growing out of the ownership by numerous parties, of vast herds of stock roaming over our extensive plains with their rapid increase, even in cases where there is no contest between adverse claimants to the same animals, are great, and the

Walden v. Murdock.

Legislature, in order to prevent controversies, and to secure the evidence of ownership in a practicable mode best adapted to the circumstances of the country, has passed laws regulating the marking, branding, and counterbranding of stock, and requiring the owners to give rodeos at stated periods of the year, for the purpose of separating their stock, and marking and branding it so as to designate the owner. (Wood's Dig. 542, 659.) These laws are imperative in their character, and are required by the wants and necessities of the country.

Under the rodeo law, the owners of cattle in the county where the stock in controversy ranged, were required to give one general rodeo between the first of March and the thirty-first day of August of each year; and Sec. 9 of the act provides that "no person shall be allowed to mark or brand any portion or the whole of his cattle, at any other time or in any other manner than as prescribed in this act; and whoever shall act to the contrary will subject himself on conviction before any Justice of the Peace, to a penalty of not less than one hundred dollars nor more than five hundred dollars, at the discretion of the Justice." It is clear, that if the plaintiff had collected together the cattle purchased by him, and marked them with his own mark and brand, and then let them go, to pasture on their accustomed range, that would have constituted a good delivery and continued change of possession. But the third section of the law provides that "no owner of a stock farm shall be required to give a rodeo from the first day of November to the first day of March in each year, except on a contract for the delivery of cattle, or on a legal demand from the Sheriff or constable of his county, having an execution against the owner, and demanding a rodeo for the levy or delivery of cattle." Sec. 1 of the same act, requires that four days' previous notice of such rodeos shall be given to all the owners of adjoining farms, in order that parties interested may meet for the purpose of separating their respective cattle. Sec. 7 of the act respecting marks and brands provides, that "any person or persons selling cattle which are not intended for slaughter, or any horses, mares, mules, jacks, or jennies, shall be required to counterbrand them on the shoulders or give a written descriptive bill of sale, etc."

It is clear, that under the Statute of Frauds, the parties are entitled to a reasonable time in which to complete a delivery of personal property which had been commenced immediately after the sale, and under these statutory provisions the plaintiff was entitled to a reasonable time after the purchase to prepare for a rodeo, and to give the proper notices thereof, in order that he might separate the cattle purchased by him from the stock owned by others, and to properly mark and brand it; and in the meantime the rights acquired by his purchase will not be lost. As to what will constitute a reasonable time in such cases, will depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. It is evident that he was not allowed any such reasonable time in the present case, as the Sheriff levied the attachment and proceeded to collect the cattle on the thirtieth of November, being the next day after the bill of sale was executed. The instructions given by the Court overlook and disregard entirely these important provisions of the statute regulating the delivery, as well as the necessity of giving the parties a reasonable time to complete the delivery, of cattle, and are in direct conflict therewith. The Court therefore erred in giving these instructions.

The appellant contends that the "written descriptive bill of sale," mentioned in the last section above referred to, is intended as a substitute for a delivery by actual transfer of the possession and control of the stock. It is evident that such is not the meaning of the statute. The law was designed to establish a rule by which the marks and brands of stock should be evidence of ownership; and upon a sale, where the lives of the animals were intended to be preserved, the vendor was required to put his counterbrand on the animals sold; and thus, while they would carry with them the evidence of his former ownership by his mark and brand, they would at the same time show a transfer by his counterbrand; but where it was not convenient to thus counterbrand, he was required, as a substitute, to give a "written descriptive bill of sale," which would equally show what animals he had sold, and estop him from claiming title evidenced by his brand. The intention clearly is to prevent the vendor from subsequently claiming the cattle, because they carry his mark and brand, and not to dispense with the delivery required by the law to make the sale valid as against creditors and subsequent purchasers. It seems that at the time of executing the bill of sale, Wells delivered his branding irons to the plaintiff—and this is relied on as a circumstance showing a delivery. Such a fact has no effect upon this question of delivery. It was good as a delivery of the branding irons, if they were included in the sale, but not as a delivery of any other property.

The judgment and order refusing a new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

NORTON, J. concurring specially.—I think the rodeo laws do not require a branding by the purchaser on a sale, but only a counter-branding by the seller, or a descriptive bill of sale. In this case, the latter mode was adopted, though the description by simply stating the brand was doubtless insufficient.

The parties, however, began an actual delivery before the levy by the Sheriff, and there was evidence of an intention to complete such delivery. A reasonable time to do it was allowed, and when done it would relate to the first part of the act certainly, and perhaps to the time of executing the bill of sale.

I therefore concur in the order reversing the judgment, and remanding the case for a new trial.

MILLER et al. v. NEWTON et al.

THE effect of a marriage, at common law, is to deprive the wife of all separate legal existence, rendering herself incapable of binding herself by a contract. Courts of Equity, however, for many purposes, treat the husband and wife as distinct persons, capable of contracting with and suing each other, and of having separate estates, debts, and liabilities.

Where a married woman, having a separate estate, creates debts with the intention of making those debts payable out of and a charge on her separate estate, a Court of Equity will decree the debts a charge on that separate estate, and direct it to be sold under the rules of the Court, in such manner as may be equitable, and the proceeds to be applied in payment of the debts.

This liability of the separate property of a married woman, can only be enforced in a suit in equity, where all interested can be made parties, and a decree rendered directly against the property for the payment of the debt, and no personal judgment can be recovered against the wife.

In such actions, to make the debts of a married woman a charge on her separate estate, Courts of Equity are careful in guarding her against imposition, and in seeing that dealings with her, affecting her separate estate, are free from fraud, and reasonable in their terms, and that no unfair advantage has been taken of her.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Sonoma County.

The complaint in this case averred the partnership of plaintiffs, and its style, and that at divers and sundry times between the twenty-eighth of March, 1858, and the thirteenth of March, 1861, plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant America S. Newton (acting by the name of America S. Tate), at her request, divers goods, wares, and merchandise, food and raiment for the support of herself and family, and for the benefit and advantage of her separate estate, as described in said complaint. That the indebtedness due from her to plaintiffs for goods, etc., by her purchased of them, was a running account, extending through the period stated. It also alleged, that Mrs. Newton purchased said goods, etc., with the special promise and agreement on her part that she would be responsible and pay for the same out of her separate estate described, and that the price thereof should be a charge on said separate estate, and that she appointed her estate as security for the payment of her accruing indebtedness; and that plaintiffs, relying on her representations and promises, and upon the credit of such estate, sold and delivered to her the goods, etc., and that there was due thereon an amount thereof of $1,516.67.

2. The complaint also stated that the firm of Pauli & Co., also sold and delivered to Mrs. Newton, who purchased, in her name of America S. Tate, goods, wares, merchandise, food, raiment, and necessities for the support and maintenance of herself and family, upon her request, and upon the like representations above mentioned, and that she became indebted to such firm in the sum of seven hundred and ninety-six dollars and forty-two cents, and which demand such firm assigned for value to plaintiffs, before this action was commenced.

3. The complaint further stated, that on the ninth of January, 1859, America S. Tate intermarried with defendant Russell Newton; and that she and her husband lived together only three or four days, when they separated, and in a few days thereafter the said Russell left the country. That said Russell had no property then, but was insolvent, and so continued to be. That at no time has he exercised, or claimed the right to exercise any control or management of his wife's separate property, but, on the contrary, always denied and disclaimed all right or intention so to do, and disclaimed any interest in such property.

4. The complaint also stated, that at the time of and after said marriage, Mrs. Newton requested said firms respectively to keep her accounts as they had before then been kept, without change of name or responsibility, and assured them that she had sufficient property to pay them for what she had purchased and might purchase, and would pay them therefor out of her separate estate.

5. The complaint then contains a statement and description of Mrs. Newton's separate property, upon the credit of which she purchased the goods of plaintiffs, and of Pauli & Co., their assignors, and which she specified and appointed as a security for the payment of the debts which she had so contracted.

6. The plaintiffs then pray for a judgment and decree, charging the separate property of Mrs. Newton with and for the payment of the two demands above mentioned, and that such property may be applied to the payment of such demands, and also that a receiver may be appointed to take charge of such separate property, and dispose of it, or so much of it as shall be necessary to satisfy said demands.

George L. Wratten, Attorney, and John Currey, of Counsel, for Appellants.

It being impossible for Courts, proceeding upon the principles of the common law, to recognize a femme covert as capable of entering into contracts which could bind her, it became necessary, in order that she might be protected in her property, and that she might, to every needful extent, be enabled to enjoy it, to recognize her separate existence, and thus to invest her, as to her separate estate, with the power to subject it to her use and enjoyment; and to that end the doctrine of the civil law on the subject came to be incorporated into the jurisprudence of England, nearly or quite two centuries ago. (Story's Eq. Jur. 1, 2; 1 Spence's Eq. Jur. 595-598.)

By the civil law, the husband and wife were and still are considered as distinct persons, and may have separate estates, contracts, and debts. (1 Black. Com. 444; Fonb. Eq. B. 1, Ch. 2, Sec. 6; 2 Story's Eq. Secs. 1367, 1368, 1399-1401.) The extent to which a married woman, having a separate estate, might enter into contracts and incur liabilities that would bind her separate property, has been a fruitful theme of forensic and juridical discussion in the Courts of Chancery in America and England; but that she is competent to enter into valid and binding engagements for her personal benefit, and for the benefit of her separate estate, is a doctrine that may be regarded as firmly established. It is the law of Courts of Equity, that a femme covert, in respect to her separate property, is to be considered a femme sole. By the law applicable to the subject, we believe the propositions following herein to be well established, as well on principle as by authorities:

1st. The respondent, Mrs. Newton, was competent to make the contracts entered into after her marriage, as mentioned and set forth in the complaint in this action, and thereby she incurred liabilities binding on her; and her separate property may be charged in equity for the debts contracted by her, as alleged, both before and after her marriage with Russell Newton; and such separate property may, under the decree of the Court, be disposed of for the payment and satisfaction of the demands due from her to the appellants.

When the case of Yale v. Dederer was first in the New York Court of Appeals (18 N. Y. 274-276), Comstock, C. J., after noticing the earlier decisions of the English Courts of Chancery, as well as the cases of Murray v. Barlee and Owen v. Dickinson, said: "The principle, in short, which now governs in cases of this kind is, that a wife's separate estate is liable to pay her debts during coverture, in whatever form they are incurred, not because her contracts have any validity at law, nor by way of appointment or charge, but because equity decrees it to be just that they should be paid out of such estate." Again, "If the promise is on her own account, if she or her estate receive a benefit, equity will lay hold of those circumstances to respond to the engagement." (Id. 276.) And again, "Courts of Equity, proceeding in rem, will take hold of her estate, and appropriate it to the payment of her debts." Thus it appears that in order to subject the estate of a femme covert to the payment of debts, by her contracted for her own benefit or for that of such estate, it is not necessary to imply that she made any direct appropriation or appointment of it as a security for such payment, nor that such estate became charged, by reason of the contract, with a specific lien as security for the performance of her obligation.

A femme covert, having a separate estate, has power to contract debts that may bind her to the extent of her property; and when a Court of Equity undertakes to give effect to her obligations, by laying hold of the separate property as the means by which they are to be satisfied, as said by Lord Cottenham and reiterated by Chief Justice Comstock, the lien on such property is created by the decree of the Court.

2d. The corpus of the respondent's real estate, as well as the rents and profits of it, and as well as her personal property, may be subjected, and the avails thereof applied, under the decree of the Court, for the payment and satisfaction of her debts.

The Courts of Chancery of England, where the wife's separate estate was merely an equitable estate (the legal title to which was usually vested in trustees), limited the relief afforded to a creditor, against the separate estate of a married woman, to an application by her trustees of her personal property, and the rents and profits of her real estate.

The Constitution of the State of Texas, Art. 7, Sec. 19, is the same as our Constitution, Art. 11, Sec. 14, on the same subject. (Hartley's Dig. 78.)

In Womack v. Womack (8 Tex. 413), Hemphill, C. J. said: "That a married woman holds her property by as high, as full, and as perfect a title as does her husband his separate property, is a proposition not to be questioned." And at page 415, he decided that the wife had the right to pay her debt out of either the corpus or profits of her separate estate; that she might be sued for its recovery, and, on judgment, the decree would be that the execution be levied on her separate property; that the Court had the power to direct the proceeds to be first applied to the satisfaction of the debt; and, if they were insufficient, that then the amount due should be made out of the corpus of the property. And, in the leading and ably-considered case of Cartwright v. Hollis (5 Tex. 156), the same learned Judge, after declaring that the right of the wife to separate property was guaranteed by the Constitution (Id. 170), said: "In some cases, the question of whether the capital or rents and profits of the separate estate are liable to the charges, has been much discussed. When the wife has the entire interest in the estate, the corpus as well as the issue of the estate would no doubt be liable. In this case, the application is for payment out of the property, or out of the rents or profits. If the latter be sufficient, they should, doubtless, and properly, be first subjected to the charge; if not, the capital should be appropriated for that purpose."

Miller v. Newton.

In the case of Van Maren v. Johnson and Wife, 15 Cal. 308, this Court held, that the judgment obtained might be enforced against the separate property of the wife; by which we understand, that the separate property of the wife, whether real or personal, might be sold to satisfy the judgment.

William Ross, for Respondent.

The complaint is uncertain. No description of the goods, etc., is given. There is no allegation as to who composed the "family" of the respondent, whether they were adults or minors; nor whether they possessed means sufficient for their own support, or whether it was the duty of or proper for the respondent to furnish their support.

In the absence of a description of the goods, etc., sold, the Court cannot determine whether they were necessities, or whether they were for the benefit of the separate estate of the respondent; and, there being no averment of the character and situation of the family, it cannot be determined by the Court, whether the respondent has a family, or whether she was under any obligation whatever to support or furnish necessities for the parties for whom she purchased the goods. If it was not her duty to support the family, or if the articles furnished were not necessities, nor for the benefit of her separate property and estate, we think it is well settled that her separate real estate, at least, cannot be charged with debts thus incurred.

In Maynard v. Johnson (1 Hill. Ch. 228), it was held, that the Court would "inquire into the propriety of an express charge, and not allow the wife to charge her estate by her own mere act and will, without evidence that it was necessary, or at least proper."

A married woman cannot dispose of or change her separate estate, even by her consent in Court, unless in the mode prescribed by the instrument creating her separate property. (10 Ves. 585, 586.)

The expression of a particular mode of creating a lien on the separate property of the wife, denies and excludes any and all other modes of doing it. She can make no contract to bind her, except in the manner prescribed by law. (Selover v. Am. R. Com. Co., 7 Cal. 266; Barrett v. Tewksbury, 9 Id. 13; Pearce v. Barbiers, 10 Id. 436.)

In Jaques v. The M. E. Church (17 Johns.), so much relied on by the appellants' counsel throughout his entire argument, was the case of a femme covert acting under a deed of settlement, where the question was, whether Mrs. Jaques, "with respect to her separate estate, is not to be regarded in a Court of Equity as a femme sole, and may not dispose of her estate as she pleases, without regard to her trustee, there being nothing in the deed of settlement requiring the consent or concurrence of her trustee, nor any negation of an unlimited power of disposition of the estate by her."

We contend that the statute answers this proposition, by requiring not only that the disposition must be in writing, but must also be signed and acknowledged in the manner pointed out by the statute.

The first proposition made by the appellant may be divided: First, was the respondent competent to make the contract entered into with the appellants after marriage? and, second, can her separate property be charged in equity for the debts contracted by her before her marriage?

We contend, that by the Constitution, and the statute made in pursuance thereof (Wood's Dig. 488, Sec. 6), the respondent, during coverture, could not create any lien upon or incumber her separate property, unless by an instrument in writing, signed and acknowledged in the manner prescribed in the statute. If she is absolutely forbidden to create such lien directly by her own act, or by parol, she is restrained from creating such lien or incumbrance in any other manner than by an instrument in writing, with the concurrence of her husband.

This statute is not only intended to protect the wife from undue influence of her husband, but to guard her property from the attacks of any other person.

This statute is "a new chapter in the Statute of Frauds," and does not come under the reasoning of the Court in Murray v. Barlee (4 Simons, 82); but, even in the argument of Lord Brougham in that case, it is said, that as to her separate estate, the wife is to be considered as a femme sole, "unless restrained by positive and binding law to a particular mode of disposition." (3 Myl. & K. 223.) Can the Court create a lien upon the separate property, that by no possibility, either by mortgage, confession of judgment, or otherwise, could the wife herself have created?

In Ingoldsby v. Juan (12 Cal. 579), the Court sustained the validity of the Act of the seventeenth of April, 1850, and said "it was designed to fulfill the requirements of the Constitution, more clearly to define the rights of married women."

As to the second point contained in appellants' brief: Can the separate property of the respondent be charged, in equity, for debts contracted by her before her marriage? The appellants, by stating, in the complaint, that the respondent, after her marriage, promised to pay her debts contracted dum sola, seem to rely upon that subsequent promise to sustain the position assumed of her liability. If the complaint relied upon the previous promises, made at the time of the several purchases, the Statute of Limitations might have been pleaded in bar of the action on the account; for, in Richie, Osgood & Co. v. Davis (5 Cal. 453), this Court says: "When there have been various charges in a store account, and no reciprocal charges by the other party, each charge in the account becomes barred by the Statute of Limitations." The complaint is uncertain as to the promise relied upon; but, from the argument made by the appellants' counsel, we must conclude they stand upon the one entered into subsequent to the marriage. This promise is not binding. It is within the Statute of Frauds. (Fairbanks v. Dawson, 9 Cal. 89.)

We do not doubt but that, by an action of law, if not barred by the Statute of Limitations, the appellants might have recovered a judgment for the contract debts of the respondent incurred before marriage, according to her liability as fixed by statute, as determined in the case of Van Maren v. Johnson (15 Cal. 309), and have execution ordered against her separate property.

We deny the appellants' second proposition, that "the corpus of the respondent's real estate, as well as the rents and profits of it, as well as her personal property, may be subjected, and the avails thereof applied, under the decree of the Court, to the payment and satisfaction of her debts."

The case of Van Maren v. Johnson et al., so much depended on by appellants, is not in point; for that was an action at law, and depended upon the construction of the statute, which declares that the separate property of the wife shall be and continue liable for her debts contracted dum sola; and upon the question whether the common law was not in full vigor as to the further liability of the common property, acquired after marriage, for the payment of such debts — this latter proposition being by this Court decided in the affirmative.

The true doctrine is laid down by the Master of the Rolls, in Aylett v. Ashton (1 Myl. & Cr. 105-111), in this language: "Although a femme covert has power, and the Court has jurisdiction, over the rents and profits of her separate property, no case has given effect to her contracts against the corpus of her separate estate." The cases are not limited to her "general engagements."

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring — COPE, C. J. dissenting.

This is an action to recover, from the separate estate of a married woman, debts contracted by her, both before and since her marriage. The husband was made a party with the wife, but he was defaulted. The wife appeared and demurred to the complaint, on the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and for uncertainty. The Court sustained the demurrer, and rendered judgment against the plaintiffs, from which they appeal.

The complaint avers that Mrs. Newton purchased goods of the plaintiffs and their assignors, at various times from March 28th, 1858, to March 13th, 1861, for the support of her family and for the benefit and advantage of her separate estate, forming a running account during that period. That on the ninth day of January, 1859, she intermarried with her present husband, but they lived together only for a few days when they separated, and he soon left the country; that these purchases were made with the special promise and agreement on her part that she would pay for the same out of her separate estate, and that they relied upon these promises and upon the credit of her separate estate in selling the goods; that at the time of and after her marriage she requested them to keep her accounts the same as they had been kept before, without change of name or responsibility, and promised to pay them therefor out of her separate estate, which is described in the complaint. The complaint prays for a judgment for the amount due, and that the separate property of the wife may be applied to the payment of the demands sued for, and that for that purpose a receiver might be appointed to take charge and dispose of the separate estate.

At common law, the effect of a marriage was to deprive the wife of all separate legal existence, her husband and herself being deemed at law but one person. One result of this principle was, that at law she was incapable of binding herself by a contract. But the hardship of the rule was found so great that exceptions were made to it even at law. Thus, if the husband became civilitur mortuus, or even transported for a term of years, or had been abroad and unheard of for seven years, or even had left the State without the intention of returning, it was held that she could contract in her own name and was liable to be sued alone thereon. (1 Chitty's Pl. 28, 57, and notes.) Still, with all the modifications of the rule, the Common Law Courts continued to maintain it to a most rigorous extent.

But Courts of Equity have laid down rules upon this question more in accordance with the spirit of modern civilization and the principles of justice. In doing so, they have followed, to a great extent, the more liberal doctrines of the civil law. In determining the question raised in this case, we must look to the rules laid down by Courts of Equity as our guide. They, for many purposes, treat the husband and wife as distinct persons, even capable of contracting with and suing each other, and of having separate estates, debts, and liabilities. The wife is held capable of taking, holding, and disposing of real and personal property to her own separate and exclusive use. Although her property is often, by the instruments conveying it, vested in trustees to manage for her use, yet this is not essential, and Courts of Equity will always protect her interest in property against the marital rights and claims of the husband, even though there be no trustee. And, if necessary, the husband will be held to be her trustee, and her rights enforced against him as though he were a stranger. And it can make no difference how her separate estate was derived, whether before or after marriage. (2 Story's Eq. Secs. 1368, 1378, 1380.) To a very great extent, equity considers a married woman, so far as relates to her separate property, the same as though she was not married. (2 Story's Eq. Sec. 1397.)

In accordance with these principles, her separate estate will, in equity, be held liable for all the debts, charges, incumbrances, and other engagements which she expressly or by implication charges thereon. Her agreement to that effect is not considered as an obligatory contract, but rather as an apportionment out of her separate estate. (2 Story's Eq. Sec. 1399.) Her direct expression of an intention to charge her separate estate with the debt is deemed sufficient to create such a charge; and the mere fact that the debt has been contracted by her during the coverture, for herself or even for her husband, or for the joint benefit of both, will generally be held as prima facie evidence sufficient to charge her separate estate, without any proof of a positive agreement so to do. The simple point to ascertain is, whether it was her intention to make her separate estate liable for the debt; and that intention may be ascertained either from her direct agreement to that effect, or from the circumstances of the case, by which it may be fairly inferred that such was her intention. (2 Story's Eq. Sec. 1400; Peacock v. Monk, 2 Ves. Sr. 190; Hulme v. Tenant, 1 Brown, 17; Owen v. Dickenson, 1 Craig & Phillips, 48; Murray v. Barlee, 3 Mylne & Kune, 208, 223; Jaques v. Methodist Episcopal Church, 17 J. R. 577; Gardner v. Gardner, 22 Wend. 526.)

In the case of Murray v. Barlee, the Chancellor says: "In all these cases I take the foundation of the doctrine to be this: the wife has a separate estate subject to her own control, and exempt from all other interference or authority. If she cannot affect it no one can, and the very object of the settlement which vests it in her exclusively is to enable her to deal with it as if she were discoverer. The power to affect it being unquestionable, the only doubt that can arise is whether or not she has validly incumbered it. At first, the Court seems to have supposed that nothing could touch it but some real charge, as a mortgage or an instrument amounting to an execution of a power, where that view was supported by the nature of the settlement. But afterward her intention was more regarded, and the Court only required to be satisfied that she intended to deal with her separate property. When she appeared to have done so, the Court held her to have charged it, and made the trustees answer the demand thus created against it." The Chancellor, Lord Brougham, then proceeds to examine the question, whether this intention must be expressed in writing, saying: "If, in respect to her separate estate, the wife is, in equity, taken as a femme sole, and can charge it by instruments absolutely void at law, can there be any reason for holding that her liability, or more properly, her power of affecting the separate estate, shall only be exercised by a written instrument? Are we entitled to invent a rule, to add a new chapter to the Statute of Frauds, and to require writing when that act requires none? Is there any equity reaching written dealings with the property which extends not also to dealings in other ways, as by sale and delivery of goods? Shall necessary supplies for her maintenance not touch the estate, and yet money furnished to squander away at play be a charge on it, if fortified by a scrap of writing? No such distinction can be taken upon any conceivable principle."

But it must be borne in mind that while a Court of Equity is thus liberal in sustaining the power of a married woman over her separate estate, yet they are equally careful in guarding her against imposition, and therefore all dealings with her affecting her separate estate must be free from fraud, reasonable in their terms, and it must appear that no unfair advantage has been taken of her. (Jaques v. M. E. Church, 17 Johns. 579; Evans v. Llewellyn, 2 Brown's C. C. 150.)

Applying these principles to the present case, we find that the complaint avers that she purchased the goods for the support of herself and family, and for the benefit and advantage of her separate estate, and that she directly and expressly agreed that she would pay for the same out of her separate estate, and that the amount should be a charge on her separate estate. These facts bring the case clearly within the established rules of equity upon this subject, and her separate estate is liable in equity for the payment of the plaintiff's demand.

The mere fact that this agreement is not in writing, can make no difference, as there is no statute or rule of law which requires that an agreement of this character, which is enforceable only in a Court of Equity, should be in writing.

The respondent refers to the cases of Selover v. The American Russian Com. Co. (7 Cal. 266), Barrett v. Tewksbury (9 Id. 13), and other decisions of this Court, founded upon the statute relating to conveyances of property by a married woman. Those cases relate to the power of a married woman to execute instruments conveying or incumbering her separate property, and the mode in which such conveyance or incumbrance must be executed and acknowledged to be binding upon her, and they therefore differ entirely from the case now before us, in which no such question is directly involved. The statutes upon this subject, and upon which those decisions were founded, do not in any way abrogate or impair the powers of a Court of Equity, over the rights and property of married women, or the long-established rules of those Courts upon this subject, upon which this case depends. While these statutes confer upon married women a power to dispose of their property, which they did not before possess, yet there is no expression of any legislative intention to thereby divest Courts of Equity of their long established powers and jurisdiction. To effect such an object would require a clear expression of legislative will.

These statutes are a substitute for the ancient common law proceeding by fine and recovery, which was the only mode by which, at common law, a married woman could convey her real estate. (2 Kent's Com. 139.) Those proceedings were tedious and expensive, and the statutory mode is simple and equally effectual. The jurisdiction of Courts of Equity over the property of married women existed when a fine and recovery were the only modes of conveying their real property at common law; and they equally exist, notwithstanding this change in the mode of conveyance. In a Court of Equity the separate property of the wife can be disposed of under a judgment of a competent Court, for the payment of her just debts; and under the proceedings her rights and interests will be fully and carefully guarded and protected better than by the ancient common law mode, or that prescribed by the statute. By the statute, the husband is constituted her protector, by requiring him to join with her in executing the conveyance. Under the rules of equity, the Court acts as the guardian of her rights. The statute was designed to enable her to deal directly with her property, without being compelled to resort to a Court, either of common law or equity; and it cannot be held, by any reasonable implication, to have deprived Courts of Equity of their jurisdiction over cases where the statute might be ineffectual, or where they had long exercised authority.

The present case is an example of the necessity of maintaining the powers of the Court over this subject intact. The husband of the defendant, it seems, left the State or deserted her soon after their marriage; and thus she is powerless, even if willing, to execute a conveyance of or incumbrance upon her property in the mode required by the statute. With abundance of property, she cannot directly dispose of it, even to purchase the necessities of life; and unless a Court of Equity has the power to afford relief, she may suffer from want in the midst of abundance. The cause of action in this case, is founded in part upon supplies and necessities furnished her before her marriage, and the rest since. For those furnished before marriage, her separate property is clearly liable, under Sec. 13 of the statute defining the rights of husband and wife, which is as follows: "The separate property of the husband shall not be liable for the debts of the wife contracted before the marriage, but the separate property of the wife shall be and continue liable for all such debts." This liability of the separate property can only be enforced in a suit in equity, where all interested can be made parties, the separate property ascertained, and a decree rendered directly against the property for the payment of the debt. The right of action in this case, so far as relates to that portion of the demand which accrued before the marriage, against the separate property of the wife, is clear and undoubted under the statute.

As to that part of the demand which accrued since the marriage, we have examined the rules of equity which relate to such liabilities, and it is the duty of the Court, and it has the power, to adjudicate the matter in accordance with those principles; and if the claim of the plaintiff is found to be of such a character as to entitle him to a remedy for relief against the separate property of the wife, such relief should be granted him. The fact that the wife now, after having obtained the necessities and supplies, and appropriated them to her own use, under a promise that her separate property should be held liable therefor, refused to aid in making that property liable, can make no difference. Fraud on the part of a married woman is as odious as when perpetrated by any other person. If the plaintiff and his assignors acted in good faith, relying on her promise in furnishing the goods, they are entitled to relief against her property, although they are not entitled to a personal judgment against her. It follows that the Court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is reversed, and the defendant is directed to answer the complaint within ten days after service of notice of the filing of the remittitur in the Court below.

COPE, J. delivered the following dissenting opinion:

I am of opinion that no charge can be created upon the separate property of a married woman, except in the mode pointed out by the statute. The statute (Wood's Dig. 488) provides, that "The husband shall have the management and control of the separate property of the wife, during the continuance of the marriage; but no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon an examination separate and apart from her husband." Of what avail are these prohibitory provisions, if the wife, by simply contracting a debt to be paid out of her separate estate, can create a valid and binding charge upon that estate? I regard the statute as furnishing the only rule to be observed in such cases. The Legislature may not have acted wisely in adopting it, but so long as it stands, the Courts are bound by it, and have no power to set up a rule of their own in its place. The general equity rule, which allows a married woman to incumber her estate by a mere verbal agreement, is certainly in conflict with the statutory rule, which requires a writing. The object of the statute was to protect the wife, not only as against the husband, but as against her own improvident acts, and persons dealing with her must see that the forms necessary to give validity to her contracts are complied with. The statute is as obligatory in equity as at law, and the fact that in some cases its operation may be attended with hardship, is no reason for disregarding it. It is universally agreed that the rule in equity is founded upon the jus disponendi of the wife, and where the estate comes to her hands with conditions attached as to the manner of its alienation, equity will not interfere unless the conditions have been performed. In this case the estate was held by the wife, subject to the conditions imposed by the statute, and as these conditions were not complied with, I see no way in which the estate can be reached. The question is an important one, and as I differ with my associates upon it, I have felt it my duty to state the grounds of my opinion.

Fogarty v. Sawyer.

FOGARTY v. SAWYER.

UNDER the Act of 1850 (Stat. 1850, 114) relating to Notaries Public, the acknowledgment of a Notary taken under his private seal, was valid if it was stated in the acknowledgment that the Notary had not obtained a public seal.

A mortgage on real estate containing also a power of sale, if recorded in the Recorder's office of the county, in the proper book of record of mortgages, imparts constructive notice of its contents, both as a mortgage and a power of attorney, and it is unnecessary to record it in the book of record of powers of attorney.

Where a mortgage contains also a power of sale, and names the mortgagee as the attorney in fact to make the sale, the sale is not invalidated from the fact that the attorney employs the services of an auctioneer to make the sale for him.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts of this case which are not stated in the opinion of the Court, will be found in the former report of the same case (17 Cal. 589). The defendant recovered judgment and the plaintiff appealed.

E. A. Lawrence, for Appellant.

The first objection of appellant was, that the power of attorney under which Zimmerman acted, had not been proved. The Court will notice that the originals were not produced. (Prac. Act, Sec. 447.) The power is embraced in a mortgage from Markwart to Zimmerman, of which only a certified copy was introduced from the records. This instrument purports to have been acknowledged before James Van Ness, a Notary Public, under his private seal. This, we claim, did not entitle the instrument to be recorded.

The Act of 1850 concerning Notaries (Laws of 1850, 114, Sec. 89), requires the Notary to have an official seal; but until he can procure one, to use his private seal. About six weeks later the act concerning conveyances was passed. Sec. 5 says: "Such certificate (of acknowledgment) shall be, when granted by an officer who has a seal of office, under the hand and official seal of such officer."

Fogarty v. Sawyer.

"SEC. 18. A certificate of the acknowledgment of any conveyance, signed by the officer taking the same and under the seal of the officer, shall entitle such conveyance to be recorded."

This last act requires acknowledgments to be verified by an official seal, where the law has provided the officer with an official seal, and does not authorize a Notary to use his private seal, but negatives that right, at least as to acknowledgments. The six weeks intervening between the passage of the two acts may have been deemed sufficient by the Legislature to permit Notaries to procure seals. At any rate, that act as well as this Court, in the case of Hastings v. Vaughn (5 Cal. 318), require the official seal. (Hinckley v. O'Farrell, 4 Blackf. 185.) Every Notary is presumed in all counties to have a notarial seal. An acknowledgment of a Notary not attested by a seal, is invalid. (Booth v. Cook, 20 Ill. 129.)

Thus the mortgage being improperly admitted to record, the certified copy proved nothing, and the record conveyed no notice.

The power of attorney was not recorded as a power of attorney, but simply as a mortgage. The power to convey the land at public sale, is not a part of the mortgage, but a separate and independent instrument. (Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589; Alsop v. Carpenter, 21 Id.) Thus, according to our Registry Act, it must be recorded as a power of attorney, in order to impart notice. (Wood's Dig. 103, Secs. 27, 28, 36, 24; Id. 607, Secs. 12-14.) Record of it as a mortgage is not notice. (Dey v. Dunham, 2 J. C. 188; same case on appeal, 15 J. R. 155; James v. Morey, 2 Cowen, 246.) Thereby filing it for record is not enough. It must be recorded, and when recorded the record has relation back to the time of filing the deed for record. (Wood's Dig. Art. 362, Sec. 25; Id. Art. 361, 363; Jarvis v. Aikin, 25 Vt., 2 Deane, 635.)

"Filing for record, and recording, are distinct acts, and the former is not equivalent to the latter under the statute." (Scott v. Doe, 1 Hemp. 275.) Hence, registry of a mortgage for $3,000 as a mortgage for three hundred dollars, was held valid against a subsequent bona fide purchaser for only three hundred dollars. (Buckman v. Frost, 18 Johns. 544.) So a record of mortgage, Fogarty v. Sawyer.

without recording signature of mortgagor, which was recorded afterward, held to be notice only from time of recording signature. (Shephard v. Burkhalter, 13 Geo. 443.) So, where the record misdescribed the name of the grantor (as McRinnie for McKennie), it is not sufficient to prove a compliance with the Registration Act. (Jones v. Parks, 22 Ala. 446.) So, recording a deed with defeasance back, as a deed instead of as a mortgage, above cited. (Dey v. Dunham, 2 J. C. 188; same case on appeal, 15 J. R. 155; James v. Morey, 2 Cowen, 246; Chamberlain v. Bell, 7 Cal. 292.)

G. F. & W. H. Sharp, for Respondent.

The mortgage was properly admitted to record. The sufficiency of the acknowledgment is apparent from the appellant's own brief. The Notary Public Act was passed March 27th, 1850, and the Conveyancing Act April 16th, 1850. Not six weeks intervening, as stated by appellant. Sec. 8 of the Notary Public Act allows the officer to use a private seal until an official seal can be procured. It does not appear when the officer was appointed a Notary; non constat, it was the day before he took the acknowledgment.

The mortgage was not required to be recorded as a power of attorney. At Common Law, a power to convey land was not required to be recorded at all. Our statute does not require it. It simply requires conveyances to be recorded to operate as notice to third persons coming in relation with the title.

"SEC. 24. Powers of attorney are not defined as conveyances to be recorded, but are expressly excluded by the statute itself."

"SEC. 36. An estate in the land is not created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, by force of a power of attorney itself. It is only the means as a power by which the same can be done."

If the recording of the mortgage as a power of attorney, was essential, it was done. Sec. 25 of the Conveyancing Act declares, that by the filing with the Recorder for record, notice is imparted to subsequent purchasers. By filing the instrument for record the mortgagee did all the law required of him. He had no power to transcribe the same in any book. If the appellant has been injured his remedy is against the Recorder. The cases cited by the appellant are upon a statute different from ours; hence, wholly inapplicable.

CORRE, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. and CROCKER, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover a fifty-vara lot, in the City of San Francisco. The parties deraign title from the same source—the plaintiff under a conveyance executed in June, 1854, and the defendant under a sale made in October, 1852, in pursuance of a power contained in a mortgage. The validity of this power, and its effect as authority for the sale, were determined on a former appeal. (17 Cal. 589.) The same questions are again presented, but we regard the former decision as conclusive. In addition to these, however, various questions are raised by the appellant, relating principally to the registration of the mortgage and certain alleged irregularities in the sale.

Instead of the original mortgage, the defendant read, in evidence, a certified copy from the records of the county, and it is objected that the certificate of acknowledgment was not sufficient to admit the mortgage to record. The point of the objection is, that it was given by a Notary Public under his private seal. It states, however, that the Notary had not obtained an official seal, and the statute then in force provided that, in such cases, a private seal might be used. (Stat. 1850, 114.) The objection is, therefore, covered by the statute, the effect of which was to give to the private seal of the Notary, when properly used in the business of his office, the force of an official seal. The point that the record of the mortgage was insufficient as a record of the power of sale, is not well taken. It is based upon the twelfth and thirteenth sections of the Act concerning County Recorders. The twelfth section provides, that it shall be the duty of the Recorders, upon the payment of their fees for the same, to record certain instruments, specifying in several subdivisions the instruments to be recorded. The first subdivision includes deeds, mortgages, powers of attorney to convey real estate, and leases. The thirteenth section provides, that “the several classes of instruments, mentioned in the several subdivisions of the preceding section, shall be recorded in separate books." It is claimed that mortgages and powers of attorney belong to separate and distinct classes; and that a mortgage containing a power of sale must be recorded not only as a mortgage, but as a power of attorney. This, we think, is not the proper construction of the statute. We regard the classes as indicated by the subdivisions, each subdivision constituting a class. Of course, the instruments named in a particular subdivision may be recorded in separate books; but a separate record is not essential, either as notice or for purposes of evidence. It is admitted that the instrument in this case, considered as a mortgage, was recorded in the proper book; and, so far as the question of notice is concerned, the record was undoubtedly notice of what the instrument contained. Whether the record of a deed, executed in pursuance of an unrecorded power, will impart notice, it is not material to decide.

In respect to the sale, it is objected that there was no publication of notice, and that it was not conducted by the attorney named in the power. There is nothing in either of these objections. By the terms of the instrument, no publication was required; but if one were necessary, the evidence shows that it was made. The proof is not very definite; but considering the time that has elapsed, we regard it as sufficient. The sale was made under the direction of the mortgagee, who was the person empowered to make it. The fact that he employed the services of an auctioneer is no ground for saying that the sale was not conducted by himself. It appears that he was absent when the sale was made, but this alone is not sufficient to defeat the title.

Some additional points are taken, but we regard them as untenable.

The judgment is affirmed.

Patterson v. Keystone Mining Co.

PATTERSON v. KEYSTONE MINING COMPANY.

A NOVA FIDES parol sale of a mining claim, accompanied by a delivery of possession, is valid as against a subsequent sale of the same grantor, made by deed in writing duly acknowledged.

The possession of one claiming under a parol sale, or unrecorded bill of sale, in order to impart notice to a subsequent purchaser, need not be evidenced by an actual inclosure or anything equivalent thereto.

The case of Atwood v. Priot (17 Cal. 37) and English v. Johnson (Id. 107), as to possession of mining claims, affirmed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixteenth Judicial District, Calaveras County.

One Callahan with nineteen others, in August, 1861, located a copper-bearing ledge in Calaveras County, three thousand feet in length. The interest of Callahan in the claim was one-twentieth, and he paid assessments on his interest in August and September, 1860. One Blatchey was also a member of the company. In November, 1860, five of the original locators were incorporated, for the purpose of working the ledge, under the name of the "Keystone Company." Certificates of stock were issued by the corporation to the different claimants. Blatchey claimed the interest of Callahan by an alleged parol sale, made in October, 1860, and the corporation recognized and treated Blatchey as the owner. The corporation had been working the claim from the time of its formation up to the commencement of this suit. In June, 1861, Callahan, who had not attempted to exercise any control over the claim after October, 1860, executed to plaintiff, Patterson, a deed duly acknowledged, of an undivided one-twentieth of the claim. Patterson demanded of the corporation possession of the interest, was refused, and July 20th, 1861, commenced this action to recover possession. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the District Court, and defendants appealed.

William S. Wood, for Appellants.

H. O. Beatty, for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to recover the possession of the undivided one-twentieth of a mining claim. The plaintiff claimed title under a deed executed by one Callahan, one of the original locators of the claim, dated June 3d, 1861. The defendants claim title under Callahan, by virtue of an alleged sale by parol and delivery of possession, prior to the date of the plaintiff's deed. The Court instructed the jury "That the possession of the defendants under an unrecorded deed or bill of sale from Callahan, in order to constitute notice of this claim to the plaintiff so as to invalidate or defeat his title, must have been a possessio pedis, actual bona fide possession, consistent with defendants' title, and that this possession must be evidenced by an actual inclosure or something equivalent, as showing the extent and the fact of the defendants' dominion and control of the premises." The appellants assign this instruction as error. The rule of law defining what will constitute possession of a mining claim was fully and clearly laid down by this Court in the cases of Atwood v. Fricot (17 Cal. 37) and English v. Johnson (Id. 107). The instruction given in this case, clearly conflicts with the rule laid down in those cases. The validity of parol sales of mining claims has been fully established by this Court in the cases of: (Jackson v. The Feather River Co., 14 Cal. 22; Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 20 Id. 198; Gatewood v. McLaughlin, 23 Id. 178.)

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

People v. Bailey.

THE PEOPLE v. BAILEY.

Does an indictment for the crime of embezzlement, which contains two counts, and charges the defendant in the first count with having embezzled the sum of three hundred and sixty dollars and fifty cents on the nineteenth day of November, 1861, and in the second count with having embezzled the sum of six hundred and thirty-two dollars and twenty-five cents on the first day of January, 1862, charge two distinct offenses? Quere?

Is the two hundred and forty-first section of the Criminal Practice Act, defining the crime of embezzlement, to be extended to cases where the clerk or servant receives money or property from third persons, for his master or employer, or is it confined to cases where the clerk or servant receives the money or property directly from the hands of his master or employer? Quere?

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

F. M. Pixley, Attorney-General, for Appellant.

B. H. Lloyd, for Respondent.

The indictment charges the defendant with: 1st, embezzling three hundred and sixty dollars and fifty cents on the nineteenth of November, 1861; and, 2d, embezzling six hundred and thirty-two dollars and twenty-five cents on the first of January, 1862. It is admitted (as it appears on the face of the indictment), that these are two separate and distinct sums, and it was not intended to charge the same offense in different.

Sec. 241 of the Criminal Practice Act (Wood's Dig. 288, Art. 1537) reads: "The indictment shall charge but one offense, but it may set forth that offense in different forms and different counts." By Sec. 289, Wood's Digest, 292, Art. 1574, Sub. 3, the fact that more than one offense is charged in the indictment is made a ground of demurrer.

The indictment in this case is drawn after the English form. (See Arch. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 1st Ed. 446.) The English Statute (7 and 8 Geo. 4, Ch. 29, Sec. 48) provides, speaking of embezzlements: "For preventing the difficulties that have been experienced in the prosecution of the last-mentioned offenses, it shall be lawful to charge in the indictment, and proceed against the offender for any number of distinct acts of embezzlement, not exceeding three, which may have been committed by him against the same master within the space of six calendar months from the first to the last of such act." (See Russell on Crimes, 7th Am. Ed. 167.)

It will thus be seen that our statute expressly prohibits what the English statute expressly allows. By their's the indictment is good; by ours, bad.

The indictment in this case was found under Sec. 70, Criminal Practice Act (Wood's Dig. 339, Art. 1930, Sec. 70): "If any clerk, apprentice, or servant, or other person, whether bond or hired, to whom any money, or goods, or chattels, or property, shall be intrusted by his master or employer, shall withdraw himself from his master or employer, and go away with the said money, goods, chattels, or property, or any part thereof, with the intent to steal the same and defraud his master or employer thereof, contrary to the trust or confidence in him reposed by his said master or employer; or, being in the service of his said master as employer, shall embezzle the said moneys, goods, chattels, or property, or any part thereof, or otherwise shall convert the same to his own use with like purpose to steal the same, every such person so offending shall be punished," etc.

The language of this section is peculiar, and on examination will be found to materially differ from the English and American statutes on the same subject.

The Massachusetts statute on the subject is as follows: "If any officer, agent, clerk, or servant of any incorporated company, or if any clerk, agent, or servant of any private person or of any co-partnership, except apprentices and other persons under the age of sixteen years, shall embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, or shall take or secrete with the intent to embezzle or fraudulently convert to his own use, without consent of his employer or master, any money or property of another which shall have come to his possession, or shall be under his care by virtue of his employment, he shall be deemed," etc.

The English statute and the statute of the other States are similar to this, the language being nearly the same in every one of them, excepting one. They will be found collated in a note to 3 Arch. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 446, 2, to 447, 2.

If the clerk converted money which came into his possession by virtue of his employment, he was guilty of embezzlement; it mattered not from whom he received it; the only question was, did it come into his possession by virtue of his employment? if so, the conversion of it was embezzlement; and there are numberless decisions that an indictment charging the defendant with converting money which came into his possession by virtue of his employment was good. But all these, on examination, will be found to have been decided under the statute containing the provision above referred to.

Our statute does not say that the conversion by a clerk of money received by virtue of his employment is embezzlement. It specifies how he shall receive it, and from whom. It must be intrusted to him by his master, and so the indictment must allege. The averment in this case shows the money was not intrusted to defendant by his master, but by another.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORRIS, J. concurring specially.

The indictment in this case charges the defendant with the crime of embezzlement: 1st, in embezzling the sum of three hundred and sixty dollars and fifty cents on the nineteenth day of November, 1861; 2d, in embezzling the sum of six hundred and thirty-two dollars and twenty-five cents on the first day of January, 1862. The defendant demurred to the indictment on several grounds; the Court sustained the demurrer and the plaintiff appeals.

One ground of the demurrer was, that the indictment charges two distinct offenses. Sec. 241 of the Criminal Practice Act provides as follows: "The indictment shall charge but one offense, but it may set forth that offense in different forms under different counts." Whether the indictment intended to state but one act of embezzlement, under different counts, varying the amount and time, or whether it intended to set forth two separate and distinct acts of embezzlement, does not appear. If the former be the case, then a demurrer would not lie. If the latter, then the prosecuting attorney should be required at the trial to elect upon which charge he will proceed, and he will then be confined to that.

Another ground of demurrer is, that the indictment does not charge any public offense. Sec. 70 of the act respecting crimes and punishments provides that, "if any clerk, apprentice, or servant, or other person, whether bound or hired, to whom any money, or goods, or chattels, or property shall be intrusted by his master or employer, shall withdraw himself from his master or employer," etc., shall be punished in the manner prescribed by law for feloniously stealing property. The indictment charges that the defendant was employed by the proprietors of a daily newspaper, as their clerk and servant; and in the course of his duties as such and by virtue of said employment, he collected the moneys due his employers; and on the day named he received and took into his possession a certain sum of money, for and on their account, which he fraudulently and feloniously embezzled and converted to his own use, with the intent to steal the same. Upon examination, it will be found that our statute differs in a very important particular from the statutes of other States defining the crime of embezzlement. In other States it is generally extended to include all embezzlements or fraudulent conversions of money or property which shall have come to the possession of the servant "by virtue of his employment." But the statute of this State confines it to money or property intrusted by his master or employer to the servant, evidently intended to confine it to cases where the employé received the money directly from the employer. The indictment in this case follows a form founded upon the statutes of other States, and would doubtless be good under them. It is clear that it does not state an offense within the provisions of the statutes of this State, and the Court therefore committed no error in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

NORTON, J.—I think money received by a clerk who is intrusted by his employer with bills to collect, in the ordinary course of his business as a clerk, is money intrusted to him by his employer, and that our statute is in substance the same as other States upon this subject. But I also think that two offenses were charged in this indictment, and that for this reason the demurrer was properly sustained.

I therefore concur in the judgment of affirmance.

HODGKINS et al. v. HOOK et al.

Is an action brought by a vendee of personal property against a Sheriff, to recover possession of the same, where the Sheriff claims the property under an execution in favor of a creditor of the vendor, and attacks the sale for fraud. If the testimony is conflicting as to whether there was an actual and continued change of possession in the plaintiff after the sale to him, this question should be submitted to the jury. If, however, the facts are undisputed, it is a question of law, whether these facts constitute a continued and exclusive possession in the vendee.

Where, after a sale of personal property, the creditors of the vendor attack the same for fraud, and, on the trial, there is evidence that the vendee, after the sale and delivery, exercised some slight acts of ownership and control over the property, but this is not shown to have been done with the knowledge or consent of the vendor, the fact that the vendor does not offer any evidence explanatory of the vendee's acts, does not add anything to the weight of the evidence touching the vendee's connection with the property.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, San Joaquin County.

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the District Court, and the defendants appealed. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. O. Beatty, for Appellants.

The change of possession required by the statute must not only be continued, but exclusive. This Court, in the case of Vance v. Boynton (8 Cal. 562), quote approvingly from Chitty on Contracts the following language (opinion of BURNETT, J., 8 Cal. 562): "It seems that the change of possession, necessary to rebut the inference of an intention to defraud creditors, must be substantial, bona fide, and exclusive; and, consequently, that the sale or assignment will be considered fraudulent and void, and the assignor's possession colorable, if the goods be left upon the premises of the assignor and in his apparent disposal or order, although the vendee or his servant enter upon the premises, and also be in possession of the goods."

Now, admitting this delivery was sufficient (and on that point we raise no question), that the change of possession was substantial and bona fide, it cannot be pretended it was exclusive. If the possession was not exclusively in Hodgkins; or, rather, if it was not wholly and completely out of Lyons, then this sale was void under Sec. 15 of the Statute of Frauds, which is as follows: "Every sale made by a vendor of goods and chattels in his possession or under his control, and every assignment of goods and chattels, unless the same be accompanied by an immediate delivery, and be followed by an actual and continued change of possession of things sold or assigned, shall be conclusive evidence of fraud as against the creditors of the vendor, or the creditors of the person making such assignment, or subsequent purchasers in good faith." (Wood's Dig. 1858, 107, Art. 403.) See the case of Vance v. Boynton (8 Cal. 554-562), and the other California cases cited in that opinion, as to the proper construction of this section, especially as to exclusive possession of vendee.

But, even if the change was continuous, is there not a fatal objection to this verdict? Sec. 11 of the Statute of Frauds reads: "All deeds of gift, all conveyances, and all transfers or assignments, verbal or written, of goods, chattels, or things in action, made in trust for the use of the person making the same, shall be void as against the creditors, existing or subsequent, of such person." (Wood's Dig. 1858, 106, Art. 399.)

Hall & Scaniker, for Respondent.

A complete answer to appellants' position is found in the fact, that the jury passed upon the question of the delivery and continued change of possession; and this, too, it is to be presumed, under correct instructions upon their legal force and effect, if true, from the Court.

It was for the jury to determine what acts of control or ownership were exercised by Lyons, and whether with or without the knowledge, authority, or consent of the plaintiff. "What are the circumstances, is a question of fact for the jury." (Vance v. Beynnton, 8 Cal. 561.)

Hodgkins v. Hook.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — COPE, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action against the Sheriff of San Joaquin County and others, to recover the possession of a number of cattle, horses, and other personal property, claimed by the plaintiff under a bill of sale executed to him by one Lyons, bearing date August 1st, 1861. The defendants justified the taking under a writ of attachment issued in favor of one Golding against said Lyons, and the question involved was the validity of the sale to the plaintiff. It seems that Lyons, in the summer of 1861, was the owner of a large ranch on the San Joaquin River, with about one thousand head of cattle, one hundred and fifty horses, a quantity of lumber, and other personal property, all of which he sold to one Johnson about July 1st, 1861. On the first of August, Lyons, Johnson, and the plaintiff made an arrangement by which the plaintiff paid Johnson $6,000, and thereupon Johnson reconveyed all the property back to Lyons, and the latter thereupon conveyed the real estate to the plaintiff, for the consideration, as expressed in the deed, of $2,000; and also executed to him a bill of sale of all the personal property for the consideration therein stated of $4,000. The cattle and horses were pasturing on the ranch and the adjoining lands. The property was delivered to the plaintiff at the time of the sale; at least, no question is raised upon that point; but it is contended that the plaintiff did not retain the actual, continued, and exclusive possession of the property, but that Lyons exercised, to some extent, acts of ownership over it. It does not appear that either just before or at the time of the sale to the plaintiff, Lyons was residing upon the ranch, but it seems to have been occupied by one Congrado, a vaquero, who had charge of the stock. At the time of the sale, the plaintiff hired the same person to continue on the premises and take charge of the stock, which he did. Lyons did not reside on the premises after the sale, nor was he about there, except occasionally.

Hodgkins v. Hook.

The attachment of Golding was not levied on the property until May 21st, 1862. During the intermediate time there was some evidence, very slight in its character, that Lyons exercised acts of ownership over the property, by giving some directions to Congrado, and other acts; but it does not appear that this was done with the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. We do not think the evidence on this point is sufficient to justify us in disturbing the verdict of the jury.

The evidence was of such a character as made it proper to submit to the jury the question, whether or not there was an actual and continued change of possession in the plaintiff after the sale to him. When the facts are undisputed, it is a question of law whether these facts constitute a continued and exclusive possession in the vendee. In this case, many of the suspicious circumstances are explained, and others have very little weight in the absence of proof of knowledge or consent on the part of the vendee. Some of the facts are similar to those in the case of Montgomery v. Hunt (5 Cal. 366), in which the sale was upheld by this Court.

It is also objected that the sale was void under the eleventh section of the Statute of Frauds. But there is no evidence that the sale to the plaintiff was made in trust for the use of Lyons. There was no proof of any private understanding between the parties to bring the case within the rule laid down in Chenery v. Palmer (6 Cal. 122). It is also urged, that the Court erred in refusing the following instruction asked by the defendant: "If the jury believe, from the evidence, that Lyons drove off and sold some of the cattle, and exercised other acts of ownership and control over the same after the alleged delivery to Hodgkins, and that it was in the power of Hodgkins to produce evidence to explain Lyons' connection with the property, and he failed to introduce such evidence, the facts are to be taken most strongly against the party having such evidence and failing to produce it." The matter referred to in this instruction occurred several months after the sale to the plaintiff, and there was no evidence that the alleged act was done with the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff; which latter fact is an important one when it is sought to affect the rights of the plaintiff by the acts of Lyons, and which is not referred to in the instruction. We are not aware of any principle of law which makes the weight of evidence depend upon any such circumstance as that relied upon in this instruction. The weight of the evidence referred to was certainly not increased by the fact that it was not rebutted, though it might have been lessened by explanatory evidence. The plaintiff may have considered that the circumstances of the case sufficiently explained the matter, without introducing evidence, if any he had, specially relating to that point.

The judgment is affirmed.

IN THE MATTER OF JAMES ROMAINE et al.

SEC. 2 of Art. 4 of the Constitution of the United States is a solemn compact between the States, to be enforced by State legislation, or by judicial action; and being a part of the supreme law of the land, it is a part of the law of each State; and State officers whose duty it is to adjudicate, or execute the laws, are governed by it, and State Courts of general original jurisdiction, exercising the usual powers of Common Law Courts, are fully competent to hear and determine all matters, and to issue all necessary writs for the arrest and transfer of fugitive criminals to the authorized agent of the State from which they fled, without any special legislation.

The Governor of this State has a right to issue a warrant for the arrest of persons found in this State, who have committed a crime in a Territory of the United States, and fled therefrom to this State, and to deliver such persons up to the agent of the Territory from which they fled, upon a proper application being made to him therefor.

The warrant of the Governor, in such case, should clearly state, that the person is charged in some Territory of the United States with treason, felony, or other crime: that he has fled from justice, and is found in this State, and that the executive authority of the Territory from which he fled, has demanded his delivery, to be removed to the Territory having jurisdiction of the crime.

THIS was an application to be discharged from arrest on habeas corpus.

On the second day of November, 1863, Hill Beachy and Thomas Farrell presented to the Governor of California the following requisition, and affidavit annexed, and demanded a warrant for the arrest of the petitioners:

In Matter of Romaine.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, LEWISTON, IDAHO TERRITORY, }
United States of America, A. D., 1863. }

To his Excellency the Governor of British Columbia, or of the State of California:

Be it known, that on this twenty-third day of October, A. D., 1863, personally appeared before me, W. H. Wickersham, who presented to me an affidavit by him made, which is in due form of law, and which declares that a murder and highway robbery has been committed in this Territory; and Wm. Johnson, G. Clark, D. Smith, and F. Perkins, committed the same; and that they, the aforesaid Wm. Johnson, G. Clark, D. Smith, and F. Perkins, have fled from this Territory to British Columbia, or to the State of California; therefore, I request that the said fugitives be delivered up to Hill Beachy and Thomas Farrell, citizens of the United States and of Idaho Territory, whom I hereby appoint and constitute the proper authorities to receive the aforesaid fugitives, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, bearing date of August the ninth, 1842, so that the aforesaid fugitives may be tried in this Territory, in accordance with the laws of this Territory and of the United States.

WM. B. DANIELS,
Acting Governor of Idaho Territory, in the U. S. of America.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of Idaho Territory, at Lewiston, this twenty-third day of October, A. D., 1863, and of Independence of the United States the eighty-eighth.

WM. B. DANIELS,
Secretary of Idaho Territory.

TERRITORY OF IDAHO, }
County of Nez Perce. }

On this day personally appeared before me, W. H. Wickersham, who being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says, that Wm. Johnson, G. Clark, D. Smith, and F. Perkins, did, on or about the fifth day of October, A. D., 1863, wickedly and maliciously with malice aforethought, waylay, rob, and murder, one Lloyd Magruder and Charles Allen, citizens of the United States, on the trail, or road, leading from Virginia City to Lewiston, in said Territory, contrary to the laws made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of this Territory; and I therefore pray that a requisition issue to the Governor of British Columbia, or of the State of California, whither said parties are presumed to have fled; that the said Governor of British Columbia, or of the State of California, may order them to be delivered up for trial according to the laws of the United States, and of this Territory.

W. H. WICKERSHAM.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this twenty-third day of October, A.D., 1863; and I hereby certify that the above-named W. H. Wickersham is a credible witness, and that he is worthy of belief; and I also certify, that as yet, the Supreme nor District Court of this Territory have not been organized, and that as yet no seal has been adopted for said Court.

ALLECK C. SMITH,
Associate Justice Supreme Court, I. T.

I, William B. Daniels, hereby certify that the above-named Alleck C. Smith, is duly appointed and qualified as an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Idaho Territory; and that as such, full faith and credit should be given to all his official acts; and that the above affidavit is in due form of law, and that full faith and credit should be given to the same.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the Territory of Idaho, at Lewiston, this twenty-third day of October, A.D., 1863.

WM. B. DANIELS,
Secretary of Idaho Territory, U. S. A.

The Governor, on the demand, and the foregoing papers, issued his warrant for the arrest of the petitioners, of which the following is a copy:

In Matter of Romaine.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, }
 Sacramento, Nov. 2d, 1863. }

The People of the State of California to any Sheriff, Constable, Marshal, or Police officer, in this State:

Whereas, a requisition has been made upon me, as the Governor of the State of California, for the arrest and delivery to the proper person, of William Johnson, G. Clark, D. Smith, and F. Perkins, charged with the crime of murder and highway robbery, in the Territory of Idaho; and said requisition being issued in proper form, by William B. Daniels, acting Governor of the Territory aforesaid, you are therefore commanded, forthwith, to arrest the above-mentioned Wm. Johnson, G. Clark, D. Smith, and F. Perkins, and deliver them into the custody of Hill Beachy and Thomas Farrell, who have been appointed agents of the Territory of Idaho, to receive the said fugitives from justice, and to convey them to the said Territory of Idaho for trial.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of State to be affixed, at my office, in Sacramento, California, this second day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three.

LELAND STANFORD,
 Governor of California.

A. H. H. Tuttle, Sec'y of State.

The foregoing warrant was placed in the hands of J. W. Lees, Captain of Police, of San Francisco, by whom petitioners were arrested.

Officer Lees, in his return to the writ of habeas corpus, claimed to hold the petitioners by virtue of the foregoing warrant, and also set forth the requisition and affidavit on which the same was issued.

A. Campbell, for Petitioners.

J. W. Coffroth, for the People.

The application for discharge was heard before Justice ~~Cherokee~~, by whom the opinion was delivered.

The parties in this case were arrested and held in custody under a warrant issued by the Governor of this State, upon a requisition made by the acting Governor of Idaho Territory, alleging that they were charged with the crime of murder and highway robbery, committed in Idaho Territory, and that they fled from that Territory to this State. They have obtained a writ of habeas corpus to determine the validity of their arrest and imprisonment.

The first question raised by the counsel for the applicants is, that Congress had no power to pass the act relating to the rendition of fugitives from justice; and if they have, it is confined, under the provision in the National Constitution, to fugitives escaping from one "State" to another "State," and does not extend to fugitives fleeing from a "Territory." The clause of the National Constitution thus brought in question is as follows: "A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime." It will be noticed that Congress is not referred to in this clause, nor is any power over the matter conferred upon that body. In the same article in which it is found, several important subjects are treated of, over some of which power is conferred upon Congress, and in others not. Thus in regard to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the States, the admission of new States, the disposal of the territory and other property of the United States, and the guaranty of a republican form of government to each State, full power over these subjects is directly conferred upon Congress; but as to all other matters in that article, including the clause in question, no power is conferred upon Congress. They stand as solemn compacts between the States, to be enforced by State legislation, or by judicial action. They are, to a great extent, a recognition of rights founded upon principles of international law, but which were, under that law, often deemed more a matter of comity, than of absolute right, except the provision respecting the rights of citizenship, which go beyond any rule of international law.

Upon this very subject of the surrender of fugitives from justice fleeing from one State or nation to another, under the rules of international law, it has been a question very fully and ably discussed by public writers, whether such surrender was a matter of right and duty, or merely of comity. (Story on Conflict of Laws, Secs. 626-628.) This was deemed too important a question to leave unsettled, and the framers of our National Constitution wisely inserted the clause referred to, making it no longer a matter of mere comity, subject to the pleasure of each State, but an absolute right and duty. This provision being a part of the supreme law of the land, it is a part of the law of each State, and State officers whose duty it is to adjudicate or execute the laws, are governed by it the same as by every other law in force. A Court of general original jurisdiction, exercising the usual powers of a Common Law Court, is fully competent to hear and determine all matters, and to issue all necessary writs for the arrest and transfer of the fugitive criminal to the authorized agent of the State from whence he fled. Where a right is established by law, such Courts can apply the appropriate remedy and issue the necessary writs without special legislation. It may be considered doubtful whether the transfer of this power from the Courts to the Governor of the State is an act of wisdom. Certainly Courts of Justice are more competent to adjudicate the difficult and perplexing questions which often arise in such cases, than the Governor.

The great object of the National Constitution was to create a national government, with adequate powers; and a secondary object was, by articles of solemn compact, to settle certain matters of right and duty between the States and between the citizens of the different States. In pursuance of its first and great purpose, it establishes a government, defines its sphere, prescribes its duties, and confers upon it certain powers. And in carrying out its secondary purpose, it contains certain articles of agreement between the States. These different ends of the Constitution are entirely distinct in their nature, and if all the articles of compact were stricken out, the government created by it would still exist. The clauses of compact confer no power upon the government, and the powers of the government cannot be exerted except by virtue of express provisions to enforce these matters of compact. The clause in question is purely a matter of compact or agreement between the States, and it confers no powers upon Congress over its subject matter. The great object of rules of construction is to ascertain the intention of the parties making the instrument. The simple fact that while in several clauses in the same article power over the matters therein are directly, and in express terms, conferred upon Congress, while in the clause under consideration, such power is carefully withheld and omitted, would seem to be conclusive as to the intention of those who adopted the Constitution.

If this was a new question, free from the political excitements which have grown out of the discussion of the subject of slavery, and the enforcement of the succeeding clause relating to fugitives from service, few would have disputed that this clause confers no power upon Congress over the subject, and that all Congressional legislation founded thereon is void. In the view I have taken of this case, it is not necessary to determine this question. The clause, by its terms, applies only to criminals fleeing from one "State" to another "State," and does not in express terms apply to those fleeing from a Territory to a State, which is the case now under consideration. This case is not directly provided for by the National Constitution, and we are therefore compelled to look elsewhere for the power to return the parties before us.

The State has passed a law upon this subject which is in the following terms: "A person charged in any State or Territory of the United States with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in the State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State or Territory from which he fled, be delivered up by the Governor of this State, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime." Succeeding sections provide for the arrest and detention of the fugitive until he can be arrested under the warrant of the Governor. Under this section the Governor had a right to issue a warrant for the arrest of the parties in this case, and their surrender to the agent appointed by the acting Governor of Idaho Territory, and their removal from the State, upon a proper application being made to him therefor. The power to issue the warrant depends upon the following facts: 1st, that the persons are charged in some State or Territory of the United States with treason, felony, or other crime; 2d, that they have fled from justice; 3d, that they are found in this State; and 4th, that the executive authority of the Territory from which they fled, had demanded their delivery, to be removed to the Territory having jurisdiction of the crime. Properly, these facts should be clearly stated in the warrant issued by the Governor, to show that it is issued in a case authorized by law. The warrant issued for the arrest and removal of these parties is defective in this respect, as it merely states that they are "charged with the crime of murder and highway robbery in the Territory of Idaho," and that a demand or requisition has been made upon the Governor of this State for their arrest and delivery, by the acting Governor of the Territory; but it omits to state that they have fled from justice or that they are found in this State. The return to the writ of habeas corpus of the officer who has them in custody sets forth, however, certified copies of the original affidavit, and the requisition of the acting Governor of Idaho Territory issued thereon, and upon which the warrant of the Governor of this State was issued. These papers supply these facts omitted in the warrant, and substantially show that the warrant was issued in a case within the provisions of the law of this State. The applicants for the writ have not attempted to controvert any of these facts, or to show any valid reason why the warrant should not be enforced against them.

De La Guerra v. Burton.

For these reasons, their application to be discharged is denied, and they are ordered to be remanded to the custody of the officer having them in charge, to be removed from the State, in accordance with the warrant of the Governor.

DE LA GUERRA v. BURTON.

A JUDGE, who is related to either of the parties to an action, within the third degree of consanguinity, is incompetent to try an action between them.

APPEAL from the District Court, Second Judicial District, Santa Barbara County.

Ensminger v. McIntire.

Burton, the defendant, moved to change the place of trial on the ground that De La Guerra, the plaintiff, and Joaquin Carillo, the District Judge, were first cousins, and therefore within the third degree of consanguinity. The motion was denied and defendant appealed.

Eugene Liss, for Appellant.

Harmon & Hartley, for Respondent.

COPE, C. J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. and CROCKER, J. concurring.

It appears in this case, that the Judge who tried it is related to the plaintiff within the third degree of consanguinity. He was, therefore, incompetent to try it; and the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

ENSMINGER et al. v. MCINTIRE et al.

One who claims public lands in this State for raising fruit trees or crops, cannot enjoin miners from digging up the same for mining purposes, unless he can show that his fruit trees were planted or crops sown before the land was located for mining.

When the plaintiff closes his evidence, if the Court is of opinion that it would not sustain a verdict in favor of plaintiff upon the testimony, a nonsuit should be granted.

APPEAL from the District Court, Eleventh Judicial District, El Dorado County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Hereford & Williams, for Appellants.

S. W. Sanderson, for Respondents.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORTON, J. concurring.

Mayo v. Marshall.

This is an action of trespass, with a prayer for an injunction to restrain the defendants, who are miners, from digging up ground in the possession of the plaintiffs. After the plaintiffs had introduced all their evidence the defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was granted, and a judgment was rendered accordingly, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

The evidence showed that the plaintiffs had had an inclosure near the place in controversy, raising grain therein for several years, and the fence had been moved out about one hundred feet toward the ravine where the mining was going on, and the ground in controversy thus included within the inclosure, sometime in 1859. In November, 1860, the plaintiffs planted some peach trees on the land, against the objections of one of the miners, and when the ground was worked by the defendants, they had a volunteer crop of wheat there, good for hay. The testimony was that five peach trees were destroyed by the mining, worth eighteen dollars per hundred, and thirty pounds of hay worth one-and-a-half cents per pound, making the damages amount in all to one dollar and thirty-five cents. The Court below might well have concluded, from the evidence, that the trees were not planted in good faith, for the purpose of raising an orchard, but rather as a means of stopping the mining. Nor did the plaintiffs show a priority of appropriation of the ground in controversy. There was so little evidence in support of the plaintiffs' claim, that the Court might well have held that it would not sustain a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, in which case a nonsuit is proper. Under these circumstances we would not be justified in disturbing the judgment rendered in the Court below.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

MAYO v. MARSHALL — BRADFORD, INTERVENOR.

WHEREAS an entire tract of land has been sold on a judgment recovered against the same, or the owner thereof for taxes, the owner of an undivided interest in the land cannot redeem his undivided portion from the sale, by a payment of his proportion of the judgment and costs.

Mayo v. Marshall.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

In 1858, John Skinker was the owner of the entire lot of land, and the same was assessed to him. On the twenty-third day of May, 1859, Skinker deeded an undivided half of the lot to Bradford, the intervenor. On the twelfth day of December, 1860, the People recovered judgment against Skinker for the taxes of 1858. On the thirteenth day of September, 1861, and after the sale on the judgment for the taxes, Bradford, the intervenor, paid the Sheriff one-half the amount for which the lot sold, for the redemption of his undivided one-half. The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

P. L. Edwards, for Appellant.

L. Saunders, Jr., for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court—NORRIS, J. concurring.

This was an application for a mandamus to compel the defendant, as Sheriff of Sacramento County, to execute to the plaintiff a deed, under and in pursuance of a sale on an execution issued on a judgment rendered for taxes. The defendant filed an answer denying some of the allegations of the complaint, and setting up the claims of one Bradford, who, as owner of the undivided half of the property, had redeemed said one-half from the sale. The plaintiff moved to strike out this answer; but no disposition appears to have been made of this motion. Bradford filed an intervention opposing the claim of plaintiff to a deed for the undivided half owned by him, on the ground that he had redeemed the same from the sale. The plaintiff demurred to the intervention, which was sustained; and the Court rendered a judgment against the defendant and the intervenor, that the defendant execute a deed as prayed for; from which, this appeal is taken.

The answer of the defendant did not deny any of the material facts stated in the complaint; and the defense set up in the answer of the defendant and in the intervention, raises the single question whether a payment of one-half of the amount due to a purchaser at execution sale, by the owner of the undivided half of the property, operates as a redemption of that undivided interest. This question has already been determined by this Court, in the case of The People ex rel. v. McEwen (ante, 54), in which it was held, that such payment was not a redemption.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

HOBBS et al. v. DUFF et al.

A DECREE, rendered in an action on a bond, and to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the bond, which, after reciting the amount found due on the bond, directed that the mortgaged premises be sold, and out of the proceeds, the costs and the amount found due on the bond and accruing interest be paid, and that if there was a surplus, the Sheriff pay such surplus into Court, but that if the proceeds were insufficient to pay the debt, interest and costs, the Sheriff should report the amount of such deficiency or balance, and that, therefor, the plaintiff have execution against the defendants, merges the original debt in such judgment, at least so far as to make it a certain and liquidated demand, existing at the date when the amount of balance was ascertained, by the report of the Sheriff, sufficient as a foundation of a right of action or set-off.

It is not necessary that the demand sought to be used as a set-off, should be in the form of a personal judgment.

Where A appeals from a judgment against him, and B becomes his surety on the appeal bond; and A, to secure B for his liability on the appeal bond, assigns to B a liquidated demand held by A against third parties, the liability of B on the appeal bond is a sufficient consideration to support the assignment made to him by A.

The purchaser of a judgment, although he buys in good faith and for a valuable consideration, takes the same subject to any right of set-off existing between the parties at the time of his purchase.

An assignee of a judgment is deemed to have notice of all matters disclosed by the record and proceedings in the action in which the judgment was rendered, and where that judgment or the proceedings therein disclose an equitable right of set-off existing in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff, the assignee cannot claim to be a bona fide purchaser.

Where the parties to two judgments are not the same, a Court of Common Law jurisdiction cannot set off one against the other; but a Court of Equity will look beyond the nominal to the real parties in interest, and adjudicate the rights of the parties accordingly.

Robbs v. Duff.

A Court of Equity will not permit a cestui que trust who is insolvent, to enforce and collect through his trustee, a judgment against a party who holds a just and valid demand against the cestui que trust, which he has no means of enforcing or collecting if a set-off is denied.

Where, in an action at law, the defendants in their answer set up and claim a set-off to plaintiff's demand; and on the trial of the action, the record shows that the Court excluded all evidence of the demand sought to be set off, and gave judgment for plaintiff, the judgment in the action at law cannot be pleaded or claimed as an estoppel, in an action afterwards brought by the defendants in a Court of Equity to enforce the set-off.

The jurisdiction of a Court of Equity in relation to set-offs, is more extensive than that of Common Law Courts; and where the defendant in one of the judgments is insolvent, and the plaintiff in the other is not the real party in interest, but a trustee for the insolvent defendants in the other judgment, a Court of Equity will decree a set-off.

In equity, the right of set-off depends, not on the Statutes of Set-Off, but upon the right and the equitable jurisdiction of a Court of Chancery over its suitors.

A party does not lose his right to bring an action for a demand, which he might have pleaded as a set-off in a former action, but neglected to do.

An action brought in a Court of Equity to enforce a set-off of one judgment against another, is "an action upon a judgment or decree" within the meaning of Sec. 17 of the Statute of Limitations, and may be brought at any time within five years of the date of the judgment or decree.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

April 14th, 1857, Alfred K. Fisher brought an action in the District Court for Humboldt County against James T. Ryan, James R. Duff, and ten others named. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage made by the defendants in said suit to A. S. Tobias, to secure their bond to him—which said bond and mortgage had come to said Fisher by assignment. The bond and mortgage were executed November 3d, 1854.

Decree for plaintiff in the suit, September 15th, 1857.

Order of sale issued to Sheriff September 15th, 1857, who reported, October 10th, 1857, a sale of the mortgaged premises at public auction, application of the proceeds, and a deficiency or balance of $17,248.89.

February 23d, 1856, Fisher entered into a written contract with William R. Duff, by which, in consideration of a certain sum of money to be paid to him, he agreed to convey to William R. Duff all the mortgaged property, if, upon foreclosure and sale, he became the purchaser and acquired the title.

At the Sheriff's sale Fisher became the purchaser, but refused to carry out his contract with W. R. Duff, and on the ninth day of May, 1858, assigned the property and balance due on the decree to Richard F. Knox and Franklin Knox.

July 20th, 1858, W. R. Duff brought an action in the Eighth District Court against Fisher, and the Knoxes, and others, to enforce a specific performance of the contract made with him by Fisher, alleging that the Knoxes bought the property with full knowledge of the contract and with intent to defraud, etc.

June 17th, 1859, W. R. Duff recovered judgment against Fisher and the Knoxes, awarding a specific performance and a money judgment for $13,566.99.

From this judgment the Knoxes appealed to the Supreme Court; and the plaintiffs in this suit, Caleb S. Hobbs, Stephen D. Gilmore, G. W. Arms, L. Stephens, E. S. Goddard, and James Clark, executed an appeal bond on behalf of the Knoxes, staying the judgment. The appeal bond ran to William R. Duff as obligee, and bore date July 25th, 1859. The judgment from which the Knoxes appealed was affirmed in the Supreme Court in 1860. The case is found reported in 15 Cal. 375.

William R. Duff then brought an action against the present plaintiffs on the appeal bond, and recovered judgment against them August 23d, 1861, for $16,900.

On the tenth day of May, 1860, and soon after the judgment in the case of W. R. Duff v. Fisher et al., for specific performance, had been affirmed in the Supreme Court, the Knoxes assigned to Goddard, one of the present plaintiffs, the balance due on the decree which Fisher had assigned to them; and said assignment was made by the Knoxes to secure Goddard and his coplaintiffs for their liability on the appeal bond; and Goddard then assigned to his coplaintiffs an undivided half of this balance.

The present plaintiffs appealed from the judgment against them on the appeal bond, and the judgment was affirmed in the Supreme Court March 7th, 1862. The case is reported in 19 Cal. 646, and an examination of it will explain the leading facts in this case.

At the commencement of the present action, Hobbs, Gilmore, Armes, Stephens, Goddard, and Clark, the present plaintiffs, who were the Knoxes' sureties on the appeal bond, were the owners, by assignment, of the balance due on the decree in favor of Fisher against James T. Ryan, James R. Duff, and ten others. Isaac Josephi was the owner, by assignment, of the judgment recovered on the appeal bond by William R. Duff against the present plaintiffs; Duff had assigned this judgment to one Sharp, who had assigned it to Josephi.

The present action was brought to enjoin Josephi and his codefendants, Ryan, the two Duffs, and others, from issuing an execution on and attempting to enforce the collection of the judgment on the appeal bond against the plaintiffs, and to obtain a decree setting off the amount of the Duff judgment against plaintiffs, against the same amount of the unsatisfied balance of the decree held by plaintiffs against James T. Ryan, James R. Duff, and ten others.

The complaint, among other things, averred:

That on the twenty-third of February, 1856, Alfred K. Fisher entered into a contract with said James T. Ryan and James R. Duff (defendants herein), but by the especial request of the said James T. and James R. the name of William R. Duff (another of the defendants herein) was inserted in the contract as written, as the party contracting with said Fisher, instead of the real parties, James T. Ryan and James R. Duff.

That the said contract was so made running to William R. Duff with the intent and purpose, on the part of said James T. and James R., to delay, postpone, defeat, and defraud their creditors, to which said intent and purpose the said William R. Duff was party and privy.

That the action for specific performance and accounting, and the money judgment for the $13,566.99, and the appeal bond given by the plaintiff, and the action on the appeal bond, and the judgment thereon—were brought and procured by James T. Ryan and James R. Duff, to whom the said contract, and the said appeal bond, and the said several actions belonged in full ownership, and to whom the said several judgments now and ever have belonged by a like ownership and title. And that William R. Duff never had, and has not now, any rights or interests in said contract, appeal bond, actions, or judgments, except as a mere naked trustee of the aforesaid real owners thereof.

That Ryan and James R. Duff so the real owners of said judgment against these plaintiffs on the said appeal bond, and so debtors, as aforesaid, in the foreclosure decree and balance, so belonging to these plaintiffs by assignment, as aforesaid, are, together with the ten other debtors in said balance, utterly insolvent; and unless the said balance so belonging to the plaintiffs herein, and the said judgment against the plaintiffs, so belonging to said Ryan and James R. Duff, as aforesaid, can be opposed to and set off against each other, the plaintiff will be wholly remediless.

Then follows the appropriate prayer.

The motion for a preliminary injunction was heard in the Court below upon the complaint; answer of defendant Josephi, and replication thereto; affidavits in support of the complaint, and other affidavits, filed on behalf of defendant Josephi. The Court below granted the preliminary injunction, and from this order the defendant Josephi appealed.

The other facts appear in the opinion.

Patterson, Wallace & Stow, for Appellant.

The foundation of the case set up by the respondents is, that they have become and are the assignees of a certain judgment, rendered in favor of one Fisher against one James T. Ryan, and James R. Duff, and others. We submit, that no such judgment is shown to have been rendered. The supposed judgment is to the following effect:

The Court ascertains, in the suit of Fisher against Ryan and James R. Duff, that there is a certain sum due on the bond and mortgage, directs that the mortgaged property be sold to pay this amount. Directs that, if the sale of the mortgaged property shall not produce enough to pay the sum ascertained to be due, the Sheriff shall report the amount of the deficiency, and that execution issue against Ryan, James R. Duff, etc., for the deficiency.

As held by this Court, in the case of Rollins v. Forbes (10 Cal.

Hobbs v. Duff.

300), it was competent for Fisher, in that suit, to have pursued either one of two distinct courses in enforcing his rights, viz.: He might take a personal judgment for the amount due, with a direction for the sale of the mortgaged property, and the application of the proceeds of the sale to the credit of the judgment; and upon the judgment so rendered, he might then take out execution for the unpaid balance, without further application to the Court. Or, he might, as he did do in this case, obtain a decree adjudging the amount due upon the personal obligation and directing a sale of the premises, and the application of the proceeds to the payment of the judgment; in which latter case (as clearly appears from Bollins v. Forbes and Wife, supra) further action of the Court will be necessary; i. e., the proposition being, that personal judgment must be rendered. Whether before or after the sale of the mortgaged premises, makes no practical difference; but it must be rendered at some time.

It is true that this decree awards execution for the unsatisfied balance which may remain; but an award of execution does not constitute a judgment. (Phillipson v. Mangles, 11 East, 516.)

In Chapin v. Broder (16 Cal. 422) the decree contained a statement of the amount due, but it was notwithstanding held, that there was no personal judgment for the amount—that the matter was contingent, even though there, as here, was an award of execution.

A final decree for money must specify the sum—not leave it to be ascertained by a Sheriff or Commissioner's report. (Clark v. Bell, 4 Dana, 16.)

Assuming, however, that there was a judgment rendered in favor of Fisher, and against James T. Ryan, James R. Duff, and the "Humboldt Lumber Manufacturing Company," which might be the subject of assignment, we submit, that the record in this cause discloses such a state of facts, as makes it unfit for a Court of Equity to help the complainants to a set-off.

This unsatisfied balance of the Fisher decree first passed from Fisher to the Knoxes by formal assignment.

The complainants introduce the affidavit of one of the Knoxes, and it affirmatively appears by that affidavit, that the Knoxes have merely made a present of this Fisher balance to the complainants, by way of enabling them to set it up against the judgment on the appeal undertaking, if they can. In the pleadings, the plaintiffs say they paid "valuable consideration," "divers good and sufficient considerations;" but nowhere allege or prove any amount whatever paid by them, or either of them, for this Fisher balance. The record shows that the Knoxes committed a fraud in becoming the assignees of this balance; that Goddard paid the Knoxes nothing for it, and then divided it with his cocomplainants upon the same terms. It is now held by the complainants, not as bona fide assignees, who have paid value for it, and who have rights to be protected in reference to it, but in trust, for the use and benefit of the Knoxes. If the set-off can be sustained, the Knoxes will be released from paying their sureties, the complainants, anything. If the set-off is not sustained, the Knoxes will have to pay the W. R. Duff judgment.

In Perkins v. Parker (1 Mass. 117) it is held, that to enable a party to avail himself of the aid of a Court of Equity, as an assignee, he must hold the formal evidence of the assignment to him, "and this must appear to have been made, not merely upon a consideration expressing a formal value, but upon a good and adequate consideration." "And it is essential (say the Court) that the nature and amount of this consideration should be averred and proved by the party claiming the aid of this Court to enforce it as an equitable right; especially, when the interests of a third person, who is no party to the consideration of the assignment, is to be affected by it."

And upon page 126, Strong, J. says: "I have no doubt that the law will protect the equitable interests of an assignee of a chose in action. But to create the equitable interest, the assignment ought to be made for a good and adequate consideration, such as money paid, or a precedent debt discharged, etc., and the instrument assigned delivered over to the assignee; and these several facts ought to be shown in the pleadings. But what is the case before the Court? The replication says that, 'for value received the note was assigned.' (The phrases used in the complaint in the case at bar are, that Fisher sold to the Knoxes, 'for value received,' and the Knoxes 'sold and assigned' to Goddard, and Goddard to the other complainants, 'on divers meritorious and valuable considerations.') It is true that 'value received' is prima facie evidence of a valuable consideration. What is a valuable consideration? A peppercorn; and for aught that appears by the pleadings in this case, there was no greater consideration than that for the supposed assignment," etc.

And again, in Gilman v. Van Slyck (7 Cow. 469) upon application to the Court to set off one judgment against another, the Court say: "It is not competent for a party thus to buy a judgment conditionally for the purpose of setting it off. He is bound to become the absolute proprietor for that purpose. He must purchase and incur the risk of set-off himself; not come, as here, in the light of a mere agent."

In the case at bar there is not even a conditional purchase by complainants.

In Satterlee v. Ten Eyck (7 Cow. 480) it appeared that one Aiken obtained a judgment against Southwick, and indemnified Ten Eyck, the Sheriff, to obtain a levy on property as Southwick's property, which was claimed by the Satterlees. The latter sued the Sheriff, Ten Eyck, for the trespass, and recovered judgment against him and Aiken, then purchased from one Turner a judgment, which Turner had obtained against the Satterlees, and got the assignment made out in the name of Ten Eyck. And a motion being made in the name of Ten Eyck to set off one judgment against the other, the Court refused it, saying that the party must be really the assignee — not the mere agent or trustee of another. He must be the absolute owner, holding the beneficial control, or there could be no set-off.

Aiken was there, through the agency of Ten Eyck, attempting to do the same thing that the Knoxes are attempting here through the agency of the complainants, viz.: to save himself from being ultimately compelled to pay the judgment.

The case was afterwards brought before the Court of Chancery of the State of New York (1 Paige's Ch. 298) and the set-off was again denied there. In the case at bar, it is nowhere pretended in the record, that the Knoxes are not amply able to repay the complainants, their sureties on the appeal bond, the whole amount that they may be compelled to pay as sureties.

These complainants are estopped in this suit to aver that James T. Ryan and James R. Duff are the real parties in interest in the money due from them on the judgment on the appeal bond, because; In the suit that Wm. R. Duff instituted against the now complainant Goddard, it was in like manner adjudged that Ryan and James R. Duff had no interest on the side of W. R. Duff in the matters out of which these matters have grown; and it is not pretended that they have since acquired any such interest.

Fisher, the remote assignor of these complainants, would be estopped by the record in the suit of Duff v. Fisher and Knoxes.

Knoxes are estopped by the record of the same suit. Complainant Goddard litigated this precise question with William R. Duff.

The rule is that verdicts and judgments are conclusive against parties and privies in estate. The complainants, as assignees, are privies of their assignors, immediate and remote.

"If a party, after the verdict and judgment against him, assign his interest, the assignee is bound by the verdict." (2 Phillips on Ev. 15, note 260; Payner v. Coles, 1 Mumf. 373; Church v. Leavenworth, 4 Day, 274.)

And in the action on the appeal bond by Wm. R. Duff against these complainants, it was expressly averred by these complainants, defendants in that suit, that Ryan and J. R. Duff were the real parties in interest in the money now in suit, and the verdict and judgment were against them.

And there is no difference in the rule of set-off at law and in equity. (Elder v. Laswell, 2 Blackf. 349; Van Buren v. Van Gaesback, 4 Cow. 498.)

Mutual debts without mutual credits are no ground in equity for set-off, even in case of insolvency. French v. Garver, (7 Porter, Ala. 555.)

This complaint, though in the name of the present plaintiff, is in reality an attempt on the part of the Knoxes to avail themselves of the fruits of the fraudulent assignment made to them by Fisher—for it will be observed, that it is nowhere pretended in the record, that the Knoxes are insolvent, nor that if these then complainants are compelled, as sureties of the Knoxes, to pay this judgment, they will not be able to force payment out of their principals, the Knoxes; and it is apparent from the record that the Knoxes assigned the unsatisfied balance of the Fisher decree to complainant Goddard, without consideration, and that he in turn has divided it among his cocomplainants as a shield to protect the Knoxes from the William R. Duff judgment. The result is, that if the complainant's case shall fail, the Knoxes will have ultimately to pay the W. R. Duff judgment; but if the complainant's case shall succeed, the Knoxes are aided by a Court of Equity to avail themselves of the fruits of the fraudulent assignment made by Fisher to them—an assignment declared and adjudged, as we have seen in the case of William R. Duff against Fisher and the Knoxes, to have been made fraudulently, and for the purpose of swindling the creditors of said Fisher, of whom William R. Duff was one.

Hobbs v. Duff.

Shafters & Gould, for Respondents.

Counsel state, that "the foundation of the case set up by the respondents is, that they have become and are the assignees of a certain judgment rendered in favor of one Fisher against James T. Ryan, James R. Duff, and others," and "submit that no such judgment has been rendered."

We do not conceive that it is at all necessary for the plaintiffs to establish, that their offset has taken the form of a personal judgment. Other claims than personal judgments may be set off in equity. "The Court of Chancery was possessed of the doctrine of set-off, as grounded upon principles of equity, long before the law interfered." (2 Story's Eq. Sec. 1432.)

Lord Mansfield has expressed his views on the subject in the following language: "Natural equity says, that cross demands should compensate each other by deducting the less from the greater." In Lindsay et al. v. Jackson et al. (2 Paige, 581), the complainants filed their bill for the purpose of enforcing an acceptance as a set-off, and prevailed—the defendants holding promissory notes against the plaintiffs, under-due. The defendants were insolvent.

In Bigelow v. Folger (2 Met. 255) the defendant was allowed to set off a promissory note not due when the suit was commenced.

Hobbs v. Duff.

The plaintiff was insolvent. In Striker's case (1 Bland. 79) a claim for rents and profits was set off in equity against a claim for improvements. In Decatur Railroad v. Rhodes (8 Ala. 206) a claim for money paid was allowed as an equitable set-off. Stennet v. The Branch Bank at Mobile (9 Id. 120) held, that "upon a bill filed for an equitable set-off, the right does not depend upon the question, whether both demands have been liquidated by judgment or decree." In Stephens v. Fowler (9 Paige, 280) a debt not in judgment was allowed to be set off. In Blake et als. v. Langdon et al. (19 Vt. 485), the equitable set-off was not in judgment. In Naglee v. Palmer et al. (7 Cal. 543), the offsets had not passed into judgment—they had been merely filed and reported upon. The foregoing authorities clearly establish, that every description of counter-claim, if liquidated, can be made the subject of equitable set-off.

Now, in the foreclosure suit of A. K. Fisher v. The Humboldt Lumber Manufacturing Co., James T. Ryan, and James B. Duff et als., there was a decree or judgment past all doubt. It is adjudged that there was due on the bond and mortgage $33,820—and this adjudication is admitted by counsel in terms. And it was further adjudged that the lands mortgaged should be sold for its payment. Part has in fact been paid in the mode designated, and part in fact remains unpaid. Now the complaint does not say that the decree is a "personal judgment," a "money judgment," or any other kind of judgment. It simply calls it "a judgment"—sets it out in hæc verba, and leaves the question of its effect to be determined by the Court. Nor does the complaint allege that the plaintiffs have a personal judgment, or any judgment, for the alleged balance constituting their set-off. The allegation is that there was a "judgment and decree for $33,820, as due upon the bond and mortgage." And the allegation is true, even if the judgment was in rem, or quasi in rem. The complaint alleges further that there is "a balance due and unpaid on that judgment, amounting to $17,248.89 and interest." And is not that allegation true also? Cannot an "unpaid balance" be predicated of a judgment in rem or quasi in rem, as well as of a promissory note, or bond, or judgment in personam? (20 Ala. 825; 27 Id. 428; 8 Geo. 354; 3 Port. 35.)

We shall assume, then, that what we have alleged is true — that is, the fact of “a balance of a decree unpaid.” Admit, now, that there is no subsisting personal judgment for that balance, does it follow that we have no remedy for its recovery? Is it true that we can do nothing until we have a personal judgment to start with? If so, then, having no personal judgment, we cannot start at all. The objection obviously assumes that nothing can be relied on as the foundation of an equitable offset except a personal judgment; whereas, the cases cited establish that every description of contract and record claim due in law or equity, may be so presented. Assuming that our balance has not as yet taken on the form of a personal judgment, can it not be made to take on that form in this proceeding?

By the settled practice of the American Chancery, an unsatisfied balance due on a foreclosure decree containing no provision for the payment of a deficiency, may, on the ground that it is equitably due from the party, be subjected to the form of a personal judgment by a petition, or, more properly perhaps, by supplemental bill; and it follows that if the party from whom such balance is equitably due should sue the party to whom it is equitably due upon a bond or other contract claim, the defendant could tender his equitable counter-claim in offset, and in that behalf might set out the decree as it was entered, admit part payment according to the method of the judgment, characterize his equitable counter-claim as “an unsatisfied balance equitably due upon the decree,” and seek a judgment from the Court upon that question.

The complaint does not attempt, in form, to make a case of “debt” upon an existing personal judgment. It sets forth a detail of facts instead, and they show all the conditions of a valid personal claim upon our debtors in personam, and that is sufficient for our purpose.

But the complaint and the exhibits annexed do show a personal judgment against James T. Ryan, James R. Duff, and the ten other persons parties to the foreclosure in question. To find out what was adjudged, we must go to the record of the judgment as it was actually made up. The decree recites “that the Court, on the twelfth day of September, 1857, referred the matter to Lewis

Hobbs v. Duff.

Wood, Esq., Clerk of this Court, to compute, ascertain, and report to this Court the amount of principal and interest due the said plaintiff on the bond and mortgage set forth in the complaint; and the said referee having this day made his report, showing that there is this day due on the said bond and mortgage the sum of $33,820; and on reading and filing his said report, and on motion of Thomas Hanna, attorney of said plaintiff, it is ordered by the Court that the said report be confirmed."

The decree then proceeds in common form to "adjudge and decree" that the mortgaged premises be sold; and to "adjudge and decree" that out of the proceeds certain special charges shall be paid; and then to "adjudge and decree" that out of the same proceeds the "said sum of $33,820 shall be paid, with interest thereon, or so much of said sum as the residue of the proceeds will pay; and then to "adjudge and decree," if there should be a surplus, that the Sheriff shall pay it into Court; and then to "adjudge and decree" that "if the proceeds be insufficient to pay the amount of said debt, interest and cost, the Sheriff shall report the amount of such deficiency or balance; and then, finally to "adjudge and decree" that "therefor the plaintiff have execution" against the debtors, naming them by name.

This was a proper decree, as this Court has already repeatedly decided; but no matter how erroneous it may be, it cannot be attacked collaterally. For all the purposes of this case, it is to be treated as a valid and final judgment upon all the points adjudged by it.

The right, and the extent of the right, having been ascertained by the report of the Referee, as by the verdict of a jury, the decree, in view of the facts so found, takes up the subject of relief, and "decrees and adjudges" upon it under three distinct aspects:

1st. The mortgage property shall be sold, and the proceeds be applied in satisfaction of the debt.

2d. But there may be a surplus; and if there be, then let it be paid into Court, there to remain subject to the Court's order.

3d. But there also may be a deficiency. Should there be one, let the Sheriff report it and the amount of it, and then on this, the last of the three alternative aspects, the decree adjudges "that the plaintiff have execution therefor against the debtors in the suit by name."

Courts of Equity do not administer justice "by halves." They aim to exhaust the cases with which they deal. Their decrees for relief are not confined in their range to facts that have formed themselves into actual combinations, existing at the time the Chancellor utters his judgment, but they project themselves into the future; and anticipating other, and all other combinations of facts that may arise by legal possibility, proceed to adjudge in advance the legal consequences that shall attend upon them when they actually occur. It is mainly in the fact that its decrees can be thus molded, that the excellency of the chancery jurisdiction consists.

Among other possible predicaments, the Chancellor, in the foreclosure case, foresaw that there might be a "balance" unsatisfied by the proceeds of the sale—the existence and amount of which might be made manifest by the Sheriff's return—as in returns upon execution at common law—and acting in advance upon such possible predicament, he in so many words "adjudges and decrees that the plaintiff have execution therefor against the defendants" by name. Here is a judgment at least. The language not only imports it, but demonstrates it. It is not a judgment in rem, and it remains that it must be a judgment that the "balance," when ascertained in the manner pointed out by the decree, should be paid by the debtors out of their estates at large. This is a contingent judgment in personam, or it is nothing, and words have lost their meaning. The form of words used in the utterance of this judgment, as well as the power of the Court to render the judgment itself, are fully vindicated by the two hundred and forty-sixth section of the Practice Act:

"The Court shall have power by its judgment to direct a sale of the property, or any part of it—the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount due on the mortgage, and execution for the balance."

It is of no moment that the report of the Sheriff was not "confirmed" by the Court, for the decree does not require it. Perhaps it ought to have required it, but it is quite certain that it does not. It is of no moment that an order was not procured for execution, for the decree in terms doomed the defendants to execution as a sequence following instantaneously upon the filing of the report, and in that particular it followed the mode pointed out in the two hundred and forty-sixth section of the Practice Act.

But all the questions arising under the objection in hand have been settled by this Court in Rollins v. Forbes and Wife (10 Cal. 299) and Rowe v. Table Mt. M. Co. (Id. 441).

The case of Chapin v. Broder (16 Id. 408) is not opposed to, but agrees with and illustrates the doctrine of the foregoing cases. The counsel contesting the judgment lien asserted in that case, admitted in their argument "that the decree in favor of Moss became a lien from the time of the Sheriff's return, and the filing of his report of sale showing that there was a deficiency," but insisted that "until then the judgment was contingent, and no execution could issue." The whole of the reasoning in the opinion shows that this view was adopted by the Court. They say that the "judgment is in abeyance until the contingency (named in the decree) is determined." And how determined here except in the mode and manner in which the decree has adjudged it shall be determined, viz: by the filing of the officer's return showing the existence of a deficiency, and its amount?

The Court further says: "It (such contingent judgment) may become a valid and perfect judgment; but until the amount to be recovered is ascertained and fixed, no effect can be given to it as a lien."

In all the New York cases in which it has been held that execution could not issue for a balance reported by the Master until after the report had been confirmed, the decree in terms made such confirmation necessary. In our statutes there is no such provision.

But this question is no longer an open one, for in Rollins v. Forbes and Wife (10 Cal. 299) it was held, that where a personal judgment was in fact involved in the decree rendered in the foreclosure, and the avails of the sale had been credited by the officer making the sale and reporting a balance, "no further action of the Court would be necessary to ascertain the deficiency for which execution might issue." The only question open on this record is:

Hobbs v. Duff.

Does the Fisher decree involve such personal judgment? (5 Gill & Johns. 52.)

As a result we submit, that the plaintiff in A. K. Fisher v. Ryan and Duff et al., had a contingent judgment in personam as soon as the decree was entered, and that judgment became an absolute judgment in personam as soon as the contingency transpired.

After confirming the Master's report, the decree, in the language of counsel, "adjudges the amount due on the personal obligation." What personal obligation? Certainly not the mortgage, for that acts merely upon the land. The only personal obligation disclosed by the papers, is the personal obligation evidenced by the bond which the mortgage was given to secure. The Court, then, "adjudged" the amount "due" upon the bond. But as "due" from whom? The only answer that can be given is, "due from the parties by whom the bond is signed." The decree, then, establishes by judgment that those parties were personally indebted to Fisher in the sum of $38,820, by reason of the bond, and that result, so affecting the obligors personally, is res judicata. The residue of the decree, in effect, adjudges that the already adjudged personal indebtedness shall be paid, and primarily casts the burden upon the lands mortgaged, and that resource coming short, and the amount of the deficit being ascertained by the report of a sworn public officer, execution therefor is to issue against the persons from whom that deficit, and a still larger sum originally, had, in the language of counsel, been "adjudged" to be "due" on the "personal obligation" evidenced by the bond.

Counsel state, that in Chapin v. Broder (16 Cal. 422), it was held there was no personal judgment. The decree in that case was the same as the Fisher decree. It was held that the decree in the first instance contained no such personal judgment as was necessary in order to work out the result of the "lien" on lands extraneous to the mortgage; but on looking into the facts of that case, the Court will see that the very point upon which the judgment of the Court below was affirmed was, that the balance, when reported by the Sheriff, became a judgment lien the moment the report was filed. If that case was rightly decided, then Fisher had a perfected personal judgment the moment that the Sheriff's report was filed in the Clerk's office of the County of Humboldt. The result is that we are in the right in this matter, if Chapin v. Broder was rightly decided.

In commenting upon the case of Clark v. Bell (4 Dana, 16), counsel rely upon it as authority to show that "a final decree for money must specify the sum — not leave it to be ascertained by the Sheriff or Commissioner's report." It is sufficient to say that the decree here, and on the admission of counsel, too, does "adjudge the amount due upon the personal obligation." It does not, then, run into the vice of committing any question involving the exercise of judicial power or discretion to the Sheriff for solution. The Sheriff is required to sell and report, both of which acts are purely ministerial and clearly within the scope of his official duties. If counsel mean to contend that there can be no contingent judgment in personam, they are met by: (Chapin v. Broder, 16 Cal. 422; McCarthy v. Graham, 8 Paige, 480; Rollins v. Forbes et ux., 10 Cal. 229; 10 Paige, 117.)

But counsel say, that "it appears by the affidavit of one of the Knoxes, at page 68 of the Transcript, that the Knoxes have merely made a present to the complainants of the Fisher balance, by way of enabling them to set it up against the judgment on the appeal undertaking, if they can."

Answer.—The affidavit referred to shows that the balance due on the Fisher decree was not a gift or "present" by the Knoxes to the complainant, in the sense in which counsel evidently use the term; but, on the contrary, that the assignment was made by them on a valuable and highly meritorious consideration, viz.: to secure the complainants against their liability on the appeal bond, given by them at the request of the Knoxes, in the suit for specific performance (W. R. Duff v. Fisher et al.)

It is said that the plaintiffs hold the Fisher "balance in trust for the Knoxes." The answer is, that the record shows that the trust is not a naked trust, but a trust coupled with an interest; and no trust at all except such as all sureties are affected with who take securities from their principals.

It is said, further, "if the set-off can be sustained, the Knoxes will be released from paying their sureties anything." The answer to that, if any answer is required, is, that they will be so released for the reason that, by assigning to the plaintiffs the balance due them on the Fisher judgment; they have, in advance, put their sureties in funds wherewith to liquidate their liabilities, evidenced by the judgment upon the appeal bond. No one can complain, except Josephi, should the offset be allowed; but he took his assignment of the judgment on the appeal bond long after our equitable right to offset had vested. Josephi took his assignment subject to the vested equity of the plaintiffs to oppose their balance to it. (Practice Act, Sec. 5; Gay v. Gay, 10 Paige, 389; Barber v. Spencer, 11 Id. 517; Wright v. Levy, 12 Cal. 257.) As to the necessity of a written assignment, see Ford v. Stewart (19 Johns. 342), in which it was held, that "a judgment may be assigned by parol, or writing without seal." Same point in Prescott v. Hall (17 Johns. 284).

In Ensign v. Kellogg et al. (4 Pick. 1), the assignees of a bond sued for specific performance: held, that the obligors could not question the validity of such assignment on the ground that it was without consideration: that is a matter between the creditors of the obligee and the complainant.

Josephi is no "creditor" of our assignors, undertaking to set aside our assignment on the ground that it was made for the purpose of defrauding him, as a creditor, and driving us up to prove that we paid a full and adequate consideration for the "balance" assigned; nor did he become interested as a "third person" until after the judgment on the appeal bond had been finally affirmed in this Court, March 7th, 1862. Sharp assigned to Josephi March 10th, 1862, and William R. Duff the trustee of our debtors, assigned to Sharp on the same day.

Again, the fallacy of the argument that the complaint will not support the injunction, for the reason that the character and amount of the consideration paid by the plaintiffs for an assignment to them of the balance due on the Fisher decree are not circumstantially stated, will more fully appear from the following considerations:

In the case of Gilman v. Van Slyck et al. (7 Cow. 469), cited by counsel, it was held, "that a judgment purchased by a party with a view to set it off, and with condition that if he fails to obtain the set-off on motion, the assignment shall be void; and accompanied with a stipulation that the assignee shall be indemnified against the costs of the motion, cannot be set off." That case differs from this in every governing particular. Here, there was no such condition, nor was there any such stipulation. The assignment was absolute for all the purposes of indemnity to the sureties for whose benefit it was given.

As to Satterlee v. Ten Eyck (7 Cow. 480), we make out a case under the law of offsets as there expounded. The plaintiffs are not the "mere agents or trustees" of their assignors, but are the "absolute owners" of the balance which they assert, "holding the beneficial control" thereof in the largest measure that the law of pledges will admit of. Further on it is said by counsel, "that it is nowhere pretended in the record that the Knoxes are not amply able to repay the complainants, their sureties on the appeal bond, the whole amount that they may be compelled to pay as sureties." To this we submit the following replies:

According to all the cases, our right to offset in equity turns upon the insolvency of the parties who owe us the "balance," and it cannot be made to hinge upon the insolvency of the parties from whom we derived our title to that balance.

In Walker v. Sedgwick (8 Cal. 405), it was held as follows: "Insolvency may exist in a thousand cases where its existence cannot be proved at the time; and who would not prefer setting off his claim against that of another, rather than first pay the money out of his own pocket, and then risk getting it again from the pocket of his adversary?" The point decided in this case is identical in effect with that now under discussion.

The principles upon which judgments are held conclusive upon the parties, require that the rule should apply only to that which was directly in issue, and not to everything which was incidentally brought into the controversy during the trial. And it is only to the material allegations of one party that the other can be called upon to answer; it is only upon such that an issue can properly be formed, to which alone testimony can be regularly adduced; and upon such an issue only is judgment to be rendered. A record, therefore, is not held conclusive as to the truth of any allegations which were not material nor traversable; but as to things material and traversable, it is conclusive and final. (1 Greenl. Ev. Sec. 528.)

As a second estoppel, counsel insist "that in the suit William R. Duff instituted against the plaintiff Goddard, it was in like manner adjudged that Ryan and James R. Duff had no interest on the side of William R. Duff in the matters out of which these matters have grown, and it is not pretended that they have since acquired any such interest."

To this objection we submit the following answer: Of the six plaintiffs in this action, one only of their number was party to the suit named in the statement of the objection, viz.: Goddard. That suit was commenced August 17th, 1860. All of the plaintiffs became jointly interested in the offset now presented on the nineteenth of June previous; and it follows that inasmuch as Hobbs, Gilmore, Armes, Stephens, and Clark, were interested in the offset before, and at the time the suit referred to was brought, and were not made parties to it, that no judgment rendered in the suit could by possibility estop them. Nor would Goddard himself be estopped by the judgment in any subsequent litigation involving the same subject matter in which he and his coöwners were made defendants jointly. (2 Cowen & Hill's Notes, 2; Baring v. Fanning, 1 Paine, 549; Chapman v. Chapman, 1 Mumf. 398.)

The third estoppel relied on, is stated by counsel as follows: "In the suit upon the appeal bond where the same matters were set up which are now set forth in the complaint, it was determined that William R. Duff was the owner of the money now in controversy." By "the money now in controversy," counsel doubtless mean the money due on the judgment on the appeal bond. That was an action at law by William R. Duff against the present plaintiffs, upon the appeal bond.

It is true that the offset now relied on was presented in that suit upon the same allegations substantially as those contained in the present complaint. But by referring to the statement on new trial in that case, it appears that the defendants' evidence to prove that the appeal bond in suit belonged to James T. Ryan and James R. Duff, was excluded by the Court below, and that the question of fact was neither determined nor investigated. The new trial asked red by Sec. 19 of the Statute of Limitations. "An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." (Lord v. Morris, 19 Cal.) The judgment, plaintiff seeks to set off, was rendered September 17th, 1857. This action was commenced March, 1862, more than four years after, and more than six years after Fisher, plaintiffs' assignor, discovered that Wm. R. Duff was trustee of James T. Ryan and another.

Shafter & Gould, in reply.

The legal proposition seems to be as follows: If A (A. K. Fisher) having a mortgage on lands of B (James T. Ryan and James R. Duff), the mortgage standing as security for B's own debt, makes a contract with B (here nominally with Wm. R. Duff as the naked trustee of J. T. Ryan and J. R. Duff) that he (A) will convey to B the mortgaged lands if he (A) should become the owner of them under proceedings in foreclosure; A, in the event of his becoming the owner of the lands in the manner named, would be bound to convey them to B free from all lien for an unpaid balance of the mortgage, should there happen to be one. That conclusion may be safely admitted, for it is difficult to see how the purchaser, A, could have any lien on his own land for a balance due to himself. But after the title had vested in B by conveyance from A, why could not A collect his unpaid balance due to him from B, by levying it upon the particular land conveyed? Of what importance would it be to B, whether that particular land should be seized or some other property constituting a portion of his general estate, for the payment of an admitted debt? Or if A (here these plaintiffs in effect) was indebted to B (here James T. Ryan and James R. Duff in effect) in any money claim from book account up to final judgment (here the judgment on the appeal bond, in effect), why could not A (these plaintiffs in effect) offset his money "balance" against the adversary money claim due from his debtor? Dropping here the hypothetical case, the argument of counsel suggests no other reason than this: Fisher had to be compelled by proceedings to fulfill his agreement to convey the mills and the steam tug, and damages were assessed by a Court, instead of being amicably assessed by the parties. Conceding that we have a personal judgment for our "balance;" conceding that that balance has come to us honestly and on sufficient consideration; conceding further, that the judgment on the appeal bond to which our offset is now opposed, was the property of James T. Ryan and James R. Duff at the time when the plaintiffs so became owners of the "balance;" conceding, in short, every point of fact which we claim, the hopeless insolvency of our debtors inclusive, counsel maintains that the plaintiffs cannot offset, for the reason that Fisher was contumacious in the matter of fulfilling his contract to convey, and that thereby he forfeited his right to offset; and that the bar was not limited to him, but affects "his heirs, administrators, and assigns, forever." For this conclusion no case is cited and no principle is adduced. The case from 11 Gill & Johns. 314, has not, as we conceive, any bearing upon the point. But another objection is made by counsel, under title fourth, not taken in the leading brief; it is, that Fisher should have pleaded in offset the balance of his foreclosure decree, in the suit for specific performance of his contract to convey the mills and tug; and that not having done so, neither he nor his assigns can bring an original action to enforce the offset. The case cited from 11 Cal. 212, has obviously no bearing on this proposition, neither has the case cited from 4 Johns. 510, nor the case from 1 Id. 97. It is perfectly well settled that a party having an offset at law may present it in a suit against him at law, or forbear to do so in his election, and without prejudice to any of his legal or equitable remedies. This point is so thoroughly established by the authorities that it cannot be considered an open question. (Barb. on Set-off, 21.) In this matter equity doubtless "follows the law."

Hobbs v. Duff.

But again: Fisher could not have offset his "balance" in the suit of W. R. Duff v. Fisher and Knozes for specific performance and account, without the help of the "equitable circumstance" furnished now by the insolvency of the parties from whom that balance was due. If he had attempted it, he would have grounded on the shoal of "mutuality." Now, it nowhere appears in this record that those parties were insolvent at the time when the suit was brought or while it was pending. How then, can counsel say that Fisher could have pleaded his balance in offset in the suit referred to? But counsel further along, refers to the suit of Wm. R. Duff v. Goddard and Sheriff Van Ness (to enjoin the threatened sale of the Humboldt mill on an execution for our "balance"), and argues that because that suit settled the title to the saw-mill, it in effect settled the title to the money judgment on the appeal bond. This position we do not propose to review a second time, and refer to it now for the purpose of correcting an error of fact into which counsel has inadvertently fallen. There was no decree forbidding Goddard to sell the "balance" of the Fisher decree now raised as an offset. He was enjoined to refrain from selling the mill, which we take to be a different thing altogether.

Again, it is asserted that Goddard assigned an interest in the set-off to his cosureties and coplaintiffs, after the decree in the quia timet suit referred to. That is a mistake; for as we have already shown by the record, the plaintiffs became joint owners of the set-off forty days before the quia timet suit was brought. Counsel, under the fourth head in his brief, contends that we are estopped from asserting our offset by the "undertaking on appeal." The proposition is not illustrated by any comment, and it would be idle for us to conjecture the grounds upon which it was advanced by counsel, and then proceed to answer the grounds so conjectured. We do not deny the bond, nor any of its recitals; and the entire validity of the judgment rendered upon it against us is admitted in the very theory of this action. Counsel further insists that plaintiffs are estopped by the contract on which the suit for specific performance was based, from saying that our debtors Ryan and Duff were the beneficial owners of it; but no reasons for this opinion are given or suggested, except as it is said that Fisher contracted with Wm. R. Duff. The answer is, that we do not deny now anything which that contract provides for, or asserts, or manifests. Among other things, the paper demonstrates that the contract, as written, runs to W. R. Duff, but it does not show, nor undertake to show, who the persons were at whose instance or for whose benefit the contract was in fact made. The difficulty relied on by counsel was considered and disposed of judicially in the case of Barrett v.

Hobbs v. Duff.

Barrett (8 Pick. 342), and in Naglee v. Palmer (7 Cal. 543). Under the fifth head of the brief, counsel defend on the ground of the Statute of Limitations. It is true that this action was commenced more than four years after the rendition of our judgment, but it is also true that it was less than five years by seven months. The statute runs from the date of the judgment, past all doubt, and that was October 10th, 1857; the date of the Sheriff's return showing the amount of the unsatisfied balance that we now seek to have offset against the judgment on the appeal bond. The case, then, in our view of the matter, comes to this: The plaintiffs are at law the absolute owners of a claim against J. T. Ryan and James R. Duff of the amount of about $55,000, and they are the equitable owners thereof, as sureties, for all the purposes of indemnity. We seek to offset it against a judgment now the property of Josephi, but which belonged to our debtors at the time when we took our claim by assignment. We are not estopped from proving that the adversary judgment was the property of our debtors at the time named, by any record that has been produced, for in none of them is that question even alluded to, except one (the action on the appeal bond), and in that record it appears that the question, for technical reasons, was not tried. The suit failed for the reason, as this Court held, that the offset could not be enforced in a Court of Law.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — CORN, C. J. concurring.

This is an appeal from an order granting an injunction, in an action in the nature of a suit in equity, for a decree setting off a certain demand owned by the plaintiffs, against a demand owned by Josephi, one of the defendants.

The record discloses these facts, that on the fifteenth day of September, 1857, one Fisher obtained a decree for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon certain real and personal property in the District Court of Humboldt County, against one Ryan, J. R. Duff and several others; that the mortgaged property was duly sold under the decree; and after the application of the proceeds upon the amount of the mortgage debt found due by the decree, there was a deficiency or balance of $17,248.89; that May 9th, 1858, Fisher assigned this balance, due on the decree, to R. & F. Knox, and May 10th, 1860, they assigned it to one Goddard, who, on the nineteenth day of June, 1860, assigned the undivided half to his associate plaintiffs in this action. This is the demand the plaintiffs claim the right to use and apply as a set-off — the sum due thereon with interest amounting to $53,977.63, at the commencement of this action.

The complaint states, that on the twenty-third day of February, 1856, Fisher entered into a contract with the said Ryan and J. R. Duff, two of the defendants in the decree of foreclosure, for the conveyance of the mortgaged property, should he acquire the title to it; but that Ryan and J. R. Duff, for the purpose of defrauding their creditors, had the contract made in the name of W. R. Duff, instead of their own, the latter being privy to the fraud; that an action was brought thereon, in the name of W. R. Duff, against Fisher, the Knoxes and others, to compel a specific performance, and an account of the rents and profits, in which a final decree was rendered in favor of W. R. Duff against the defendants, for a specific performance of the contract, and for damages in the sum of $13,566.99; that the Knoxes appealed from this judgment to this Court, and the plaintiffs in the present suit became their sureties on the appeal bond; that the judgment was affirmed on appeal, and W. R. Duff brought an action on the appeal bond, in which he recovered judgment against the plaintiffs in this action, on the twenty-third day of August, 1861, for $16,900, and they aver that Ryan and J. R. Duff procured all these actions, and proceedings to be had, in the name of W. R. Duff, who acted as a mere naked trustee for them, they being the real owners of the judgment against the plaintiffs. W. R. Duff assigned this judgment on the tenth day of March, 1862, to one Sharp, who, on the twelfth day of March, 1862, assigned it to the defendant Josephi. It is this judgment that the plaintiffs seek to have set off and satisfied, by having the amount thereof credited on the larger judgment held by them. The injunction is to restrain the defendants from enforcing this judgment against the plaintiffs.

The first point raised by the appellants is, that the decree assigned to the plaintiffs is not a money judgment, and therefore does not form a proper foundation of an action for a set-off. The decree is rendered in a form in very common use in the Courts of this State. It recites that the Court referred the case to the Clerk of the Court, to compute and report the amount of principal and interest due on the bond and mortgage; that the referee had reported due thereon the sum of $33,820, and then "it is ordered by the Court that the said report be confirmed." It then proceeds and decrees, that the mortgaged premises be sold; that out of the proceeds certain charges be paid, and the "said sum of $33,820 shall be paid," with interest thereon; that if there be a surplus, the Sheriff shall pay such surplus into Court; that if the proceeds should be insufficient to pay the said debt, interest and cost, the Sheriff shall report the amount of such deficiency or balance, and that "therefor the plaintiff have execution" against the defendants. The Sheriff, after the sale, duly reported the balance due as before stated. This decree appears to be in strict accordance with Sec. 246 of the Practice Act, as it stood at the date of the judgment, by which it was provided, that the "Court shall have power, by its judgment, to direct a sale of the property, or any part of it; the application of the proceeds to the payment of the amount due on the mortgage, lien, or incumbrance, with costs, and execution for the balance." The right of the plaintiff, in foreclosure suits, to a personal judgment for the amount of the debt, under this section, was established by the decisions of this Court in: (Rollins v. Forbes, 10 Cal. 299; Rowe v. Table Mountain Water Co., Id. 441; Rowland v. Lethy, 14 Id. 156; Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Id. 116.) But in those cases there seems to have been a direct decree, that the defendants pay, or that the plaintiff recover the amount found due—which is not found in the decree we are now considering. In this respect it is like the decree passed upon in Chapin v. Broder (16 Cal. 403). In that case the judgment had been docketed at the date of its rendition; and the question was at what time the lien of the judgment attached upon the lands in controversy; and it was held, that until the amount of the deficiency had been ascertained after a sale, the amount of the judgment was uncertain and indefinite; and that no effect could be given to it, beyond a sale, so long as this uncertainty continued. The question before us is, whether, in such a decree, there is a judgment for the amount of the deficiency when it has been duly ascertained by a report of the Sheriff, with the usual qualities of a judgment at law, or a decree in equity for the payment of money? That question was not directly decided in Chapin v. Broder; but the language used by the Court would seem to imply, that such was their opinion; and that the docketing of such a judgment would make it a valid lien on the property of the defendants, from the time the deficiency was duly ascertained—but could not date prior to that time. The fact that the statute does not require, in such cases, a direct personal decree for the payment of the money, and yet authorizes an execution to issue for the balance, would give a decree, rendered in accordance with its provisions, one of the highest and most important attributes of a money judgment—the foundation of an execution to enforce its collection; and a sale of property, under such an execution, would certainly convey a valid title.

Hobbs v. Duff.

But it is unnecessary for us to determine what is the character and quality of such a judgment, further than as it may apply to the present case. We think it clear that the original debt is merged in such a judgment, at least so far as to make it a certain and liquidated demand, existing at the date when the amount was ascertained, sufficient as a foundation of a right of action or set-off. The principle is well settled, that it is not necessary that the demand sought to be used as a set-off should be in the form of a judgment.

It appears from the record, that prior to the suit for a specific performance, Fisher had conveyed the mortgaged property which he had purchased, to the Knoxes, and they were therefore made parties to the action, it being alleged that the sale was fraudulent and void, and that the Knoxes were therefore bound by Fisher's contract to convey. This issue was found in favor of the plaintiffs in that action; and the decree, therefore, was rendered against the Knoxes. The appellants contend that the assignment of the judgment by Fisher to the Knoxes was without consideration, and fraudulent, and that the decree in the action for a specific performance was an adjudication to that effect, binding upon the plaintiffs, and vitiating the judgment in their hands. It is a sufficient answer to this, to say that the assignment of this judgment by Fisher to the

Hobbs v. Duff.

Knoxes formed no part of the matters in controversy in that action, and no judgment was entered affecting it in any way. It is also urged, that this assignment of the judgment by the Knoxes to the plaintiffs was made without any consideration. It appears from the record, that it was made for the purpose of securing the plaintiffs against their liability on the appeal bond, which they executed as sureties for and at the request of the Knoxes. This is clearly a sufficient consideration to support the assignment. It is both a valuable and adequate consideration.

The assignment is not conditional, as was the case in Gilman v. Van Slyck (7 Cow. 469). The Knoxes are the principals, as to the liability of the plaintiffs to William R. Duff, and it was their duty, as such principals, to secure and protect their sureties. The assignment of the balance due on the judgment for that purpose was proper and valid, and should be sustained accordingly. It is urged, that the Knoxes are attempting to save themselves from their liability upon the money judgment rendered in the action for specific performance, through the complainants, by means of their assignment. If such should prove to be the case, we do not see what difference it can make as to the rights of the parties in this action. If the Knoxes have a just demand, which is an equitable set-off to the judgment held against them by William R. Duff, what rule of equity is violated by allowing them, or their sureties for them, to maintain an action for that purpose? If William R. Duff is not the real owner of the judgment against the Knoxes, but is the mere trustee for Ryan and J. R. Duff, who are the beneficial owners, he is not injured in any way by the set-off; and the latter are not injured, for the judgment is applied in payment of an equal amount justly due from them, which is the object sought to be accomplished by a set-off. Indeed, we are not sure that if the Knoxes had not assigned the judgment to the plaintiffs, but still held it, the latter could apply to a Court of Equity to compel a set-off, to relieve them from the payment of their liability. That, however, is a question not before us. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present case, to say, that the assignment was for a proper and valid purpose, and made upon a good and sufficient consideration.

It is also urged, that Josephi purchased the judgment against the plaintiffs in good faith, and for a good and valuable consideration, and is therefore entitled to protection against the claim to set-off. This judgment, which was rendered August 23d, 1860, was assigned by Wm. R. Duff to one Sharp, March 10th, 1862, and Sharp assigned the same to Josephi, March 12th, 1862. But the judgment claimed as a set-off by the plaintiffs was assigned to their principals, the Knoxes, May 9th, 1858, and was assigned by them to Goddard, May 10th, 1860, and by him to the other plaintiffs June 19th, 1860; so that the right of set-off claimed by the plaintiffs existed at the date of the judgment against them, and the subsequent assignees of that judgment took the same subject to the right of set-off. (Pr. Act, Sec. 5; McCabe v. Grey, 20 Cal. 509; Wright v. Levy, 12 Id. 257.) But Josephi cannot justly claim that he is a purchaser without notice of this claim of set-off asserted by the plaintiffs. As assignee of the judgment, he is deemed to have notice of all matters disclosed by the record and proceedings in the action in which the judgment was rendered. The record in that action discloses the fact of this claim of set-off, which the plaintiffs in this action attempted to use as a defense to that action; but the Court in that case ruled it out as a defense, on the ground that that action was strictly at law, and the defense did not come within the provisions of Sec. 47 of the Practice Act. (Duff v. Hobbs, 19 Cal. 646.) The Court in that case, however, did not hold that the plaintiffs had no remedy in equity. The defendant Josephi, therefore, had full notice of the equitable claim of set-off of the plaintiff, and he cannot, therefore, claim the rights of a bona fide purchaser in this action.

The appellants also contend that the complaint is defective, as it does not allege that the Knoxes are insolvent, or that they are not able to repay to the plaintiffs the amount they may be compelled to pay as sureties. It is the insolvency of Ryan and J. R. Duff, the persons who owe the debt claimed by the plaintiffs as a set-off, and not that of the Knoxes, that is the material question upon this point. Their insolvency is averred, and does not seem to be disputed. It is the fact that they are the real owners of the judgment against the plaintiffs; that they are insolvent, and therefore the only means of collecting the judgment due from them to the plaintiffs is by the set-off, that forms one of the chief grounds for the interference of a Court of Equity. The parties named in the record of these two judgments are not the same, and therefore a Court of Common Law jurisdiction cannot make the set-off; but a Court of Equity will look beyond the nominal to the real parties in interest, and adjudicate the rights of the parties accordingly. The interposition of a trustee will not prevent a Court of Equity from reaching his cestuis que trusts, when all the parties are before it, and compel them and the trustee to allow a set-off, even though such relief could not be granted by a Common Law Court. A Court of Equity will not permit cestuis que trusts, who are insolvent, to enforce and collect, through their trustee, a judgment against parties who hold a just and valid demand against them, which they have no means of enforcing or collecting if a set-off is denied. (Walker v. Sedgwick, 8 Cal. 405; Russell v. Conway, 11 Id. 98; Naglee v. Palmer, 7 Id. 543; Howard v. Shores, 20 Id. 277.)

The next point of the appellants is, that the plaintiffs are estopped from showing that Ryan and J. R. Duff are the real owners of the money due on the judgment against them, by the judgment in the action for a specific performance brought by Wm. R. Duff against Fisher and the Knoxes. An examination of the record in that case shows, that no question of that kind was raised by the pleadings, and no judicial determination of the point raised in this action was had in that. The plaintiffs in this action could not be barred from setting up this fact as the foundation of their right of action, unless it was clearly shown that the same matter was in issue in the former action and adjudicated by the Court therein. No such adjudication being shown, the plaintiffs are not estopped by the decree in that case.

It appears, that after the assignment of the judgment in the foreclosure suit by the Knoxes to Goddard, the latter issued execution thereon and had it levied upon a mill in Humboldt County. Wm. R. Duff brought suit against him and the Sheriff to enjoin the sale, on the ground that he was the owner of the mill, and that the execution defendants, Ryan, J. R. Duff, and others, had no interest in it. Goddard answered, denying these averments of the complaint, and alleging that the execution defendants were the beneficial owners of the mill. The action does not appear to have been defended by Goddard any further than filing the answer, and the plaintiff recovered judgment therein; and the appellants insist that the plaintiffs are also estopped by this judgment from showing that Wm. R. Duff is the trustee of Ryan and J. R. Duff, of the judgment against the plaintiffs, or that they are the real owners thereof. The subject matter of that action was the mill, and not the debt due or the judgment rendered on the appeal bond. The two are entirely separate and distinct matters, and a judgment settling the question, as to the ownership of the mill, cannot in any way determine the question as to who is the real owner of this judgment against the plaintiffs. This point is therefore untenable.

But, it is insisted, that they are also estopped from showing the same facts by the judgment rendered against them on the appeal bond, because in that action they set up the same matters alleged in this suit, as a ground of set-off or counter claim. The record, however, shows that the Court in that action excluded all evidence tending to show that Ryan and J. R. Duff were the real owners of the amount due on the appeal bond, and the action of the Court below was sustained by this Court for the reasons before stated. (Duff v. Hobbs, 19 Cal. 646.) It was then held that these matters could not be adjudicated in that action. The record shows that they were not adjudicated, and it follows that the judgment therein cannot be pleaded or claimed as an estoppel in this action. Although a Court of Law declines to determine a question of set-off, yet it is not res judicata, so as to preclude an inquiry in a Court of Equity. (Hackett v. Connett, 2 Edw. Ch. 78.)

The next position is, that the rules of set-off are the same in equity as at law. It is true, that Courts of Law and Equity follow the same general doctrines on the subject of set-off; but where some equity intervenes, independent of the fact of mutual unconnected debts, Courts of Equity will take jurisdiction, and determine the matter upon the principles of natural equity. And when the law could not give a proper remedy, as in case of the insolvency of one of the parties, equity will afford relief. (Barb. on Set-Off, 190; Lindsay v. Jackson, 2 Paige, 581.) The demands in this case are judgments, and the aid of a Court of Equity is invoked because the defendants in one of the judgments are insolvent, and the plaintiff in the other is not the real party in interest, but a trustee for the insolvent defendants in the other judgments. Each of these facts forms a ground for applying to a Court of Equity, and entitles the plaintiffs to equitable relief. On a complaint filed to set off one judgment or decree against another, the jurisdiction of a Court of Chancery is more extensive than that of Common Law Courts. In equity, a set-off in such cases is a matter of right, and not of discretion, and it depends, not upon the Statutes of Set-Off, but upon the equitable jurisdiction of the Court over its suitors. (Barb. on Set-Off, 194.) And the set-off will be allowed as between the real parties in interest, regardless of a nominal party. (O'Conner v. Murphy, 1 H. Blackstone, 657.) A person who holds a claim as a trustee, cannot have it set off against a demand due from him in his own right. (Fair v. McIver, 16 East, 130.) And upon the same principle, we think it clear that a set-off should be made in equity as between the real parties in interest, even though one of the judgments is in the name of a trustee who holds for the use and benefit of such real parties. (Wolf v. Beales, 6 S. & R. 242; Barb. on Set-Off, 61, 71-73.) In other words, the Court will decree a set-off as between the real owners or persons beneficially interested in the several demands. (Russell v. Conway, 11 Cal. 93.)

Another position taken by the appellants is, that Fisher should have pleaded the balance due on the judgment of foreclosure, as a set-off against the damages in the action brought by Wm. R. Duff against him and the Knoxes for a specific performance; and not having done so, the plaintiffs claiming under him are estopped or barred from maintaining this action. If he had so pleaded it in that suit, it would probably have been held, that the Court could not entertain the defense or allow the set-off in that action, on the same grounds that it was ruled out in the subsequent action of Duff v. Hobbs (19 Cal. 646). But independent of that, it is clear that a party does not lose his right to bring a separate action for a demand which he might have pleaded as a set-off, but neglected to do. (Barb. on Set-Off, 21.)

It is also insisted that the action is barred by the Statute of Fowler v. Harbin.

Limitations, it having been commenced on the seventeenth day of March, 1862, and the judgment which the plaintiffs seek to set off having been rendered September 17th, 1857. This is substantially "an action upon a judgment or decree," and is therefore governed by Sec. 17 instead of Sec. 19 of the Statute of Limitations, as claimed by the appellants. The action having been brought within five years from the date of the decree, it is not barred by the statute. We have thus examined all the questions raised by the appellants, and find no error in the action of the Court below.

The order granting the injunction is therefore affirmed.

Whitman and Curry for Respondent.

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. A decree was originally rendered against the mortgagor alone, and the property was purchased at the sale under the decree by one Boggs, who, having discovered that the mortgagee had conveyed the premises to other persons before the commencement of the foreclosure suit, brought an action against the plaintiffs to recover back the purchase money paid by him. That action came before this Court on appeal, and will be found reported under the name of Boggs v. Hargrave (16 Cal. 559), in which it was held that he had no right of action. Boggs then applied to the Court in this action to set aside the judgment and decree of foreclosure, and for leave to file a supplemental complaint, setting forth the facts, and making new parties of subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers. Leave was granted, and he accordingly filed his supplemental complaint, making numerous new parties defendants. The new parties appeared, or were duly served and defaulted, and a new decree of foreclosure was finally rendered, from which the defendants appeal. No statement on appeal, or grounds of appeal, appear in the record, nor have any assignments of error been filed in this Court, nor have the appellants filed any brief in the case. The respondents have filed a motion to dismiss the appeal on these grounds.

The motion is sustained, and the appeal is ordered to be dismissed.

THE PEOPLE v. COLMERE.

Where one charged with crime has been arrested and held to answer for the offense before the impanelling of the grand jury by which an indictment is found against him, he cannot move to set aside the indictment on the ground that the grand jurors who found the same had formed and expressed an opinion that he was guilty of the offense charged, prior to their being impaneled.

Quere? Does that provision of the Criminal Practice Act which provides, that the trial jury shall "at each adjournment of the Court" be admonished by the Court, that it is their duty not to converse among themselves, or with any one else, on any subject connected with the trial, or to form or express any opinion thereon until the case is finally submitted to them, apply to a temporary recess?

If, during the trial of a criminal action, the Court, before an adjournment, neglect to charge the jury, as required by Sec. 394 of the Criminal Practice Act, the judgment for that reason will not be reversed, unless it is shown, that the defendant sustained some injury thereby, by the jurors conversing among themselves or with others on subjects connected with the trial, or by forming or expressing an opinion thereon, during the adjournment.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Alexander Campbell and S. H. Dwinelle, for Appellant.

[No brief on file.]

CROCKER, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — NORTON, J. concurring.

The defendant was indicted for the crime of murder, and was convicted of murder in the first degree. After the indictment was found, and when he was called upon to plead to it, he moved to set it aside on the alleged ground that the grand jurors, who found the indictment, had formed and expressed an opinion that he was guilty of the offense charged, prior to their being impaneled; and that prior to the finding of the indictment he had not been held to answer for the offense. He offered witnesses to prove the alleged bias of the grand jurors, but the prosecution interposed proof of the fact that he had been held to answer to the charge before the impanneling of the grand jury, and objected to all evidence upon the subject. This objection was sustained by the Court below, and the evidence offered by the defendant was accordingly excluded, and this is now assigned as error.

The record shows, that he was duly held to answer to the crime charged in the indictment on the tenth day of April, 1862; that the grand jury who found the indictment were impaneled on the twenty-ninth day of April, and the indictment was found on the thirtieth day of May, 1862. The case, therefore, comes clearly within the one hundred and eighty-ninth section of the Criminal Practice Act, which is as follows: "A person held to answer to a charge for a public offense can take advantage of any objection to the panel, or to an individual grand juror, in no other mode than that by challenge, as prescribed in the preceding section." The preceding sections provide specifically the mode, manner, and causes of such challenges to the panel and to individual jurors. It was the duty of the defendant to exercise this right of challenge in the mode and manner prescribed by the Criminal Practice Act, and having failed to do so, he could not, under the provisions of Sec. 189, claim the right to interpose objections which would have been a proper ground of challenge at any other time or in any other mode. The objections raised in the present case are included within the grounds of challenge specified in the act. It follows, that there was no error in this action of the Court. (People v. Beattie, 14 Cal. 571; People v. Arnold, 15 Id. 479.)

It appears that on the third day of the trial, after several adjournments had been had, at which the jury had been duly admonished of their duty, as required by Sec. 394 of the Criminal Practice Act, the Court took a short recess about the middle of the day, and the jury commenced retiring without the usual charge. Nine were, however, called back immediately, and were duly admonished—but the other three were not present thereat, and the defendant excepted to the charging of a portion of the jurors in the absence of the others. This action of the Court is also assigned as error. Sec. 394 provides, that the jury shall, “at each adjournment of the Court,” be admonished by the Court, that it is their duty not to converse among themselves, or with any one else, on any subject connected with the trial, or to form or express any opinion thereon, until the case is finally submitted to them. It is doubtful whether this applies to a mere temporary recess, where there is no actual adjournment of the Court. No attempt was made to show that any injury to the defendant resulted from this action of the Court, and we think it clearly comes within the rule laid down by this Court, in cases of a similar character, that they form no just ground for ordering a new trial. (People v. Boggs, 20 Cal. 432; People v. Symonds, 22 Id. 348.) This objection is, therefore, overruled. After a careful examination of the whole case we find no irregularity or error which will justify this Court in granting a new trial.

The judgment is, therefore, affirmed, and the Court below is directed to fix a time for carrying the judgment into execution.

CAMDEN v. VAIL et al.

A MORTGAGE, executed by a married woman on real estate, without the signature of her husband, is void and cannot be enforced.

The equitable lien which a vendor of real estate, after an absolute conveyance, has, for the unpaid purchase money, is waived by the taking of a mortgage to secure the same, although the mortgage is void and cannot be enforced.

APPEAL from the District Court, Ninth Judicial District, County of Shasta.

On the first day of October, 1860, J. H. Robinson sold to E. M. C. Vail a hotel at Shasta, and executed and delivered to her a deed therefor. She was at the time the wife of the defendant in this action, G. S. C. Vail. For a part of the purchase money, she executed to him the mortgage to foreclose which this action is brought. The Court below rendered the usual decree for a sale of the mortgaged premises. The defendants G. C. S. Vail and Crosby appealed.

Camden v. Vail.

Garter and Crocker & Robinson, for Appellants.

The mortgage was the separate contract of the wife, and the husband cannot be sued upon it. (George v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322; Meyer v. Kinzer & Wife, 12 Id. 247.) The property was her separate estate. (Morrison v. Wilson & Wife, 13 Cal. 494.) And the wife could not mortgage the property so as to create a lien upon it for herself or for her husband. (Harrison v. Brown, 16 Cal. 287.)

But the case of Meyer v. Kinzer & Wife (12 Cal. 247) entirely refutes the idea that the wife was the agent of the husband (Vail) in the purchase and mortgaging of the estate in question. The wife took the deed in her own name, mortgaged it in her own name as her act and deed, and acknowledged it as her own deed.

But without the proper showing by the pleadings, or proof on the trial, that the wife bought the property with her own separate means, under the other circumstances of this case, the law would not sustain the theory of an agency, but would establish a community in the property between the husband and the wife. (Meyer v. Kinzer & Wife, 12 Cal. 247; Harrison v. Brown, 16 Id. 287.)

And if the property mortgaged was the common property of the husband and the wife, then the wife could not dispose of it in any manner. (Wood's Dig. 487; Act of April, 1850, Secs. 2-9.)

If the property was the separate estate of the wife, she failed to comply with the law, and the mortgage is of no effect. In such case, the husband must join with the wife in the deed. (Wood's Dig. 488, Sec. 6.)

W. H. Rhodes, for Respondent.

We contend that this hotel property, having been deeded to defendant Vail's wife during the coverture, is common property, liable to his debts and subject to his sole disposition. All property acquired by either spouse after marriage, except such as may be acquired either by gift, grant, or devise, is common property, and subject to the exclusive control of the husband, no matter in whose name the title is vested. The fact that the title was taken in the wife's name raises no presumption even of separate estate. (Schmidt's Civil L., 12, Arts. 43, 51, 63; Tryon v. Sutton, 18 Cal. 490; Pixley v. Huggins, 15 Id. 127; Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Id. 247; Kohner v. Ashenauer, 17 Id. 581.)

Camden v. Vail.

All the papers executed at the same time are to be construed together and in law are but one instrument. Hence, the estate passed to the husband, and the wife's note and mortgage are to be taken as executed by him. (Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 577; 4 Kent's Com. 173, 6th Ed.; Lassen v. Vance, 8 Cal. 271.)

COPE, J. delivered the opinion of the Court — FIELD, C. J. and NORTON, J. concurring.

This is an action to foreclose a mortgage, which the complaint avers was given by the defendant Vail "in the name and under the signature and seal" of his wife. It is averred that Vail purchased the mortgaged property of one Robinson, taking the conveyance in the name of his wife, and that the mortgage was given to secure the payment of a portion of the purchase money. The plaintiff claims by assignment from Robinson, and alleges that the property has been conveyed by Vail and wife to the defendant Crosby, but that the conveyance was fraudulent and without consideration. The only answer in the case is that of Vail, which denies any connection on his part with the purchase or the mortgage, and avers that the purchase was made and the mortgage given by his wife on her own account. Crosby, by failing to answer admits the matters charged, so far as he is concerned, and the facts are found by the Court in accordance with the allegations of the complaint.

The first point made is, that Mrs. Vail is a necessary party; but in the view we take of the case this point is not material, as we are of opinion that the mortgage cannot be enforced. It is unnecessary to go into the question of the effect of the conveyance from Robinson; for whatever its effect may have been, it is evident that the mortgage is inoperative. So far as Mrs. Vail is concerned, it is admitted that she had no power to execute it in her own behalf, and it is clear that its execution cannot be regarded as the act of her husband. The averment that it was made by him states that it was made in her name and that the signature and seal are hers, and the mortgage purports throughout to be her act and deed. It is not pretended that he signed it, using her name in place of his own, and the certificate of acknowledgment shows that it was in fact signed by her. To say that he made it, is to say that which cannot by any possibility be so.

The right of the plaintiff to enforce a vendor's lien is settled by the case of Baum v. Grigsby (21 Cal. 172).

Judgment reversed and cause remanded.

The above case was decided at the April Term, 1863, before Mr. Justice CHOCKER went on to the bench. A rehearing was granted, and the decision on the rehearing was rendered by the new Court, after the amendments to the Constitution went into effect, at the January Term, 1864. The opinion on the rehearing does not conflict with the law as here laid down, and will be published in the 24th volume of Cal. Reports.—RMR.

BARTON RICKETSON v. MANUEL TORRES, EXECUTOR OF WM. A. RICHARDSON, DECEASED, SAMUEL R. THROCKMORTON, CHARLES SPENCER COMPTON, DONALD DAVIDSON, BENJAMIN DAVIDSON, WILLIAM HOOD, J. MORA MOSS, CHARLES MEYER, WILLIAM BENNETT, ALEXANDER MATTHISON, DAVID JARDINE, JOSEPH JARDINE, ALEXANDER G. DALLAS, ALEXANDER C. MACLANE, WALKER COMSTOCK.

When a notice of appeal to the Supreme Court is signed by an attorney of the Court, the presumption is that he had authority to take such action.

The fact that an appellant has resided out of the State several years, is no ground for denying him the right to appeal from a judgment rendered against him. It is no proper ground for a motion to dismiss an appeal, that it is sham and frivolous. An appeal is a matter of right, and cannot be defeated because the appeal may be groundless.

When a party is made a defendant in an action, and a decree taken against him, from which he appeals, the appeal will not be dismissed because he has no interest in the subject matter of the suit, and ought not to have been made a party.

Ricketson v. Compton.

When an appeal is taken from a judgment, and the judgment is reversed by the Supreme Court, with directions to the Court below to enter a judgment in accordance with the opinion, and the Court below renders judgment accordingly, from which a second appeal is taken, the second appeal will not be dismissed, on motion, for said reasons, but they may be good grounds for affirming the judgment.

No appeal lies from an order entering a default; and where a default for not answering is entered several years before final judgment, the defendant may still appeal from the final judgment at any time within one year from its rendition, and have the question, whether the default was properly entered or not, adjudicated upon the appeal from the judgment.

APPEAL from the District Court of the Seventh Judicial District, Marin County.

The principal facts of this case will be found reported in the case of Ricketson v. Richardson (19 Cal. 330).

After the reversal of the judgment the case was retried in the Court below, and on the fifth day of March, 1862, a decree was rendered in favor of plaintiff. This decree commences as follows:

"This cause having been duly brought on upon the motion of Gregory Yale, attorney for the plaintiff for a decree in pursuance of the opinion and decision of the Supreme Court of the State at the October Term thereof, 1861, as certified in the mandate or remittitur from the said Court heretofore filed in this cause, reversing the decree of this Court in this cause at the July Term, 1861, and directing a decree to be entered up in pursuance of the principles of said opinion and decision, and due notice of said motion having been given and default having been heretofore entered against all the defendants who have not answered, and due proof of filing of notice of the pendency and object of this action in the office of the Recorder of the County of Marin, and of the recording of the same in said Recorder's office: and it appearing to the Court, from the affidavit of S. W. Daggett, that there is due to the plaintiff, on the third day of March, 1862, for principal and interest upon the debt and mortgage mentioned and set forth in the complaint, the sum of forty-three thousand eight hundred and forty-five dollars and seventy-one cents ($43,845.71), which sum is to draw and bear interest at the rate of three and one-half per cent. per month from the date hereof until paid." The decree then directed a sale of the mortgaged property and the application of the proceeds, etc., in the usual form.

There was no personal judgment against any of the defendants except Manuel Torres, executor of Richardson. As to the other defendants, the decree barred and foreclosed them from all equity of redemption, and claim of, in, and to the mortgaged premises, and every part thereof, from and after the delivery of the Sheriff's deed. From this decree the defendant Charles S. Compton alone appealed. Compton had not been served personally with summons, but service was had on him by publication of summons. The notice of appeal was served on the thirteenth day of February, 1863.

The following is a copy of the notice of appeal:

"In the District Court of the Seventh Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the County of Marin.

"BARTON RICKETSON v. W. A. RICHARDSON et als. — You will please take notice that Charles S. Compton, one of the defendants in the above entitled action, hereby appeals to the Supreme Court of this State from the decree therein made and entered in the said District Court, on the fifth day of March, A. D. 1862, in favor of said Barton Ricketson against said defendant, and from the whole thereof.

"Dated San Francisco, this twelfth day of February, A. D. 1863.

"HALL McALLISTER,

"Attorney for Appellant."

The only averments in the complaint concerning the appellant Compton were: "That he had, or claimed to have, some interest in or claim upon the mortgaged premises, which interest or claim was adverse to the plaintiff's, or subsequent and subject thereto."

The respondent, Ricketson, moved to dismiss the appeal upon the following notice:

Supreme Court, State of California.

Take notice, that a motion will be made in this Court to dismiss the appeal taken by Charles S. Compton, one of the defendants, on the twelfth day of February last from the decree of the Seventh Judicial District Court, County of Marin, entered on the fifth day of March, 1862, in favor of the plaintiff.

And that the grounds of the said motion will be:

1. That the defendant Compton did not take the appeal.
2. That you have no authority to use his name in taking the appeal.
3. That he has been absent from the State some seven or eight years and has left no one with authority to take such an appeal.
4. That the said appeal is sham and frivolous, and intended to delay the execution of the decree appealed from, and to embarrass the title of the purchaser at the sale under said decree.
5. That the said Compton has no interest in said decree, or to the premises foreclosed by it, immediate or proximate.
6. That the said Compton was an unnecessary party to said foreclosure suit, having no interest in the premises at the commencement of the action on the eighteenth day of February, 1856.
7. That the said Compton, prior to said action, had assigned all the interest which he held as mortgagee of the said Richardson to said defendants Benjamin Davidson, Hood, and Walkinshaw, who were active partners to the said action, and litigated the same.
8. That the said Compton, prior to said action, had conveyed all his right, title, and interest to said premises to the said Hood, one of the defendants, an actual party and litigant.
9. That the said Compton and the said Donald Davidson, as copartners and tenants in common, had assigned the mortgages which they held on said rancho prior to the said action, and conveyed all their right, title, and interest to the premises absolutely and unconditionally.

Ricketson v. Compton.

10. That all the claim and interest in and to said mortgaged premises ever held or claimed by the said Compton, or by the said Compton and Davidson, have been in and by said foreclosure action and the decree therein, and by the decree in this Court, fully and finally adjudicated, as represented by their said assigns.

11. That an appeal was prosecuted to this Court by the defendants in said cause from the decree of the March Term, 1861, and that decree reversed, and that of March, 1862, entered as the decree of this Court under the mandate from this Court.

12. That no appeal could be taken from the decree of March, 1862.

13. That an appeal was actually taken by the defendants from said decree of March 5th, 1862, and the decree affirmed in all respects by this Court.

14. That the said Compton, as an individual defendant, cannot now take another appeal from said decree of the fifth of March, 1862, and especially as all the interest which he ever had, or claimed in said mortgaged premises, was fully litigated and adjudicated by his assigns.

15. That on the twenty-fourth day of November, 1857, at a regular term of the District Court of the County of Marin, a default was taken against the said Compton for want of an answer, after due proof of service by publication, and that the said decree of default still remains of record and of force in said Court, and never has been appealed from, and which said default was final as to the said Compton, at that date, and has been ever since.

16. And upon other and divers good and sufficient grounds.

Gregory Yale, for Respondent Ricketson.

On the hearing of the motion to dismiss the appeal, respondent introduced the entire transcript on the first appeal, and also the decree from which the second appeal was taken.

Respondent also offered the following affidavit:

Seventh Judicial District, County of Marin: Barton Ricketson, v. Wm. A. Richardson et al.:— City and County of San Francisco, State of California, ss.—Ed. F. Stone, being duly sworn, deposes and says: that he is the agent for the plaintiff in this case, and is a member of the firm of Morgan, Stone & Co., trading in San Francisco; that the plaintiff resides in the City of New Bedford, Massachusetts, and is now absent from this State; that he was acquainted with the firm of Compton & Davidson, composed of Charles Spencer Compton and Donald Davidson, when in business in 1853-54 in San Francisco; that said firm became insolvent, and was dissolved in 1854 or 1855; that the said Compton left the State in 1855, and has not since returned; that the said Davidson left the State in 1855 or 1856, and returned in 1858, and is now in San Francisco; that the said Compton & Davidson were the agents of the said William A. Richardson, and succeeded William P. Avis in that capacity, and were acting under a power of attorney revoked in 1855; that they held mortgages from Richardson and from Richardson and wife, on the Saucelito and Albion ranches and on other property, and had judgments against Richardson subsequently, included in said mortgages; that money was borrowed by them from Benj. Davidson and his partner in business, Julius May, of San Francisco, on their individual note, and on short time without security, and they also borrowed money from Robert Walkinshaw, now deceased, and represented in this case by his son-in-law and executor, John Young; that they also borrowed money from William Hood, a defendant in this case; that long after the maturity of the note to Davidson & May, and when they became insolvent, the said Compton & Davidson assigned certain portions of said mortgages to the said B. Davidson in consideration of said debt, and obtained an actual and absolute release of said debt; and that they also made assignments to the said Walkinshaw and Hood, and an absolute deed of all their interest in said property to said Hood, and obtained releases also from them in consideration of said loans. To all which the said D. Davidson has substantially testified in this case, and this affiant refers to the deposition of the said Davidson and exhibits thereto, and the deposition of the said Benjamin Davidson — all contained in the statement on appeal in this case — for greater particularity, and as fully verifying this statement.

Ricketson v. Compton.

And this affiant further says: that he is informed and believes that at the time the said Compton left this State, he left a general power of attorney with one A. J. Macpherson, now in San Francisco, having reference to the late commercial transactions of the said Compton as an individual member of said firm, and having no reference to the agency of the said Richardson which had then been revoked, or to any interest in the mortgaged premises; that at the time he left, he claimed none, and does not now claim any; that the said Davidson does not claim any interest and did not answer though personally served; and that the said power of attorney has long since been considered and treated by the said Macpherson and the said Compton as abrogated and annulled. But this affiant is informed and believes that the said Macpherson now moves this appeal in the name of said Compton, under the pretense of authority under said power and in behalf of the defendant Throckmorton and other parties, conspiring to defeat this plaintiff and to prevent him from the collection of his judgment. This affiant further says: that the said Macpherson was a witness for the said Throckmorton in this case, at the November Term, 1859, and gave his deposition early in December, and which deposition is hereby referred to as contained in the transcript on appeal; that at that term a default was regularly taken against the said Compton, and is still of record; that the said Macpherson did not pretend to act for the said Compton at the time, nor has he interposed any defense, or attempted to open said default; that the assignees of the said Compton & Davidson have been actual parties to this suit in all its stages since 1856 to 1863, and have litigated with the plaintiff on all questions in the case. And this affiant is informed and believes, and so insists, that this appeal is a sham or false appeal, intended and calculated to vex, hinder, and harass the plaintiff, in the collection of his mortgage debt; and that the said Macpherson is the tool or instrument used by the said Throckmorton, Parrott, May, Hood, and others, for that purpose.

ED. F. STONE.

The Appellant introduced in reply the following affidavit:

Ricketson v. Compton.

In the Supreme Court, State of California.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
City and County of San Francisco. } ss.

Barton Ricketson, Plaintiff, v. William A. Richardson et al., Defendants.

Alexander W. Macpherson, of aforesaid city and county, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That on the day of A. D. 1855, Charles S. Compton, one of the above-named defendants, and appellant herein, executed and delivered to deponent his (Compton's) certain general power of attorney. That under and by virtue of said power, deponent has from said date been acting, and does still act, as attorney in fact of said Compton; that said power of attorney has never been revoked, and is now in full force, and that deponent has never treated said power of attorney as abrogated or annulled, but considers the same as in full force and effect. That under said power of attorney, deponent employed Hall McAllister, an attorney at law, residing in the City and County of San Francisco, for and on behalf of the said Charles S. Compton, to prosecute an appeal in this cause.

In regard to the interest of the said Charles S. Compton in the premises, deponent states, that one William A. Richardson and wife executed to the said Compton and one Donald Davidson, three several mortgages upon the property set forth and described in the complaint; one dated October 13th, 1853, another February 1st, 1854, and the third, March 21st, 1854, which said three several mortgages are particularly referred to and described in the plaintiff's brief, on motion to dismiss herein. That said mortgages were made to secure various large sums of money advanced by appellant and said Davidson to said Richardson and wife. That subsequently thereto, said Compton, to secure certain money borrowed by him from one Benjamin Davidson, and one Robert Walkinshaw, assigned said mortgages to said Benjamin Davidson, and said Robert Walkinshaw.

That subsequent to said assignments, and to secure one William Hood for moneys due him by said Compton, said Compton assigned to said Hood the balance of his interest in aforesaid three mortgages from Richardson and wife, by two assignments, the one dated November 31st, 1854, and the other July 26th, 1856, which said assignments are particularly referred to in plaintiff's brief on motion to dismiss herein. Deponent states, on information and belief, that said Compton has never executed a deed transferring absolutely his interest in said mortgages from Richardson and wife to said William Hood, but that any and every deed, of whatever kind or nature, made by said Compton to said Hood, were executed to secure the aforesaid sums of money due by said Compton to said Hood, specially reserving to himself (said Compton), the overplus arising from the sale of said mortgaged premises after the payment of all of said assignments to Davidson, Walkinshaw, and Hood.

Deponent further says, that if the aforesaid mortgages of Richardson and wife were paid, said Compton would receive a sum of money more than sufficient to pay all the above-named assignments to Davidson, Walkinshaw, and Hood, and have left a large amount of money; and that said Compton has a valuable interest in the event and issue of this suit.

A. W. MACPHERSON.

GEO. T. KNOX, Notary Public.

Gregory Yale, for Respondent.

[No brief on file.]

Hall McAllister, for Appellant.

The motion in this case, made by the counsel for respondent, is one extraordinary in its nature, and almost without precedent. It is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken by Mr. Compton, appellant, based upon sixteen grounds. Surely in number, but only in number, formidable. For among them we see nothing stated upon which a motion of this character can be based, with any hope of success.

It is not alleged that the appeal was not taken in time; that any of the requisite steps for perfecting an appeal, in serving notices, filing papers, giving undertakings, etc. (see Practice Act, § 346, Rule III, of this Court), have been omitted.

It is stated — 1st, that Compton did not take the appeal; 2d, that you (we) have no authority to use his (Compton's) name; 3d, that Compton has been absent from the State some seven or eight years, and has left no one with authority to take such appeal.

These may be dismissed by saying, that they are matters which do not appear in the transcript; they are facts dehors the record, and are attempted to be shown by respondent on affidavit; but the counter affidavit, which we file herein in opposition to the motion, is in full and direct denial of these statements, and upon that we can safely rest.

The fourth ground is, "that the said appeal is sham and frivolous, and intends to delay the execution of the decree appealed from, and to embarrass the title of the purchaser at the sale under such deed. For argument's sake, let this be admitted to be true; how does it affect this appeal? What ground does it furnish the respondent to move for dismissal? What has this Court to do with the intention of appellant? Appeals are not matters of grace, but of right. No statute authorizes an appeal on motion to be dismissed because frivolous or sham, as in the case of a motion to strike out pleadings.

Says Cowen, J. in Dey v. Walton (2 Hill, 405): "It is insisted, however, that the facts stated show the appeal to be frivolous, intended merely to awe the complainant into a settlement, and, indeed, that the appeal has been waived. With the ground of frivolousness, we of course have nothing to do at this stage of the cause. An appeal either from an interlocutory or final decree, is a matter of right on making the deposit, or giving the security required by the statute. * * * Nor have we any right to inquire into the intent with which the appeal was brought."

If, on the final hearing and determination of this appeal, it shall appear that the "same was made for delay, the Court may add to the costs such damages as may be just." (Practice Act, Sec. 345.) It is here that respondent may find relief, not in the method he has chosen.

 Ricketson v. Compton.

Charles S. Compton has had a decree of Court entered against him by which his rights and interests are sought to be forever terminated and adjudged. The consequence is, he appeals to the Court, and on the hearing of the appeal, will show that the Court below had no jurisdiction as against him. He has a right to this, and to urge that this appeal is, in its nature, frivolous—in itself, of all things most frivolous. (Schloss v. White, 16 C. 65.)

Of course, the question on the merits is not to be argued here so long as it does not clearly and affirmatively appear that there is no merit in the appeal, the Court will grant no motion to dismiss. (Vide Rogers v. Hosack, 5 Hill, 522, 523.)

The fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth grounds upon which the motion is to rest, are all to the same effect, though stated in different phraseology, to wit: That this appellant, Compton, is not a necessary party to the action, and that he has not now, nor did he have at the commencement of the suit, any interest therein. Nothing of this, but quite the contrary, appears by the record. It is attempted to be shown by the affidavit of Stone. The affidavit on behalf of Compton, however, denies all this; shows affirmatively that he has an interest, and what that interest is—its kind and quality; this is sufficient, and more than sufficient. But how can it be alleged by this respondent (plaintiff) that Compton has no interest in the action—is not a necessary party to the suit? Look at the record answer. Over and over again, it appears that Compton has been treated as a necessary party, and a party interested. The complaint so treats him; the affidavit for publication of summons so regards him. It is there deposed, under oath, "that a good cause of action exists against all of said defendants; and that they are all, as deponent is informed and believes, necessary parties to said action."

The order of publication of summons affirms: "It appearing that a cause of action as described in the complaint exists against said defendants," one of whom is Compton, "and that they are necessary parties thereto," etc. In short, from the beginning to the end, Compton has been a declared and recognized party; and certainly is now, so far as the respondent can cause him to be.

Ricketson v. Compton.

The respondent is anxious to dismiss this appeal for the reason, that Compton is not a necessary party, and because he is not interested in the subject matter of the action; but no such anxiety has been manifested, for these reasons, to dismiss the suit as against Compton.

The tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth grounds, in so far as we can gather anything from them, proceed upon the idea that the entire matter is now adjudicated; that, therefore, no appeal can be taken.

If it were res adjudicata, how does it prevent an appeal?

We come back to what we have already advanced, that no motion to dismiss can be made upon such ground.

If between two parties a judgment is rendered, and the law is most clear and plain, so that there exists no doubt in regard to it, cannot that judgment be appealed from? It may be, that it is only for delay—only to gain a compromise—only to vex, harass, perhaps from malicious motives. These facts appearing, the Court may affirm the judgment with damages; but we have yet to learn, that they can dismiss it without hearing. (Dey v. Walton, 2 Hill, 405; Pinkham v. Wemple, 12 Cal. 449; 1 Labatt's Cal. Dig. 128, title 13, where all the cases are collated.)

We have to say, in conclusion, that the very fact, that so many grounds are made upon which to predicate a motion of dismissal, defeats it. Some of them are questions of law; some of them questions of fact; and yet others, mixed questions of law and fact.

Now, even in a motion to strike out a demurrer or answer, as frivolous, sham, intended to delay, etc., which is expressly provided for by statute, these facts must clearly and of themselves appear. If any argument is required, that of itself denies the motion, for the merits cannot be heard at such stage of the case.

If a practice is to be adopted of dismissing appeals on motion, where no express provision of the statute warrants it, it will doubtless conform in this respect to the law in regard to motions to strike out pleadings, and not permit the entire case to be reviewed, both as to law and facts.

We refer, particularly, to Rogers v. Hosack (5 Hill, 522). Chief Justice Nelson therein says: "By the fifty-second rule of the Su-made a party, the plaintiff ought not to have made him a party, and he should have dismissed the case as to him. But the plaintiff cannot hold a judgment against him, and at the same time deny him the right to appeal from that judgment. By admitting that the appellant had no interest in the subject matter, and that he ought not to have been a party, the respondent virtually admits that he is not entitled to any judgment against him, which would of itself form a good ground for the appeal.

The respondent also contends, that the appeal to this Court, in which the Court below was directed to enter a decree in accordance with the opinion of this Court, was taken by the defendants; that no appeal could be taken from the decree thus entered by the order of this Court; that an appeal was taken by the defendants from such decree, on which the decree was affirmed; and that this defendant cannot, therefore, take this appeal. These facts, if true, may form good grounds for affirming the judgment of the Court below — but they are no proper basis for a motion to dismiss the appeal. All these questions are proper to be considered in adjudicating the questions raised by the appeal; but cannot properly be brought before us in this mode.

I is also urged, that a default was duly entered against this defendant, in 1857; and that no appeal was ever taken from that default; and that, therefore, no appeal lies from the final judgment. We are not aware that any appeal lies from an order entering a default against a party; but even if the statute provided for such an appeal, the defendant, by failing to take such an appeal, does not lose or waive his right of appeal from the final judgment. Whether that default was properly entered, or not, is a question which he has a right to have adjudicated upon an appeal from the final judgment. These are all the grounds of the motion to dismiss; and none of them being sufficient, the motion to dismiss is overruled. No briefs being on file upon the merits of the appeal we do not pass upon it, but reserve it for future consideration.

Ricketson v. Compton.

made a party, the plaintiff ought not to have made him a party and he should have dismissed the case as to him. But the plaintiff cannot hold a judgment against him, and at the same time deny him the right to appeal from that judgment. By admitting that the appellant had no interest in the subject matter, and that he ought not to have been a party, the respondent virtually admits that he is not entitled to any judgment against him, which would of itself form a good ground for the appeal.

The respondent also contends, that the appeal to this Court, in which the Court below was directed to enter a decree in accordance with the opinion of this Court, was taken by the defendants; that no appeal could be taken from the decree thus entered by the order of this Court; that an appeal was taken by the defendants from such decree, on which the decree was affirmed; and that this defendant cannot, therefore, take this appeal. These facts, if true, may form good grounds for affirming the judgment of the Court below — but they are no proper basis for a motion to dismiss the appeal. All these questions are proper to be considered in adjudicating the questions raised by the appeal; but cannot properly be brought before us in this mode.

It is also urged, that a default was duly entered against the defendant, in 1857; and that no appeal was ever taken from the default; and that, therefore, no appeal lies from the final judgment. We are not aware that any appeal lies from an order entering a default against a party; but even if the statute provided for such an appeal, the defendant, by failing to take such an appeal, does not lose or waive his right of appeal from the final judgment. Whether that default was properly entered, or not, is a question which he has a right to have adjudicated upon an appeal from the final judgment. These are all the grounds of the motion to dismiss; and none of them being sufficient, the motion to dismiss is overruled. No briefs being on file upon the merits of the appeal, we do not pass upon it, but reserve it for future consideration.

INTRODUCTION.

THE Constitution of this State, adopted in 1849, provided for a Supreme Court, to consist of a Chief Justice and two Associate Justices. The jurisdiction of the Court was appellate, and was confined to cases where the matter in dispute exceeded two hundred dollars, or where the legality of any tax, toll, or impost, or municipal fine was in question, and to criminal cases amounting to felony. The Court also had power to issue writs of habeas corpus, and all other writs and process necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

For several years, the number of cases brought before the Court was not large, and the three Justices were able, with ease, to dispatch its business. The reports of all the cases determined for seven years, and up to the close of 1856, are contained in six volumes.

But few of the first emigrants to California came with the intention of making it their permanent residence; but little attention was therefore paid to the acquisition of any other property than gold. Gradually, however, they discovered that the mineral wealth of the State could not be exhausted, and that its valleys were fertile and productive. By degrees, they banished all thoughts of leaving, and began to look on the Pacific Coast as their permanent home. Then, lands were purchased and improved, and preparations were made for mining on a more extensive scale. Ditches were excavated, and the waters of the rivers were turned from their beds (to which mining had been at first confined) upon the summits of the mountains.

With the acquisition of permanent property came an increase of litigation. The character of this property, and the nature of the titles by which it was held, helped to swell the amount of this litigation. The larger part of the arable lands in the valleys was held under Spanish or Mexican grants. The boundaries of these grants were not accurately defined, and in many cases the grant was of a smaller tract of land, to be selected within the exterior boundaries of a much larger tract. A great number of these grants had passed from the hands of the original grantees. The sales were made sometimes in small quantities to individuals, sometimes of the entire tract to several persons at one time, and sometimes of undivided fractional parts to several different persons at different times. The lands were generally uninclosed, and the only possession of the purchasers was the constructive seizin arising from the acquisition of the legal title. An impression, too, prevailed that many of these grants were invalid or fraudulent. The result was that farmers settled upon such lands in many places in the hope either that the grant would be rejected or that its boundaries, when ascertained, would not include the land they occupied. All these causes were fruitful sources of law suits, not only among the owners themselves, but between the owners and occupants.

In all the mineral districts, where millions were expended in excavating ditches, and toll roads, and in other improvements of a permanent character, the General Government adopted the policy of withholding the lands from market, so that here the right of property rested on priority of occupancy or of appropriation. Conflict often arose between the different claimants of water upon the same streams about the priority of their respective rights, or the amount of water to which each was entitled. No provision was made by law for recording mining claims, but they were held under such local regulations or customs as the miners of a neighborhood or district might adopt. Here was another source of litigation, and the litigants seldom allowed their causes to rest without an appeal to the Court of last resort.

All these causes combined have brought into the Supreme Court for the last seven years a large number of causes. The principles involved were frequently novel; and when not new, their solution sometimes required an investigation of Spanish and Mexican law.

The Court had thrown upon it the labor not only of working out the intricacies in which titles to real estate had become involved, but also, in some measure, of elaborating a new system, suited to the peculiar condition of the mineral districts. The Court, as organized, was unable to dispose of the cases brought before it with the celerity which, particularly in new communities, is desirable.

The subject of amending the Constitution so as to reorganize the Supreme Court, and to accomplish some other needed reforms, after being for some time agitated, was entered upon in 1861. The Legislature of that year adopted amendments which were concurred in by the Legislature of 1862, and adopted by the people at the general election in 1862. The new Court provided for by these amendments consists of a Chief Justice and four Associate Justices. It has appellate jurisdiction in all cases in equity, and also in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, or in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars; also, in all cases arising in the Probate Courts; and also, in all criminal cases amounting to felony, on questions of law alone. The Court has power to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus, and also all writs necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction.

The jurisdiction of the new Court differs in several respects from that possessed by the old. The civil jurisdiction of the old Court was restricted to cases where the matter in dispute exceeded two hundred dollars, or where the legality of any tax, toll, or impost, or municipal fine, was in question. The jurisdiction of the new Court is restricted to cases where the amount in dispute exceeds three hundred dollars, but it also has jurisdiction in all cases in equity, and in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, regardless of the amount in controversy. The old Court could only issue the writ of habeas corpus and such writs and process as were necessary to the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction. The new Court possesses the same power, and also original jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus, certiorari, prohibition, and habeas corpus.

The first judicial election under the amended Constitution took place in the fall of 1863, and the Justices then elected entered upon the discharge of their duties on the first day of January, 1864.

The reports of all the cases passed upon by the old Court for the seven years ending December 31st, 1863, fill seventeen volumes, and end with the twenty-third. The present volume opens with the decisions of the new Court, and contains a report of the cases passed on at the January Term, and part of those decided at the April Term.

California being the first State organized on the Pacific Coast out of the territory acquired from Mexico, upon its Judiciary devolves the labor of settling and establishing many important principles not before discussed in English or American Courts. Our reports on such questions will undoubtedly be the precedent by which the young Territories and States now growing up will be guided. The present volume contains many important adjudications upon questions of this character, and also in relation to corporations, real estate titles, and constitutional law. The most important portions of briefs of counsel in these cases have been published, and the Court in its opinions has explored the whole field of judicial inquiry. A report of the decisions rendered during the year 1864 will fill three more volumes. It is my intention to give those volumes to the profession with all possible dispatch—if possible, before the close of the present year. The questions settled in the present and forthcoming volumes will go far to quiet that feverish anxiety which is always attendant upon uncertainty as to the rights of property, and will give to the legal profession landmarks which will enable it to avoid much of the litigation which has unavoidably resulted from the former unsettled state of affairs in California.

REPORTS OF CASES

DETERMINED IN

THE SUPREME COURT

JANUARY TERM, 1864.

THE PEOPLE v. JENKS.

CHALLENGES TO JURORS.—A defendant, on trial in a criminal action, may interpose a peremptory challenge to a juror, at any time after the appearance of the juror in the box and before he is sworn to try the case, until the whole number of peremptory challenges is exhausted.

Id.—RULE OF COURT.—The Court has no power to adopt a rule compelling a defendant in a criminal action to interpose his peremptory challenges to jurors at any particular time, for such rule would be clearly in conflict with the three hundred and forty-first section of the Criminal Practice Act.

Id.—AFTER JUROR IS SWORN.—After juror is sworn in a criminal case, it is the duty of the Court, upon good cause shown, to allow the defendant to use his peremptory challenges, until they are exhausted, at any time before the jury is completed.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions of Tuolumne County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Rodgers and Coffroth, for Appellant, cited sections three hundred and forty-one, three hundred and forty-two, and three hundred and sixty-one of the Criminal Practice Act, and People v. Kohle, 4th Cal. 198.

McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The case of The People v. Kohle would support the error assigned, if the facts were the same. But in this case, the Court at the outset informed defendant of the order and manner in which to make his challenges, and the Court must of necessity be vested with a reasonable discretion in determining the preliminaries of a criminal trial, even if not strictly in accordance with statutory provisions, or to make rules and orders in its discretion, to expedite trials, and if there is no abuse, there is no error. (People v. Stoncifer, 6 Cal. 409; People v. Sears, 18 Cal. 635; People v. Keenan, 18 Cal. 584; People v. Bonney, 19 Cal. 445.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of grand larceny.

We deem it unnecessary to notice more than one of the errors assigned by counsel for the appellant. The other errors, if they are such, will doubtless be avoided upon another trial.

After five jurors have been impanelled, the Court informed defendant's attorney "that he must exhaust all his challenges to the jury before accepting them, and that he would not be permitted to challenge afterward without assigning a sufficient reason therefor." To the rule thus prescribed by the Court counsel for the defendant excepted. The defendant's attorney then examined the remaining seven jurors for cause and passed them to the District Attorney, who expressed himself as satisfied with the jury. The Court then directed the Clerk to swear them to try the case. Thereupon counsel for defendant interposed a peremptory challenge to B. F. Gordon, one of the seven jurors last examined, and declined to assign any reason therefor except "his statutory right."

The People v. Jenks.

At the time this challenge was interposed the defendant had remaining six of the ten peremptory challenges allowed him by the statute. The Court refused to allow the challenge, and directed the Clerk to swear the jury, and Gordon was accordingly sworn as one of the jurors to try the case. To this ruling of the Court also the defendant's counsel excepted.

The refusal of the Court to allow the challenge in question was clearly erroneous. Under the provisions of the three hundred and forty-first section of the Criminal Practice Act, the defendant may peremptorily challenge a juror at any time after his appearance in the box and before he is sworn to try the case; and even after he is sworn, but before the jury is completed, it is enjoined upon the Court to permit it upon good cause shown. This plain and express provision of the statute cannot be contravened by any arbitrary rule of the Court; on the contrary, the security which the law humanely affords to the prisoner in criminal prosecutions, against public excitement and private animosity, ought in no degree to be impaired or diminished by any action on the part of the tribunal before which he is being tried. That the rule prescribed by the Court in this case might frequently operate to the prejudice of the defendant is apparent. Facts touching the competency of the juror might come to the knowledge of the defendant or his counsel after their acceptance and before the administration of the oath not known to them at the time he was accepted, which might materially affect their judgment upon the question of challenge. In such an event the defendant is not bound to disclose these facts to the Court and jury. There may be good and sufficient reasons why such a course might be prejudicial to his interests, and he may well claim the benefit of the challenge without assigning any reason therefor, as was done in the present case, except "his statutory right." A strict adherence to the rule prescribed by the statute can in no way operate to the disadvantage of the prosecution or to the inconvenience of the Court, while a failure to observe it may deprive the defendant of a right wisely provided for his protection and security.

The judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered.

CURREY, J., expressed no opinion.

THE PEOPLE v. MAXWELL.

WHAT CONSTITUTES LARCENY.—One who does not participate in a larceny, or have any knowledge of it whatever prior to or at the time of its commission, but afterwards receives the stolen goods into his possession, does not thereby become guilty of a larceny.

INSTRUCTIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES.—Any instruction in a criminal case which is so ambiguous that conclusions clearly prejudicial to the defendant may be drawn therefrom by the jury, is erroneous.

APPEAL from the Court of Sessions, Placer County.

The defendant was convicted of the crime of larceny, and appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Tuttle & Fellows, for Appellant.

McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The Court did not err in refusing defendant a new trial, on the ground that the instruction of the Court was contrary to the rule laid down in criminal proceedings. (Wharton's Cr. Law, §§ 1814-15-17; 2d East's Pleas of the Crown, 767-9.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The defendant and one Morgan were jointly indicted for the crime of grand larceny, and, upon their application, were allowed separate trials. It appears from the testimony on the part of the prosecution, that the stolen property, consisting of a rifle, vest, razor, shot pouch, and shirt, was taken from the cabin of the prosecutor, near Auburn Station, in Placer County, during his absence, on the 30th day of December, A. D. 1862. No one was seen to take it, nor was the defendant or Morgan seen in the vicinity of the cabin on that day. About dusk of the same day, they were seen travelling in company, at the North Fork bridge, several miles from Auburn Station, the defendant carrying a gun upon his shoulder. They passed the night at a hotel about five miles beyond the bridge, and on the next day proceeded on to Forest Hill. When they arrived at this place Morgan had the gun in his possession, and gave it in pledge to the landlord of the hotel at which they stopped, as security for their board and lodging. At this hotel both parties were arrested. From the testimony of the officer who made the arrest, it appears that all the stolen property was found in the possession of Morgan, except the gun, which was in the possession of the landlord. Morgan, who was examined as a witness on the part of the defence, testified that he and the defendant left San Francisco in company, to go to the mines; that the road forked a few miles from Auburn, and, by mistake, they took the road leading to Auburn Station, and had nearly reached that place before they were informed of their error; that he then told Maxwell that he would go by the station, as it was not much out of the way; that he and the defendant then separated. The defendant went across the country in the direction of the Auburn road, while he took the route by the station; that on his way he went to the cabin of the prosecutor, and committed the larceny in question; that when he overtook the defendant he told him, in response to an inquiry as to where he got the gun, that he had found a friend at the station, who thought he might have use for it in the mountains, and had given it to him; that he alone committed the larceny, and without the participation or knowledge of the defendant, who knew nothing about it until after their arrest. Such being the facts, the following instructions, among others, was given to the jury by the Court: "Should you believe, from the evidence, that the witness Morgan stole the property described in the indictment, and that the same was found in the possession of this defendant, and that this defendant and Morgan were associated together, and that the defendant knew that the property was stolen, then and in that case he is equally guilty in the eye of the law, and your verdict should be guilty." This instruction is assigned as error.

The People v. Maxwell.

It is contended that this instruction was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury; and as the language here used seems to be unqualified by any other portion of the charge, we are inclined to the opinion that such may have been the case. It is difficult to say that the language used is not quite as applicable to a case where the offence charged is receiving stolen goods as to a case of larceny, and the jury, not knowing or clearly understanding the distinction between the two offences, may have confounded them, and to come to the conclusion that the defendant, having received a part of the stolen goods into his possession, knowing them to be stolen, by that act alone became guilty of larceny, although he may not have participated in the larceny, or had any knowledge of it whatever prior to or at the time of its commission.

The charge is also objectionable on account of the loose use of the words "were associated together." It is impossible to determine clearly what meaning was intended to be conveyed by these words, and the jury may have inferred from their unqualified use, that if Morgan and the defendant were associated together in any manner, and Morgan committed the larceny in question, and the defendant afterward knew that Morgan had stolen the property, he would be equally guilty with Morgan. Any instruction in a criminal case which is so ambiguous that conclusions clearly prejudicial to the defendant may be drawn therefrom by the jury, must be held erroneous by this Court.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

CURREY, J., expressed no opinion.

THE PEOPLE v. VINCENTE SANCHEZ.

ADJOURNMENT OF COURT.—If the Judge or Judges of a Court do not appear by noon of the first day of a term, and the Sheriff or Clerk, at noon, does not adjourn the Court until the next day, the term does not thereby expire; but the Judge or Judges can appear and open the Court at any time during the day, and the Sheriff or Clerk can legally at any time during the day, after noon, adjourn the Court until the next day.

CONSCIENTIOUS SCRUPLES OF JUROR GROUND OF CHALLENGE.—Where a juror, in a capital case, after being sworn to answer questions concerning his competency, says that he entertains such conscientious scruples as would preclude his finding the defendant guilty of an offence punishable with death, and the District Attorney challenges him on the ground of implied bias, the challenge should be allowed.

DYING DECLARATIONS AS EVIDENCE.—Before dying declarations are admitted in evidence, it should be conclusively shown that the declarant was at the point of death; that he was conscious of approaching dissolution, and had lost all hope of a recovery, and made the declaration under the full belief that he was about to die. The existence of such belief need not be proved, however, by the express statements of the declarant, but it may be shown from the circumstances that such belief actually existed.

D.—The declarations of deceased persons in cases of homicide stand on the same footing as witnesses sworn in the case as to their admissibility, and are governed by the same rules in conducting the examination, except that in examining the declarant leading questions may be put to him, and he may even be urged with earnest and pressing solicitation—although by such a course the credibility of the declaration is impaired.

MURDER AND MANSLAUGHTER.—In case of mutual combat where a homicide is committed, in order to reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter, it must appear that the contest was waged on equal terms, and no undue advantage was sought or taken by the defendant; for if such was the case, malice may be inferred, and the killing amount to murder.

D.—When two persons have a sudden quarrel, and after a sufficient time has elapsed for the blood to cool and passion to subside, go out to fight, and one of them kills the other, the killing will be murder and not manslaughter.

The People v. Vincente Sanchez.

INSTRUCTIONS TO A JURY.—No instruction should be given to a jury which is not predicated upon some theory, logically deducible from at least some portion of the testimony.

WHAT CONSTITUTES MURDER IN FIRST AND SECOND DEGREES.—In order to constitute murder in the first degree there must be something more than malicious or intentional killing. There must be killing by means of poison, lying in wait, or torture, or some other kind of killing different from that of poison, lying in wait, or torture, which is wilful, deliberate, and premeditated, or a killing which is committed in the perpetration or the attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary. Every other kind of murder which is murder at common law, is murder in the second degree.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District Santa Cruz County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Skirm, for Appellant.

The motion to set aside the indictment, and in arrest of judgment, were improperly overruled.

The Judges did not attend until 2 o'clock P. M., of the first day of the term, and the Court could not be legally opened after the hour of noon; consequently there was no commencement of the Court of Sessions, and no order for summoning a grand jury could be legally made. (Wood's Dig., Articles 1566, 2704, and 706; Bouvier's Law Dic., Title "Court," as to performance of some public act to constitute a Court; Wick v. Ludwig, 9 Cal. 175.)

The dying declarations of deceased were improperly received.

The deceased showed that he still entertained a hope of life by asking his physician as he was going away if he would return again. (1st Phil. on Ev. O. H. & E.'s Notes, 293; 1st Arch. Crim. Pr. 140, Note 2.)

Dying declarations are admissible only to show the direct transactions from which death results, and not to prove former transactions, opinions, or motives. (1st Phil. Ev. O. H. & E.'s Notes, 285-6-7; 1st Greenleaf on Ev. § 159; Wharton on Homicide, 307.)

The People v. Vincente Sanchez.

McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The Court was opened, if that be necessary, at either 9 A. M. or 2 P. M., on the day fixed by law for its meeting, and there had been no adjournment by Sheriff or any one before its meeting. (Wood's Dig. 157, 158, §§ 84, 96; Thomas v. Fogarty, 19 Cal. 644.)

The dying declarations were properly admitted. (1st Greenleaf on Ev. § 168; People v. Ybarri, 17 Cal. 168.)

To the question "what, then, did the prisoner shoot you for," the objection was rightly overruled. (Nelson v. State, 7 Humphrey, 543.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The fifty-ninth section of the Act concerning Courts of justice and judicial officers, (Wood's Digest, 147,) appoints the days upon which the terms of the Courts of Sessions are to be held; and the ninety-fifth section of the same Act prescribes what shall be done by the Sheriff or Clerk, if the Judge or Judges of the Court do not appear on the day appointed for the commencement of the term. The latter section reads as follows: "If no Judge attend on the day appointed for holding the Court, before noon, the Sheriff or Clerk shall adjourn the Court until the next day at ten o'clock; and if no Judge attend on that day before noon, the Sheriff or Clerk shall adjourn the Court until the following day; and so on from day to day for one week. If no Judge attend for one week, the Sheriff or Clerk shall adjourn the Court for the term." In the present case, Monday, the third day of February, A. D. 1862, was the day appointed for holding the Court, and on that day neither of the Judges appeared until the hour of two o'clock P. M., at which time they all appeared and opened Court for the transaction of business—the Clerk and Sheriff being present. When directed by the County Judge "to open Court," the Sheriff replied "that he had done so at nine o'clock that morning." Beyond this the opening of the Court was not proclaimed by the Sheriff. Neither the Clerk nor Sheriff had adjourned the Court as required by the ninety-fifth section above quoted. The Court made an order directing a Grand Jury to be summoned, which was accordingly done; and such further proceedings were had as resulted in an indictment against the prisoner for the crime of murder; upon which he was subsequently tried in the District Court of the Third Judicial District and convicted of murder in the first degree. Upon this state of facts, it is contended on the part of the prisoner, that the term of the Court of Sessions, at which the indictment was found, was not held in accordance with law, and all its proceedings were therefore coram non judice and void.

The presence of the Judges, or a competent number of them, and a Clerk, and the performance by the Judges of some public act indicative of a design on their part to exercise judicial functions at the time and place appointed by law, is all that is requisite to the legal existence of a Court. (Bacon's Abridgement, Title Courts.) Leaving out of view the ninety-fifth section of the Act concerning Courts and judicial officers, and this definition of a Court is fully satisfied by the facts and circumstances of the present case. The time appointed by law was the first Monday in February, A. D. 1862, and the place was the Court-house of the county — the Judges, Clerk and Sheriff were all present on that day and at that place; and the command to "open Court" given to the Sheriff, whether obeyed by him or not, was a public act indicative of a design on the part of the Judges to perform the functions of a Court. The fifty-ninth section of the statute prescribes no particular hour at which the Court must convene, and it may therefore, so far as that section is concerned, convene at any time during the day. If there is any obligation resting upon the Judges to convene before noon, it is imposed by the ninety-fifth section of the statute; and hence the solution of the question under consideration must be found in the construction of that section.

In effect, counsel for the prisoner contend that, inasmuch as the Judges did not appear before noon, it became necessary, in order to prevent a loss of the term, for the Sheriff or Clerk to immediately adjourn the Court until the next day; and neither of them having done so, the term had already expired by operation of law before the Judges appeared.

This is giving the section in question, we think, a construction and effect not contemplated by the Legislature. To continue the term over until the next day, an adjournment—the Judges being absent—was doubtless necessary; but it does not follow that the term was lost at noon, either because an adjournment was not had at that time, or because the Judges had failed to appear; on the contrary, we are inclined to think the term would continue during the whole of that day from the very fact that it was not adjourned, and the Judges might lawfully meet and open Court at any time before its close.

In Thomas v. Fogarty, 19th Cal. 644, the late Supreme Court held that the object and purpose of this section was to prevent the loss of a term in case of the absence of the Judge; and the learned Justice who delivered the opinion in that case might have added that such was its only object.

Leave this section out of the statute, and the loss of a term is the consequence of a failure on the part of the Judge to appear on the day appointed for holding the Court. (The People v. Bradwell, 2 Cowen, 445.) To provide against such a consequence was the obvious intention of the Legislature in making this section a part of the Act; yet under the construction contended for on the part of the prisoner, it is made to hasten rather than retard the consequence which it was designed to prevent, and to defeat rather than accomplish its purpose. Such a result could never have been intended; and while this section must be so construed as to give full force and effect to the intention of the Legislature, care must be taken not to extend its operation beyond the accomplishment of that object. From what has been said, it follows that the term was not lost by the failure of the Judges to appear before noon, nor by the neglect of the Sheriff and Clerk to adjourn Court until the next day; that, admitting an adjournment was necessary to preserve the term until the next day, it was not lost by a failure to adjourn at noon, but continued until the close of the day appointed for its commencement, and the Judges could legally open Court at any time before the day expired. Had an adjournment taken place, it is doubtful whether the Judges could have legally held Court before the next day. It was suggested by the Attorney-General that in such a case the Judges would have the power to set aside the adjournment and proceed with the business of the term. And such may be the case; but upon this point it is unnecessary, for the purposes of the present case, to express an opinion. The motion to set aside the indictment and the motion in arrest of judgment were properly overruled by the Court below.

The next error assigned is the allowance of a challenge interposed by the District Attorney to one of the trial jurors, upon the ground of implied bias. This assignment is manifestly frivolous. The juror was asked "whether he entertained such conscientious scruples as would preclude his finding the defendant guilty of an offence punishable with death;" and his reply was that "he did." In such a case the statute expressly provides that "he shall neither be permitted nor compelled to serve as a juror."

It is further claimed by counsel for the prisoner, that the Court below erred in admitting the dying declarations of the deceased. These declarations were made to the attending physician, F. E. Bailey, on the day after the declarant was wounded, and two days before his death. The admission of the declarations was objected to upon the ground that no sufficient foundation had been laid for their introduction. Upon this point Dr. Bailey testified as follows: "I found him suffering with wounds in the face and neck, inflicted by large shot of the kind known as duck or goose shot. A number of shot had entered his mouth; several teeth were shot away, and his lower jawbone was fractured. There were wounds over the left lung, and two or three of the shot had penetrated the chest. * * * He was very low, but able to converse. I did not think he could recover. I told him he had no chance of recovery. He asked me how long I thought he would live. I replied that I could not positively tell. My own opinion was that he could not live long. He had sent for the priest, who had gone up with me when I went. The priest administered the consolations of religion to him; at least a part of the ceremonies had been performed before he talked to me about the wounding. It is the custom with that class of people (Mexican) to send for the priest before they do for the physician, when they think they are in danger. The ceremonies may have been closed after he told me about the wounding. He exhibited symptoms of approaching death, but lived, I think, two days afterward."

Then follow the declarations. At the close of the direct examination the witness said: "After I had been with him four or five hours I left. When I was going, he asked me if I would come back. I told him that I thought it would not be worth while."

On cross-examination Dr. Bailey said: "The deceased was two or three hours making the statement to which I have testified; he spoke in broken English, which I understood, and with much difficulty and pain; he spoke at intervals; he would converse for a little while and then rest."

In the case of Rex v. Woodcock, 2 Leach's Cr. Cases, 563, 566, the general principle on which this species of evidence is admitted was stated by Lord Chief Baron Eyre to be this: "That they are declarations made in extremity, when the party is at the point of death, and when every hope of this world is gone; when every motive to falsehood is silenced, and the mind is induced by the most powerful considerations to speak the truth. A situation so solemn and so awful is considered by the law as creating an obligation equal to that which is imposed by a positive oath in a Court of justice." Speaking of the circumstances under which dying declarations are admitted in evidence, Greenleaf says: "It is essential to the admissibility of these declarations, and is a primary fact to be proved by the party offering them in evidence, that they were made under a sense of impending death; but it is not necessary that they should be stated at the time to be so made. It is enough if it satisfactorily appears in any mode that they were made under that sanction, whether it be directly proved by the express language of the declarant, or be inferred from his evident danger, or the opinions of the medical or other attendants stated to him, or from his conduct, or other circumstances of the case, all of which are resorted to in order to ascertain the state of the declarant's mind." (1 Greenleaf Ev. sec. 158.)

This species of testimony should always be received with the greatest caution, and too much care cannot be observed by the Court in scrutinizing the primary facts upon which its admissibility is grounded. No person is entirely exempt from a disposition to excuse and justify his own conduct, or to inflict vengeance upon one at whose hands he has suffered a grievous wrong; and in the eye of the law this proclivity is presumed, in cases like the present, to be overcome and silenced only by the presence of almost immediate death. An undoubting belief existing in the mind of the declarant, at the time the declarations are made, that the finger of death is upon him, is indispensable to that sanction which the law exacts; and if it shall appear, in any mode, that there was a hope of recovery, however faint it may have been, still lingering in his breast, that sanction is not afforded, and his statement cannot be received. The existence of such belief, however, need not be proved by any express statement by the declarant to that effect; it is sufficient if it appears from any circumstance, or from all the circumstances of the case taken together, that such belief actually existed. The character of his wounds — his suffering and pain — the opinion of the surgeon or other attendants as to his condition, if stated to him — his alarm and anxiety, if manifested — his final preparation for death, if any was made — his taking leave of friends — his seeking the consolations of religion and the last offices of the Church, if such was the case — are all circumstances which are frequently quite as satisfactory in determining the questions of belief as any express statement on the part of the declarant. In the present case the wounds received by the deceased were evidently mortal. He was unable to converse except at intervals, and then with much difficulty and pain. The symptoms of approaching dissolution were manifest to the eye of his physician, and he could not have been wholly unconscious of their presence. In reply to his own question, he is assured by his physician, upon whose judgment all rely under such circumstances, that his wounds are mortal, and that he has no chance of recovery. The unequivocal manner in which that opinion was expressed must have extinguished all hope. He expresses no opinion himself, but accepts that of his physician as conclusive. He asks for and receives at the hands of his priestly adviser the consolations of religion. The solemn ceremonies and last rites of the Church, appointed for the dying only, were performed and administered at his request. It might well be inferred from all these circumstances, that the declarant believed himself to be lying at the point of death at the time these declarations were made, and we are not prepared to say that the conclusion to which the Court below arrived was not correct.

In giving the testimony touching these declarations, the witness Bailey stated that he asked the deceased "why Sanchez shot him?" Counsel for the prisoner objected to the witness stating what was said in response to this question, upon the ground "that dying declarations were admissible only to show the direct transaction from which the death resulted, and not to prove former transactions, opinions, or motives." The Court overruled the objection, and this ruling is the next error assigned.

As to their admissibility, the declarations of deceased persons, in cases of homicide, stand upon the same footing as the testimony of a witness sworn in the case, and are governed by the same rules, except as to the manner of conducting the examination, which may be by leading questions, and even earnest and pressing solicitation, although by such a course their credibility is impaired. They must be confined to facts, and such as are pertinent and relevant to the issue, and not speak to distinct and separate transactions, or to matters of opinion or hearsay. But in this case the declarant was relating the circumstances of the shooting, which was the "direct transaction from which his death resulted," and the question asked him referred directly in terms to that transaction. It was not calculated to elicit matters foreign to the issue, as is conclusively shown by the answer, which was, in substance, that there had been a quarrel between them, and they were going out to settle it. But, even admitting the ruling of the Court to be erroneous, we are unable to perceive how the prisoner was prejudiced thereby. The tendency of the testimony elicited was to reduce the offence from murder of the first to murder of the second degree, and perhaps manslaughter, and consequently it was more damaging to the prosecution than to the defence. It at least follows that no reversible error was committed.

The next error assigned is the refusal of the Court to give certain instructions asked on behalf of the prisoner. The first instruction is in the following words: "When, upon sudden quarrel, two persons fight, and one of them kills the other, this is voluntary manslaughter; and so if they, upon such occasion, go out and fight in a field, for this is one continued act of passion."

This instruction seems to be founded upon the theory that the killing was the result of mutual combat. It is doubtful whether such a theory is logically deducible from the evidence; but, however that may be, it is clear that the instruction was properly refused, for the obvious reason, even in view of that theory, that it is not law. It ignores entirely the doctrine that in case of mutual combat, in order to reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter, it must appear that the contest was waged upon equal terms, and no undue advantage was sought or taken by either side; for, if such was the case, malice may be inferred, and the killing amount to murder. The latter clause, which, it is presumed, was more especially intended to apply to the present case, is also erroneous, because it ignores the doctrine that such "going out to fight" must occur immediately after the quarrel; for if sufficient time elapse between the quarrel and the "going out to fight" to enable the blood to cool and passion to subside, the killing will be murder, and not manslaughter.

The next instruction refused by the Court is in the following language: "Under the indictment against the defendant, he may be found guilty of any offence the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged in the indictment; that is, he may be found guilty of murder in the first degree, of murder in the second degree, of manslaughter, of fighting a duel and killing his antagonist, and of excusable or justifiable homicide."

In determining this question of error it is unnecessary to decide whether, under an indictment for murder, a defendant may be found guilty "of fighting a duel and killing his antagonist," inasmuch as the action of the Court below must be sustained upon other and sufficient grounds. The instruction was properly overruled for several obvious reasons.

1. All of it, except that portion which relates to duelling and excusable or justifiable homicide, had already been given by the Court, and the refusal was accompanied by a statement to that effect.

2. The theory that the homicide in this case was the result of a duel has no foundation in the evidence. No instruction should be given to a jury which is not predicated upon some theory logically deducible from at least some portion of the testimony. Such instructions are only calculated to confuse and mislead the jury, and ought not to be given.

3. It announces for the first time in the history of criminal procedure, the startling doctrine that a defendant on trial for murder may be found guilty of excusable or justifiable homicide. Upon this branch of the instruction comment is unnecessary.

4. Numerous objections to the instructions given by the Court are next urged, most of which have more or less merit; and one of them is clearly fatal to the judgment in this case. The following definition of murder of the first degree is found in the charge: "Murder is divided by our law into two degrees—the first includes every unlawful killing of a human being done maliciously or intentionally."

At best this is but a lame definition of murder, and contains none of the characteristics which mark the distinction between murder of the first and murder of the second degree. In effect, the jury are told that every unlawful killing of a human being done maliciously is murder of the first degree, and every unlawful killing of a human being done intentionally is murder of the first degree. Neither of these propositions is true; for malice must and intent to kill may exist where the killing only amounts to murder of the second degree.

In order to constitute murder of the first degree there must be something more than a malicious or intentional killing. There must be a killing within one of the three classes of cases described in the statute as constituting murder of the first degree. There must be a killing by means of poison, lying in wait, or torture, or some other kind of killing different from that of poison, lying in wait, or torture which is wilful, deliberate, and premeditated; or a killing which is committed in the perpetration or the attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, or burglary.

In dividing murder into two degrees, the Legislature intended to assign to the first, as deserving of greater punishment, all murders of a cruel and aggravated character; and to the second all other kinds of murder which are murder at common law; and to establish a test by which the degree of every case of murder may be readily ascertained. That test may be thus stated: Is the killing wilful, (that is to say, intentional,) deliberate, and premeditated? If it is, the case falls within the first, and if not, within the second degree. There are certain kinds of murder which carry with them conclusive evidence of premeditation. These the Legislature has enumerated in the statute, and has taken upon itself the responsibility of saying that they shall be deemed and held to be murder of the first degree. These cases are of two classes. First—Where the killing is perpetrated by means of poison, etc. Here the means used is held to be conclusive evidence of premeditation. The second is where the killing is done in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate some one of the felonies enumerated in the statute. Here the occasion is made conclusive evidence of premeditation. Where the case comes within either of these classes, the test question — “Is the killing wilful, deliberate, and premeditated?” — is answered by the statute itself, and the jury have no option but to find the prisoner guilty in the first degree. Hence, so far as these two classes are concerned, all difficulty as to the question of degree is removed by the statute. But there is another and much larger class of cases included in the definition of murder in the first degree, which are of equal cruelty and aggravation with those enumerated, and which, owing to the different and countless forms which murder assumes, it is impossible to describe in the statute. In this class the Legislature leaves the jury to determine, from all the evidence before them, the degree of the crime, but prescribes, for the government of their deliberations, the same test which has been used by itself in determining the degree of the other two classes—to wit: the deliberate and pre-conceived intent to kill. Thus the three classes of cases which constitute murder of the first degree are made to stand upon the same principle.

It is only in the latter class of cases that any difficulty is experienced in drawing the distinction between murder of the first and murder of the second degree, and this difficulty is more apparent than real. The unlawful killing must be accompanied with a deliberate and clear intent to take life in order to constitute murder of the first degree. The intent to kill must be the result of deliberate premeditation; it must be formed upon a pre-existing reflection, and not upon a sudden heat of passion sufficient to preclude the idea of deliberation. There need be no appreciable space of time between the intention to kill and the act of killing; they may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind. It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer; and if such is the case, the killing is murder of the first degree, no matter how rapidly these acts of the mind may succeed each other, or how quickly they may be followed by the act of killing.

We have carefully read the entire charge of the Court, for the purpose of ascertaining whether this objection is cured in any other part; and although we find other attempts at definition and illustration, we are satisfied that the distinction between the two degrees of murder is nowhere drawn with that perspicuity which is necessary in order to render it distinct and clear to the comprehension of a jury. This leaves to us no option but to reverse the judgment and order a new trial.

Ordered accordingly.

THE PEOPLE v. WM. WILLIAMS.

BIAS OF JUDGE — CHANGE OF VENUE.—Bias or prejudice on the part of the Judge, constitutes no legal incapacity to sit on the trial of a cause, nor is it a sufficient ground to authorize a change of the place of trial.

ERROR OF JUDGE NOT EVIDENCE OF BIAS.—The fact alone, that the Judge, on a previous trial of the same cause, made an erroneous ruling, is no evidence of the existence of bias or prejudice in his mind.

CHANGE OF VENUE FOR PREJUDICE OF JUDGE.—An affidavit made on application to change the place of trial, which states, "that the Judge, as the affiant is informed and verily believes, has frequently stated that he believed the affiant guilty of the crime charged in the indictment, and has frequently expressed himself against and adversely to the affiant in connection with said charge," does not merit consideration, as it contains a mere charge upon information and belief, and does not show how the information was obtained, or upon what the belief was based.

AFFIDAVIT FOR CONTINUANCE.—An affidavit for a continuance, which merely shows that the desired witness resides in another county from that of the place of trial, and that a subpoena has been placed in the hands of the Sheriff of the county where the witness resides, and has been returned not served on the witness, does not show sufficient diligence to entitle the defendant to a continuance.

AFFIDAVIT ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.—An affidavit made on motion for a new trial, in a criminal case, on the ground that the jury received evidence out of Court, other than that given by the witnesses who testified on the trial, which states that the affiant is informed and believes that slips of a newspaper and a law book containing the evidence given on a former trial of the same case, were left in the room where the jury deliberated on their verdict; and that the affiant is informed and believes that while so deliberating, the jury read from said newspaper slips what purported to be the evidence taken on said former trial, and from said law book the evidence of a former trial as published in the same, is not sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial.

PERFORMANCE OF DUTY BY JURORS.—The presumption is that jurors perform their duty in accordance with the oath which they have taken, and to overthrow this presumption, there must be some direct positive testimony, tending to show misconduct on the part of the jury.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Yolo County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

The report of this case on the first appeal to the Supreme Court will be found 18th Cal. 187.

N. Greene Curtis and George B. Moore, for Appellant.

The People v. Wm. Williams.

In the case of Spencer v. The State, 8th Blackford, 281, the Court said, "the Court below erred in refusing a continuance of the case on the affidavit of the defendant, showing the absence of a material witness." (Wade v. Milleken, 16 Ill. 507; Copenhagen v. The State, 14th Geor. 22.)

"It is a rule of law well settled that if a jury, after retiring to deliberate upon their verdict, hear other testimony, it will form a ground for a new trial." (Hudson v. The State, 9 Yerger, 408; Booby v. The State, 4 Yerger, 111; 18 B. Munroe, Ky. 291.)

The statute regulating proceedings in criminal cases, empowers the Court to grant a new trial, when the jury have separated without leave of the Court, after retiring to deliberate upon their verdict, or been guilty of any misconduct tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case. (Crim. Pr. section 440.)

The burden of proof rests upon the State to show that the defendant has not suffered any injury by reason of the irregularity complained of, and that in the absence of such proof, he is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that this irregularity has been prejudicial to him. (People v. Brannigan, 21 Cal. 337, and cases therein cited; Sam v. The State, 1 Swan, p. 61; Atkins v. The State, 16 Ark. 568.)

"If a paper calculated to influence a jury in favor of one of the parties gets improperly before them, while considering of their verdict, and they find for that party, it is a ground for a new trial." (Walker v. Hunter, 17 Georg. 364; Wilson v. Wilkins, 3 Foster, 471.)

McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The mere affidavit of the defendant that the Judge was biased, without specifying the facts, is not a sufficient showing to warrant this Court in interfering, or the Court below in granting a change of venue. (People v. Fisher, 6 Cal.

154; People v. Mahoney, 18 Cal. 180; People v. Graham, 21 Cal. 261.)

As to the affidavit for continuance, see Wood's Digest, §§ 325, 528, pages 295, 314. (People v. Quincy, 8 Cal. 89; People v. Thompson, 4 Cal. 240; People v. Varnard, 6 Cal. 562.)

The presumption is that the jury did their duty, and arrived at their verdict from the evidence.

Besides, it is not pretended that the people or a juror surreptitiously introduced into the jury room the papers. (Ball v. Carley, 3 Indiana, 578; Bersb v. The State, 13 Ind. 436; Nolen v. The State, 2 Head, Tenn. 522.)

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

The defendant was indicted for murder in the first degree, tried, and convicted. An appeal was taken to this Court, the judgment reversed on the ground of an erroneous ruling in excluding certain evidence offered by defendant, and a new trial ordered. On the second trial a verdict of guilty was also returned by the jury. From the judgment rendered on this verdict, and the order denying a new trial, the present appeal is taken.

When the case was called for trial, the defendant filed an affidavit, in which he states "That he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in the Sixth Judicial District, and before the Judge of said Court, for the following reasons, to wit: First—Because said case has once been tried before said Judge, and that said Judge has improperly ruled upon the most of defendant's evidence adversely to the right of this affiant. Second—Because said Judge, as affiant is informed, and verily believes, has frequently stated that he believed this affiant guilty of the crime charged in the indictment, and has frequently expressed himself against and adversely to this affiant in connection with said charge. Wherefore, this affiant says that he verily believes and avers the truth to be that said Judge is biased and prejudiced against him and against his said case, and that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial before said Judge in said Court.”

On this ground, he moved for a change of the place of trial to some other county. The motion having been denied and exception taken, this ruling is assigned as error.

No authority has been cited to support the proposition that bias or prejudice on the part of the Judge constitutes a legal incapacity to sit on the trial of a cause. Our statute does not provide for any such disqualification. In discussing the subject of challenges, Wharton, in his work on American Criminal Law, sec. 2945, says: “The practice among the civilians extends the right of challenges for cause to the Judges as well as to the jurors; and the great inclination of authority is, that the same causes which disqualify one disqualify the other. Where the Judge, like a Chancellor, sits to try both facts and law, as in the case with the civilians, there is peculiar reason for the application to him of a jealous test; and the cases where he may be challenged are placed in two classes: First—Where he is disqualified by circumstances beyond his control, (e. g., relationship, or previous connection with the subject matter.) Second—Where he is disqualified by misconduct, (e. g., partiality or prejudice.) But by the common law of England and America, where the Judge is a statutory officer subject to impeachment, and where the jury is unimpeachable, and from its character is peculiarly susceptible to those influences which produce incompetency, it would be as absurd as impracticable to treat each as subject to the same rule. A jurymen, again, when challenged, may be readily replaced; but as a Judge could not sit to try his own incompetency, not only would every challenge involve an appeal, but it would be necessary to establish a reserved Court to sit subsequently in case a disqualification were found to exist. Under our system, therefore, there can be no such thing as the challenge of the Judge, the remedy, in case of criminal partiality, being found in impeachment.

The People v. Wm. Williams.

* * * * In this light the Judiciary are, with us, clothed with powers and discretion far more absolute than those under the civil or modern continental law; and perhaps this may tend to give additional weight to those moral sanctions which require a Judge on the bench, whatever may have been his individual relations, to religiously divest himself of those prejudices, personal, social, or political, which would be a cause of disqualification to a juror." An application to change the place of trial on the ground stated, if not technically in form a challenge to the Judge, is substantially a challenge in effect, and the principles laid down by Wharton are equally applicable to the case.

A question, similar in principle, arose in the case of The People v. Mahoney, 18 Cal. 185, where it was claimed that the Judge was biased against the prisoner, and a change of the place of trial asked on that ground. The Justice who delivered the opinion of the Court in that case says: "If the Judge acted illegally on the trial, or denied the prisoner his legal rights, this would be a good cause, on appeal, for reversal; but we cannot undertake to say that this consideration operated a legal disqualification of the Judge to sit." And in McCauley v. Weller, 12 Cal. 523, the question also directly arose in a civil case, and it was held that a manifest bias, and even an exhibition of partisan feeling on the part of the Judge, although "indecorous, improper, and reprehensible, as calculated to throw suspicion upon the judgments of the Court and bring the administration of justice into contempt," was not sufficient ground, under our statute, to authorize a change of the place of trial.

But, admitting that bias of the Judge is a sufficient ground for changing the place of trial, we are not satisfied that any such bias existed on the part of the Judge in the present instance as would justify the Court in reversing the judgment on that ground. The fact alone that the Judge, on a previous trial, made an erroneous ruling, is no evidence of such bias. Errors are often committed by the most impartial Judges. It is not singular that the Judge, after hearing the testimony on the former trial, had formed or even expressed an opinion as to the prisoner's guilt. He must necessarily have formed one if he attended to his duties during the progress of the trial. If this were a disqualification, no Judge who has once tried a case could properly preside on a second trial of the same party for the same offence.

The Judge has nothing to do with determining the facts of the case. His province is to rule upon the admissibility of the evidence offered, and to charge the jury as to the law governing the case. If he errs in these particulars, the error can readily be corrected on appeal. The best evidence that the Judge discharged the duties impartially in this instance, and that no error was committed in these respects is, perhaps, the fact that the learned counsel of the defendant have made no point in their argument of this appeal upon the charge given to the jury, or upon any ruling made during the progress of the trial.

But the charge that the Judge had formed and expressed an opinion adverse to the appellant, and by implication that his mind was in such a condition as to render him incapable of giving the prisoner at the bar a fair and impartial trial, is made upon information and belief unsupported by any other testimony. Not even the names of the affiant's informants or the sources of his information are given; and no reason or motive is assigned why the Judge should entertain any improper bias or prejudice against the prisoner.

This charge is entirely too loosely made to merit any serious consideration by this Court.

Second — The second error relied on by the appellant is the refusal of the Court to continue the case on the ground of the absence of Ann and Mary Mathers and A. J. Harrington, witnesses on the part of the defendant.

As to the former two, the record shows that the Court postponed the trial from the 11th to the 13th of August to enable the defendant to procure their attendance, and that they did attend and testify on his behalf at the trial of the cause. As to the witness Harrington, no sufficient diligence to procure his attendance is shown by the affidavit upon which the application was based. It simply states that a subpoena for these witnesses had been issued and placed in the hands of the Sheriff of Sacramento County on the 22d of July; that said witnesses were residents of the County of Sacramento, and that "the Sheriff has returned said subpoena not served on said witnesses." No reason is assigned why it was not served. It does not appear that the Sheriff was notified at what place in Sacramento County said witnesses resided, or that the Sheriff could not find the witnesses, or that he had made any effort to find them.

The trial was to take place in the County of Yolo. In order to compel the attendance of these witnesses in the County of Yolo it was necessary to procure an order from the Judge or a Justice of the Supreme Court, or a County Judge, requiring their attendance in that county. (Wood's Digest, page 311, Sec. 558.) It does not appear that any such order was obtained or asked for. The placing of a subpoena in the hands of the Sheriff of Sacramento County, without such order indorsed thereon, was therefore a nugatory act. Besides, the affidavit was filed on the 11th of August. The affidavit stated that all the witnesses resided in Sacramento County, and the first two above named in the Town of Folsom. Upon filing the affidavit the Court postponed the trial till the 13th, and directed a subpoena to issue for the two witnesses stated in the affidavit to reside at Folsom, and indorsed the proper order thereon requiring their attendance; and their attendance was thereby secured on the 13th, the day to which the trial had been postponed. But it does not appear that any further subpoena for Harrington was demanded, or that any order was asked for requiring his attendance. It does not appear that his attendance could have been procured had the same means been taken to secure it that were adopted in the case of the other two. He appears to have resided in the same county, and there was the same time to find him as was allowed and as proved to be sufficient in the case of the others. No reason is shown why the attendance of Harrington could not be procured. It is worthy of remark in this connection that the two witnesses whose attendance was secured by the postponement did not testify in accordance with the appellant's expectations, as stated in his affidavit. They entirely fail to show where the prisoner was during a large portion of the evening on which the homicide was committed, and including the time at which, according to Blake's testimony, the act was perpetrated. This fact, taken in connection with the fact that those witnesses were members of the same family with the prisoner at the time of the homicide; that he had had one trial, and must be supposed to have known what their testimony would be; and the further fact that no serious effort appears to have been made to secure Harrington's testimony during the interval which elapsed between the 11th and 13th of August, has a tendency to cast a strong shade of suspicion over the good faith of the application for a continuance.

We do not think sufficient diligence was shown to procure Harrington's attendance. There was consequently no error or abuse of discretion in refusing a continuance. (People v. Quincy, 8 Cal. 89; People v. Thompson, 4 Cal. 241.)

Third — The third and last point relied on is, that the Court erred in refusing to arrest the judgment and in overruling the motion for a new trial on the ground that the jury received evidence out of Court other than that given by the witnesses who testified against him on the trial.

This ground is based upon the affidavit of the appellant, in which he states in substance that he was tried for the same offence in Sacramento County in December, 1860; that the Sacramento Union published what purports to be the evidence in the case; that on the trial now under consideration the attorneys, both of the people and the appellant, used the said printed evidence, in slips clipped from the Sacramento Union; that after the jury had been charged by the Judge, the Judge, attorneys, witnesses, and spectators, in pursuance of an order to that effect, left the Court-room, the jury remaining to deliberate on their verdict; that he is informed and believes that said slips from the Sacramento Union, containing the evidence given on the former trial, and several law books, including the 18th volume of the California Reports, said volume containing a report of said cause and a large portion of the evidence taken on said former trial, were left on the bar or table of said Court where said jury remained to deliberate on their verdict; that he is informed and believes that while so deliberating the jury read, from said newspaper slips, what purported to be the evidence taken against him on said former trial, and from said 18th volume California Reports, the evidence as published in the report of said cause—all of which he believes was prejudicial to him in the finding of the verdict of the jury.

There is no direct positive statement that those slips or the volume referred to were left in the Court-room; and no direct statement that the jury read them, if left.

The affiant only states that he is informed and believes they were left in the room and read by the jury. He does not claim to have any personal knowledge on the subject. It does not appear from whom he received his information. The parties giving the information make no affidavit on the subject.

If his informants had any knowledge on the subject their affidavits could and should, and in a matter of so much importance to the prisoner, doubtless would have been produced. The sources of the affiant's information should at least have been disclosed, in order that the District Attorney might have had an opportunity of verifying or disproving the matters alleged, as the truth might be.

It does not appear by whom or how these slips and books were left in the Court-room. Admitting that they were left, as alleged, non constat, that they were not left by the prisoner himself, or by some party on his behalf, for the very purpose of vitiating the verdict in case it should be against him. It is not pretended that they were introduced surreptitiously on the part of the people for the purpose of influencing the verdict, or that the District Attorney or the Judge was aware of their being left in the Court-room. Nor does it appear that the printed matter so left was not a perfectly correct transcript of the evidence, or that it in any particular differed from the evidence given before the jury on the trial.

It does not appear, except by the affidavit of the prisoner upon information and belief merely, unsupported by any other evidence, that it even came to the knowledge of the jury that the obnoxious papers were in the room where the jury were deliberating.

It is not to be presumed that the jurors violated their duty by hunting up and reading evidence not given to them in the progress of the trial in open Court under the sanction of the Judge. The presumption is that they performed their duty in accordance with the oath which they had all taken before entering upon the trial of the case. To overthrow this presumption there must be some direct positive testimony tending to show misconduct on the part of the jurors in this particular. It is not enough that this objectionable matter was inadvertently left in the room, with other books and papers, where the jury might by chance have found it. There must be some positive testimony by some person, who has knowledge of the facts which he states, showing that the jurors, or some one of them, read the testimony referred to, or at least that they found it, or that it in some way came to their notice. No such testimony is produced in this case, and the Court therefore, did not err in denying a new trial or in refusing to arrest the judgment.

No error having been brought to the notice of the Court, the judgment is affirmed, and the District Court is directed to fix a day for carrying the sentence into execution.

The People v. Jean Baptiste Bruzzo.

THE PEOPLE v. JEAN BAPTISTE BRUZZO.

RETURNING NOLLE PROSEQUI TO USE DEFENDANT AS A WITNESS.—When two or more persons are jointly indicted, and jointly to be tried, and the District Attorney desires to use one of them as a witness for the people, and makes an application to the Court for his discharge for that purpose, the Court may, before this defendant has gone into his defence, discharge him from the indictment. But unless all these things concur, to wit: a joint indictment, a joint trial, an application on the part of the District Attorney that the defendant be discharged, to be used as a witness for the people, before he has gone into his defence, the Court has no power to direct a defendant to be discharged from the indictment.

DISCHARGE FROM INDICTMENT AN ACQUITTAL.—Should all the circumstances above stated concur and the Court discharge the prisoner, the discharge would be an acquittal in legal effect, and bar another prosecution.

DEFENDANT IN CRIMINAL CASE SWORN AS WITNESS.—Where one of two or more defendants, jointly indicted and jointly on trial, at the request of the District Attorney, but without any compulsion, takes the stand as a witness for the people, and voluntarily takes the oath, and his counsel objects to his being instructed by the Court that he need not say anything to criminate himself, and then, without any objection being made, or exception taken, voluntarily gives testimony, criminating both himself and his co-defendants; this furnishes no ground for discharging the defendant who testifies from the indictment, or for arresting the judgment, and if erroneous, as no exception was taken, the Supreme Court cannot review the error.

APPEAL from the District Court, Twelfth Judicial District, City and County of San Francisco.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Taylor and Hastings, for Appellant.

The statute of 1851 (Wood's Digest, Article 1626, Secs. 368 and 370, p. 298) is the law of the land, and is not repealed nor in any manner affected by the amended statute of April 10th, 1855. (Wood's Digest, p. 330, Art. 1878, Sec. 13.)

The statute of 1851 concerns cases where there is a joint indictment and a joint trial. The words are—"when two or more persons are included in the same indictment, the Court may, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defence * * discharge him, that he may be a witness for the people. These words show that this statute contemplates and provides for a person whose trial with others is then in progress.

It is further shown by the next article, (1627) which is part of the same statute. The language is—"when two or more persons are included in the same indictment, and the Court is of the opinion that in regard to a particular defendant there is not sufficient evidence to put him upon his defence. And yet further, by section 360, "the order mentioned in the last two sections shall be deemed an acquittal * * * and shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offence."

It is, therefore, quite clear that the statute of 1851 applies where persons jointly indicted are jointly on trial, and Article 1626 points out the way—the only way—in which a person on trial with others can be made a witness for the people, viz. "by discharging him from the indictment."

The statute of 1855, (amendment,) Article 1878, p. 33, which was relied upon by the Court below, has no relation to such case. It is framed for different ends, and looks to different objects. Its fair construction, its plain meaning is that where one is called as a mere witness in another's trial or where he is jointly indicted, but is to be separately tried from those indicted with him, before another jury, such person "may be compelled to be sworn as a witness against another," but the testimony so given shall not be used in a criminal prosecution against himself."

The statute of 1855 finds its best illustration in cases of the character of ex parte Rowe, 7 Cal. 184, 185; People v. Hackley, 24 New York, 74.

To construe the statute of 1855 as a repeal of the statute of 1851, will be to strike down at a blow every rule of construction known to the law.

1. The statute of 1855, if it repeal the statute of 1851, does so by implication. Nothing is better settled than that the law does not, even in civil cases, favor repeals by implication. It is only when the two statutes are directly hostile to each other, and the words of the one directly repugnant to that of the other, that repeal by implication is permitted. (Crosby v. Patch, 18 Cal. 438, 441-2.)

The People v. Jean Baptiste Bruzzo.

There is nothing repugnant or hostile either in word or idea in these two statutes.

2. The law endeavors, if possible, to uphold both statutes. If both can fairly be made to stand, it is the duty of the Court to give effect to both. (Crosby v. Patch, 18 Cal. 441-2.)

Both can stand; both can have effect. Neither interferes with the other. They are totally distinct in their nature and character. They move in different spheres: the one touching a prisoner on his trial—the other, touching a witness when on the trial of another.

3. A statute should be construed as a whole, and with all its parts, together with statutes on the same subject, antecedent jurisprudence, legislation, and usage. (Sedgwick's Const. and Stat. Law, p. 379.)

Almost every page of the statute book, as regards criminal legislation, contains provisions shielding the prisoner from any attempt to compel him to be a witness against himself, and preventing him from offering evidence, even the slightest, on his own trial. (Wood's Dig. p. 270, Art. 1387, § 12; Id. p. 282, Arts. 1480-81-82-83.)

If the construction placed on the statute of 1855 by the Court below be correct, these, equally with the statute under consideration, are all repealed.

McCullough, Attorney-General, for Respondent.

The Act of 1855, so far as enforced in this case, certainly is not unconstitutional, nor is it when enforced entirely.

Bruzzo is called to the stand by the people—he does not object—goes willingly; but is anxious to say to the Court he will ask his discharge if he testifies. At first, the Court tells him he need not in his testimony criminate himself; he objects to that—wants to testify, and then the Court tells him if he answers, he must answer all questions in regard to the matter. If a man proffers his testimony—is willing to criminate himself—no constitutional objections exist to receiving it; he may not be compellable, but is undoubtedly competent, and when thus offered he subjects himself to cross-examination like any other witness. (Udal v. Walton, 14 Mees. & Wels. 256; 1 Greenleaf Ev. § 451; East v. Chapman, 1 Mood. & Malk. 46; State v. K., 4 N. H. 562, and cases cited; Low v. Mitchell, 18 Maine, 374; Appleton on Ev. p. 126, note p.) This is Bruzzo's case: He did not object; more, he objected to the Court objecting to his incrimination of himself. There is certainly nothing unconstitutional in a man confessing his own guilt—if he be sane; he can do it out of Court—why not in?

But second: Even though Bruzzo had been compelled to go on the stand and to testify against others, he was, and is, indemnified against the consequences by the very terms of the Act of 1855, and the principle of the constitutionality of such an Act is sustained by the authorities cited by appellant. (People v. Mather, 4 Wend. 229, and cases; People v. Hackley, 24 N. Y. 82, 83; and the case of People v. Wenehamer, 13 N. Y., 443-4, was where, if the defendant did not testify, the Act assumed his guilt, and of course there was no indemnity.) And in this State the constitutionality of this very Act is upheld. (Ex parte Rowe, 7 Cal. 184-5.)

The Court charged the jury here that Bruzzo's evidence must not be used by them in making up their verdict against him. In ex parte Rowe, the petitioner was compelled to testify against himself before a grand jury. Why not here the defendant be compelled to testify against himself on a trial jury, when in each case the testimony cannot be used against the witness?

By the Court, SHAFER, J.

Jean Baptiste Bruzzo, the appellant, was jointly indicted with Pasquelena Lecari, and Francisco Pizzano, for the murder of one Pietro Lecari. On the morning of the day the trial began, 21st of September, 1863, the District Attorney moved for separate trials, desiring to try Madame Lecari and Pizzano separately from Bruzzo. This motion was opposed by counsel for Bruzzo, and the same was denied by the Court—the Court ordering all the defendants to be tried together, which was accordingly done. A jury having been impanelled, evidence was elicited from various witnesses strongly implicating Bruzzo, consisting of confessions, admissions, etc. Toward the close of the case, and before the defendants had gone into their defence, the District Attorney called Bruzzo as a witness against Lecari and Pizzano. This was objected to by counsel for Lecari and Pizzano, “for that he, Bruzzo, was jointly indicted with the others, and was with them jointly on trial.” The objection was overruled by the Court. The counsel for Bruzzo then requested the District Attorney to apply to the Court for the discharge of Bruzzo from the indictment, which request was refused. The counsel for Bruzzo then gave notice, in open Court, that if Bruzzo was made a witness he should himself apply for Bruzzo’s discharge. The Clerk then swore Bruzzo in the case of Pizzano and Pasquelena Lecari. The counsel for Bruzzo, and also the counsel for the other two defendants, objected that Bruzzo was not sworn in the case; which objection was sustained, and Bruzzo was sworn “to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in the matter wherein The People of the State of California were plaintiffs, and Pizzano, Lecari, and Jean Baptiste Bruzzo, were defendants.” The District Attorney then requested the Court to instruct Bruzzo that he need not say anything to criminate himself; that if he did it would be voluntary on his part. To this the counsel for Bruzzo objected. The Court instructed Bruzzo as requested; but before any question was asked Bruzzo, the Court sustained the objection of his counsel, and at the request of counsel withdrew the instruction, telling Bruzzo that “he must answer all questions in regard to the matter;” holding “that the law did not provide that the witness should not answer questions criminating himself, but only that his testimony should not be used against him." Bruzzo then testified fully in regard to the whole affair, and, in so doing, he criminated himself without stint. As soon as he had been examined, his counsel again requested the District Attorney to apply to the Court for Bruzzo's discharge from the indictment, which request was refused. The counsel for Bruzzo then himself moved for Bruzzo's discharge, and the motion, after argument, was denied, the counsel of Bruzzo excepting.

The People v. Jean Baptiste Bruzzo.

The People v. Jean Baptiste Bruzzo.

The case having been argued to the jury, the Court charged that Bruzzo's testimony, given on the stand, must not be used against him in making up their verdict, but only as against Pizzano and Lecari. The jury found all guilty of murder in the second degree.

October 17, 1863, the prisoners were brought into Court for sentence. A like motion was again made for the discharge of Bruzzo, but it was denied by the Court; to which ruling the counsel for Bruzzo excepted. To the question of the Court, whether the prisoners had anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced against them, Bruzzo, by his counsel, replied: "That having been made a witness on the part of the people, he deemed himself entitled to be discharged from the indictment, and that no sentence ought to be passed upon him." The Court, however, proceeded to pass sentence upon all of the prisoners, and Bruzzo, with the others, was sentenced to confinement in the State Prison for the term of his natural life. Bruzzo appeals from the judgment.

It is insisted, upon the part of the appellant, that the Court erred in denying the motion of Bruzzo's counsel for a discharge. The right of Bruzzo to be discharged is based in argument, upon the 368th section of the Criminal Practice Act; it not being claimed that on the fact of this record the Court had any power to discharge him at common law. The section is as follows: "When two or more persons are included in the same indictment, the Court may, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defence, on the application of the District Attorney, direct any defendant to be discharged from the indictment, that he may be a witness for the people."

After citing the foregoing section, counsel proceeds to argue, and with much force, that this section has not been repealed by section 13 of an Act passed in 1855, (Wood's Digest, page 330,) which section is as follows:

"In all cases where two or more persons are jointly or otherwise concerned in the commission of any crime or misdemeanor, either of such persons may be sworn as witnesses against the other in relation to such crime or misdemeanor; but the testimony given by such witness shall in no instance be used against himself in any criminal prosecution, and any person may be compelled to testify as provided in this section."

It is insisted for the appellant that these sections are not at all in conflict with each other — that the first applies to one class of cases, and the second to another and distinct class; and that inasmuch as there is no express repeal of the former section, there can be no repeal wrought out by implication, under the well understood rules of construction by which such implications are governed. All this may be conceded, but it would not follow that Bruzzo was entitled to be discharged, as the argument for the appellant seems to assume. On the contrary, the only direct result that could be claimed would be that section 368 of the Act of 1851 is still in force.

This brings us to the only question which the case presents, viz: Was Bruzzo entitled to be discharged, under section 368 of the Act last mentioned?

The section contemplates the case of a joint indictment of two or more persons, a joint trial under the indictment, and an application by the District Attorney to the Court for the discharge of one of the defendants before he has gone into his defence. On the happening of these contingencies the Court is authorized, and, it may be, becomes bound, to discharge the particular defendant from the indictment, "that he may be thereafter a witness for the people." The foregoing series of facts and occurrences being found or given, the section in question dictates the rule of judicial conduct. Should the Court, in obedience to the rule, discharge the prisoner, the discharge would be an acquittal in legal effect, and bar another prosecution. (Wood's Dig. 298, Sec. 370.)

The People v. Jean Baptiste Bruzzo.

From the moment of a discharge so secured, the party becomes a stranger to the proceedings, and cannot only be called, but, on general principles, can be compelled to take the stand as a witness for the people against the remaining defendant or defendants; and being no longer on trial or liable to future indictment, he may be compelled to criminate himself. So much as to the scope and uses of section 368. It is merely a law unto itself. It dictates a rule governing the case which it creates or recites, and it does no more.

Now, the record before us does not find the series of emphatic particulars upon which the duty and power of the Court to discharge is, by the section, made implicitly to depend. It is true that some of them are found in the record, but it is equally true that others of them are not. The record not only fails to show an application to the Court by the District Attorney, but, on the contrary, it shows affirmatively that he persistently refused to make such application whenever requested so to do by Bruzzo's counsel. True, the record shows that when the testimony of Bruzzo was completed, his counsel, in pursuance of notice given by him before Bruzzo took the stand, moved for his discharge; but it cannot, in our judgment, be successfully contended that an application by the counsel of the prisoner, particularly when made after his client's testimony had been given, was the legal equivalent of a like motion by the attorney for the people, made before the testimony had been commenced. In other words, the District Attorney and the counsel of a defendant have not, under section 368, concurrent power to make the application to discharge. Should the doctrine of concurrent power pass for law, it is apparent that the rule in its practical workings would be attended with very anomalous results.

But, again: Bruzzo was not compelled to take the stand. The District Attorney called on him, and to the call no objection was taken by Bruzzo. Instead of an objection addressed to the Court, followed by a judicial ruling, the counsel of Bruzzo limited himself to a request addressed to the District Attorney, that he (the attorney) should make an application to the Court for Bruzzo's discharge, and on the refusal of the District Attorney to comply with the request, counsel merely superadded a verbal notice of motion to discharge, to be made by him when Bruzzo's testimony should be concluded; and thereupon Bruzzo, solicited indeed, but certainly not compelled by the "call" of the attorney for the prosecution, took the stand without demur. Throughout this entire scene the Court was silent, making no decision, and expressing no opinion. That Bruzzo went from the dock to the witness stand voluntarily is beyond controversy. Being upon the stand, he was sworn in the first instance to testify in the People v. Lecari and Pizzano; and on objection by his counsel that the oath was improper and valueless, for the reason that there was no such case pending, the Court made its first ruling, sustaining the objection. Thereupon and without any objection by counsel, or any ruling or intimation from the Court, and without any manifestation of unwillingness on the part of Bruzzo, he was sworn generally in the case as made in the indictment. As Bruzzo did not take this oath by judicial direction, and as he was not misled by any suggestion from the bench as to his duty in the matter of taking it, and as he must be presumed to have known his legal rights, we hold that he took the oath voluntarily and without misapprehension. After the oath had been thus accepted by Bruzzo, the Court instructed him, at the instance of the District Attorney, that "he need not say anything which would criminate himself, and that if he did it would be pure and voluntary on his part." This instruction, in effect, limited the obligation of the oath by judicial interpretation, so as to relieve Bruzzo from the necessity of self-accusation, leaving him, indeed, without motive for disclosing his own participation in the alleged murder other than the relief which guilt always finds in confession, and the hope that if the conviction of the other defendants should be secured by his testimony, he could rely upon that fact as a ground of pardon in the event of his own conviction. But Bruzzo, apparently dissatisfied with the exemption so extended to him, objected to the exemption, through his counsel, and thus insisted in effect that the exemption should be canceled or recalled. The Court, at his instance, withdrew the instruction, or rather recalled the lawful and humane monition that it had given him, "telling him that he must answer all questions in regard to the matter; holding that the law did not provide that the witness should not answer questions criminating himself, but only that his testimony should not be used against himself." Admitting that, disassociated from the context of facts, this instruction would be erroneous, still, when considered in connection with the events that immediately preceded it, we hold that it was an instruction given in effect at Bruzzo's solicitation. When he objected to the instruction "that he need not criminate himself," he virtually requested the Court to give the opposite exposition of the oath he had voluntarily taken. Should it be admitted that the instruction was not only erroneous, but also that the error is now before the Court for review, it would furnish no reason why Bruzzo should be finally discharged, but a reason simply why a new trial should be awarded. But no exception was in fact taken to the i struction on Bruzzo's behalf, and therefore the jurisdiction in error does not attach.

The People v. Jean Baptiste Bruzzo.

We add, that the case at bar not only does not fall within the Act of 1851, but is, in our judgment, equally foreign to the Act of 1855. It differs from the cases for which these Acts respectively provide, and in governing particulars. The record shows a case of joint indictment; joint trial; a request or call by the Prosecuting Attorney for one of the defendants for the purpose of examining him against the other two; he takes the stand voluntarily in answer to the call; he invites and without objection takes the oath in its most comprehensive form, and, under instructions which he has previously solicited, and to which he takes no exception when given, criminales his associates and himself; and on these antecedents the counsel of the witness, in pursuance of a notice previously given, moves the Court not merely to discharge the witness from the particular prosecution, but to finally acquit him, in effect, of the crime alleged against him. Power in the Judiciary to grant such a motion under such circumstances will be looked for in vain under any provision of our criminal code, and as vainly in the rules of the common law. An acquittal under such circumstances would be a species of judicial pardon, rescuing the prisoner on his own motion, and against the express or virtual protest of the Government, from a conviction made morally certain by evidence previously adduced.

The results are as follows: First—The Court has no power to discharge Bruzzo at common law, nor under the Act of 1851, on the motion of his own counsel. Second—Admitting that, on the facts of this case, the Court had no power to compel Bruzzo to take the stand as a witness, yet the record shows that Bruzzo was not subjected to such compulsion; and if the converse should be held to appear, still, as no exception was taken, we cannot review the error.

The judgment is affirmed.

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL — EFFECT OF.—A dismissal of an appeal by the Supreme Court is, in legal effect, an affirmance of the judgment of the Court below, as conclusive and binding upon the parties and the Court as a direct judgment of affirmance, unless the appellant obtains an order setting aside the dismissal and reinstating his appeal before the adjournment of the term.

REMITTITUR — EFFECT OF ISSUANCE.—When a remittitur has been duly and regularly issued from the Supreme Court, and filed in the Court below, and all the proceedings have been regular, the Supreme Court loses all jurisdiction over the case, and from that time can exercise no further control.

FRAUD IN PROCURING DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.—If, however, any fraud or imposition has been practiced upon the Court or the opposite party by the party procuring the dismissal, or the order of dismissal has been improvidently granted upon a false suggestion, or under a mistake as to the facts of the case, the appellate Court will recall the remittitur and stay proceedings in the Court below, and assert its jurisdiction even after the adjournment of the term, upon the ground that its jurisdiction cannot be divested by an irregular or an improvident order, and that the order is a nullity.

Edward Tompkins, for Respondent.

This Court has lost all jurisdiction. The appeal was regularly dismissed pursuant to rules three and four of this Court. The certificate of the Clerk corresponded with the rule precisely, and no application was made to restore the appeal during the same term. By statute, the term continued, or might do so, until the fourth Saturday after its commencement on the first Monday of October. (See Act concerning the Courts of Justice, etc.; Bancroft's Practice Act, page 545, § 9; Wood's Digest, page 148, § 9.) This motion was not made until the 29th of December, two months after the term had ended.

The filing of the remittitur in the Court below transferred the cause back to that Court, and this Court had as much power over any other cause pending there, as over this one. If two Justices of this Court, absent from Sacramento, where the law requires this Court to hold its terms, may make an ex parte order staying proceedings in any cause in the Fourth District Court, they may in every cause. If by an order of the Clerk of that Court, they may, without any concurrence or action of that Court, divest it of its jurisdiction over an action that is pending before it, or in which it has entered judgment, and issued process to enforce it, in any case, they may in every case, and instead of an appellate Court, it becomes a Court of summary and general jurisdiction, or rather, the Justices thereof become vested with a migratory and arbitrary power greater than has ever been claimed by the Court itself.

That an appellate Court has no jurisdiction over actions except while they are in it, would seem to be too clear to require an authority. The cases are numerous. (Blanc v. Bowman, 22 Cal. 23; Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387; Martin v. Wilson, Comstock, 240; Delaplaine v. Bergen, 7 Hill, 591; Legg v. Overbaugh, 4 Wendell, 188; Browden v. McArthur, 7 Wheaton, 58.)

By the Court, SANDESSON, C. J.

On the 3d day of June, 1863, appeals were taken in these actions from the Fourth District Court. On Saturday of the first week of the following October term of this Court, the transcripts not having been filed, the appeals were dismissed upon the certificate of the Clerk of the Fourth District Court that the fees for making up the transcripts had not been paid or tendered, and the transcripts had not been delivered to appellant's attorney. As this Court was about to adjourn, an order was made and published that motions to reinstate cases dismissed, pursuant to the third and fourth rules of the Court, might be made on the first Tuesday in November following, and directing that remittiturs, in such cases, should not issue until after that time. About the last of November the remittiturs in the two cases under consideration were issued, and filed in the Court below, and judgments were entered thereon and executions issued. On the 20th day of December following, Mr. Justice Crocker and Mr. Justice Norton, being in San Francisco, signed an order directing the Clerk of the Fourth District Court to return the remittiturs to the Clerk of this Court, and further directing the attorney for respondent to show cause before this Court, at a time therein designated, why the orders dismissing the appeals should not be vacated, and the cases reinstated and placed upon the calendar of this Court, on the ground that said orders were obtained upon false suggestion and mistake, and were improvidently granted; and further directing that all proceedings in the Court below be stayed until the further order of the Court. At the hearing the late Supreme Court vacated the orders of dismissal, and reinstated the appeals. A petition for a rehearing was filed, which was granted by the present Court, and has been had.

The third rule of this Court provides, that if the transcript be not filed within the time prescribed by the second rule, the appeal may be dismissed, ex parte, during the first week of the term, and that such dismissal shall be final and a bar to any other appeal in the same case, unless the appeal be restored during the same term upon good cause shown, and upon notice to the opposite party.

Under this rule a dismissal, in legal effect, must be held to be a judgment of affirmance, which becomes final upon the failure of the appellant to obtain an order setting it aside, and reinstating his appeal, before the adjournment of the term. Unless a final judgment, it could not be held, as expressly provided in the rule, to be a bar to any other appeal in the same case. Therefore, the power of the Court over such an order cannot be greater than its power over other judgments which are, in form, judgments of affirmance or reversal.

After adjournment the orders of dismissal are placed in the same category as other judgments, and are equally conclusive and binding upon the parties and the Court, and can be vacated only upon like principles. Such being the case, we have only to determine whether, after the adjournment of the term and the going down of the remittitur, this Court has any further jurisdiction over its judgments, and if so upon what grounds it rests and under what circumstances it will be exercised. In Grogan v. Ruckle, 1 Cal. 193, the general rule was laid down that this Court loses jurisdiction of the cause when the remittitur has been sent to and filed in the Court below; but that its control over the cause does not cease until that has been done. In that case the remittitur had been sent to the Court below after a rehearing had been granted, and the Court held that it had been improperly sent, and, therefore, could not supersede the order granting a rehearing. The rule in this case was afterwards affirmed in Matee v. Brown, 1 Cal. 231. So in Leese v. Clark, 20 Cal. 387, it was held that this Court has no appellate jurisdiction over its own judgments, and cannot review or modify them after the case has once passed from its control by the issuing and filing of the remittitur in the Court below.

The same doctrine was held in Blanc v. Bowman et al. 22 Cal. 23, in which case Mr. Justice Crocker cites and approves all the cases now referred to.

In Martin v. Wilson, 1 Comstock, 240, a motion was made to open a judgment of affirmance, rendered at the previous term of the Court, and affidavits excusing the default were read in support of the motion; but it appearing that the remittitur had been sent to and filed in the Court below, the Court held that it had lost jurisdiction, and denied the motion upon that ground.

In Delaplaine et al. v. Bergen, 7 Hill, 591, a like motion was made, and affidavits, showing merits, and that the writ of error was brought and prosecuted in good faith, were read in support of the motion, yet, it appearing that the default was regular, the motion was denied.

It is apparent from these authorities (and many others of like import which might be cited) that, as a general rule, this Court cannot exercise any jurisdiction over a cause in which the remittitur has been issued by its order and filed in the Court below. The office of the remittitur is to return the proceedings which have been brought up by the appeal to the Court below, and when the remittitur has been duly filed, the proceedings from that time are pending in that Court, and not in this; and, in regard to them, it is not competent for this Court to make any further order.

But this general rule rests upon the supposition that all the proceedings have been regular, and that no fraud or imposition has been practiced upon the Court or the opposite party; for if it appears that such has been the case, the appellate Court will assert its jurisdiction and recall the case. Against an order or judgment improvidently granted, upon a false suggestion, or under a mistake as to the facts of the case, this Court will afford relief after the adjournment of the term; and will, if necessary, recall a remittitur and stay proceedings in the Court below. This is not done, however, upon the principle of resumption of jurisdiction, but upon the ground that the jurisdiction of the Court cannot be divested by an irregular or improvident order. In contemplation of law, an order obtained upon a false suggestion is not the order of the Court, and may be treated as a nullity. If, under color of such an order, the proceedings have in part found their way back to the Court below, yet in law they are considered as still pending in the appellate Court and that Court may take such steps as may be necessary to make the fact and law agree.

These views are fully sustained by the numerous authorities cited on the argument by counsel for appellant.

In all of those cases, where the order or judgment was vacated, and the appeal reinstated, the reason assigned by the Court for its action is, that the order or judgment had been irregularly made; that is, made upon a false suggestion or under a mistake as to the facts of the case. The views here expressed seem also to have been entertained by counsel for appellant when he drew the order directing the respondent to show cause why the order of dismissal should not be vacated, and the cases reinstated; for he asks that the order may be set aside on the ground that they were obtained upon false suggestion and mistake, and were improvidently granted.

Voluminous affidavits in support of and in opposition to the motion are presented. We deem it unnecessary to discuss them for the purpose of showing the process by which we have arrived at a conclusion upon them adverse to the appellant. It is sufficient to say that we are satisfied that the orders dismissing the appeals in these cases were not irregularly or improvidently granted.

From what has been said, it follows that the order recalling the remittitur, and staying proceedings in the Court below must be vacated, and the motion to set aside the orders of dismissal and reinstate the appeals, denied.

Ordered accordingly.

Mr. Justice SAWYER expressed no opinion.

THE PEOPLE v. F. MIER, J. T. MIER, AND JOHN STUBER.

SUIT FOR TAXES—JURISDICTION OF.—An action brought under the Revenue Act of 1861, to recover judgment for unpaid taxes, is not a case in equity, but an action at law; and where the amount is less than three hundred dollars the District Court has no jurisdiction.

TAX SUIT—IN EQUITY.—If, however, the action is brought under the provisions of the Act of May 12th, 1862, it is a case in equity, and the District Court has jurisdiction, although the amount claimed is less than three hundred dollars.

SUITS FOR TAXES—ACTS OF 1861 AND 1862.—The Acts of 1861 and 1862 prescribe the same form of complaint, but the Act of 1861 contemplates a mere money judgment, while the Act of 1862 authorizes a judgment foreclosing a lien for taxes, with an order of sale, etc., so that the character of the action, whether it is a case in equity or at law, will be determined by the prayer of the complaint. If the prayer of the complaint is for a money judgment, the District Court will not have jurisdiction where the amount claimed is less than three hundred dollars; but if the prayer is for the foreclosure of a lien, order of sale, etc., the District Court has jurisdiction, regardless of the amount claimed.

TAXES—JURISDICTION OF JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.—If, in an action to recover a money judgment for unpaid taxes, commenced in a Justice's Court, an answer is filed which puts in issue the legality of a tax, the Justice of the Peace is ousted of his jurisdiction.

APPEAL from the District Court, Sixth Judicial District, Sacramento County.

This action was commenced on the 8th day of January, 1864. The following is a copy of the prayer of the complaint:

“Wherefore said plaintiffs pray judgment against the said persons defendants herein, for the sum of $65.60, and for damages and costs, and separate judgment against the said real estate and improvements for $65.60, and the damages and costs aforesaid, and that the said lien be enforced, and that the said real estate and improvements be sold to satisfy such separate judgment, and that the interest and claim of each person aforesaid, defendant herein, and all persons claiming any interest in said real estate or improvements, be forever barred and foreclosed.”

The People v. F. Mier et al.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Robert Robertson, for Appellant.

No brief on file.

W. W. Upton, District Attorney, for Respondent.

This is an action to foreclose a lien for taxes levied on the real estate described in the complaint in the year 1862, for State and county purposes, under the General Revenue Law (Statutes 1861, page 419.)

The statute last cited makes the tax a lien upon the property assessed, (§3,) and directs that an action be commenced to foreclose the lien, giving the form of the complaint, and providing for a decree and sale of the premises (§§3, 39, 40). The proceeding is by complaint and summons, and the proceedings in the action are governed by the Civil Practice Act, except as to the form of the complaint, and some statutory provisions as to the manner of the sale and the effect of the deed (§45.)

The Legislature of 1862 provided that a summons containing a description of the premises might be issued and be served by publication. Under the late organization of Courts in this State, actions were brought in Justice's Courts and in the District Court to enforce liens of this character, and the late Supreme Court invariably sustained the jurisdiction of each of these Courts, it then not being a material question whether they were law or equity cases. (People v. Pica, 1 Cal. 595; Mills v. Tukey, 22 Cal. 373; People v. Rains, 2 Cal. 128; People v. Todd, 23 Cal. 181; People v. Leet, 2 Cal. 161; Moss v. Mayo, 23 Cal. 481.) Under the present judiciary system it becomes material whether they are equity cases.

It seems that, except for the purposes of discovery and account, the ground of equity jurisdiction depends upon the final relief sought. In cases of accident, mistake, and trust the real ground of the interposition of a Court of equity is that of the inability of a Court of law to furnish an adequate remedy.

"A foreclosure is not within the province of remedies at law," (6 John. Ch. R. 248; Dimkley v. Van Buren, 8 ib. 330,) and for this reason, Judge Story, in speaking of mortgage, says: "From its very nature, the jurisdiction over it belongs peculiarly and exclusively to Courts of equity." (Story's Eq. Jur. 485.) The rights and duties of the parties plaintiff and defendant in this case differ from that of mortgagor and mortgagee, vendor and vendee, only in the manner of the creation of the right sought to be enforced

When an equitable right exists, the power of the Court to afford a remedy does not depend upon the origin of the right.

Equity affords relief in case of vendor's lien, although the lien and the vendor's right "stands independent of any such supposed argument." (Story's Eq. Jur. 1220.) And if a devise is made of real estate, charged with the payment of debts generally, it may be enforced by any one or more creditors, although there is no privity of contract between him and them. (Ib. 1244.)

These liens, as well as that of a mortgage, can be enforced only in Court of equity. (Ib. 1217.)

The citizen, as a member of the body politic, holds his property, and has it and his person protected, upon a trust that he will contribute his rateable proportion of the expense of such protection. He, like the vendee, owns the property — holds the fee.

At least, it is a charge upon the land, and the enforcement of it is a ground of equity jurisdiction. "A Court of equity holds pleas of all debts, incumbrances, and charges, on land, that affect it, or issue thereout." (3 Black. Com. 439.)

If this is an equity case, it can no more be dealt with by the County Court than by that of a Justice of the Peace; for by the Constitution the District Court has jurisdiction of all cases in equity. And if it were a proper subject, the Legislature has not conferred the jurisdiction.

The cases of Parsons v. Tuolumne County Water Co., 5 Cal. 431, Brock v. Bruce, 5 Cal. 279, McNeil v. Borland, 23 Cal. 144, and Van Winkle v. Stow, 23 Cal. 457, establish the position that even when the Legislature have attempted to confer such jurisdiction—if there is a remedy by action—if by filing a complaint and issuing summons, the ordinary Courts, either of law or equity, can afford the relief; it is not a “special case” within the Constitution.

These actions proceed upon complaint and summons under the ordinary machinery of the District Court, and the fact that the statutes (Laws 1862, p. 520, §§ 1, 8) provide an additional summons, to issue out of the same Court, in the same case, with the ordinary one, does not tend to make it a special case.

In Iowa, Courts of equity take jurisdiction of sales of land for taxes. (6 Clark, 179; 7 Clark, 512.)

And the same is done in Arkansas. (21 Howard, S. C. R. 381.)

H. H. Hartley, also for Respondent.

The enforcement of taxes is a proceeding in equity under our system.

It is not a common law action, because the common law Courts can only give judgment for the plaintiff or defendant in general terms. (Story's Eq. Juris. section 25, p. 22.)

And because in equity an answer is under oath, and generally not at law. (Id. section 31.)

Statute also requires an answer under oath in tax cases.

The most general if not precise description of a Court of Equity, in the English and American sense is, that it has jurisdiction in cases of rights recognized and protected by the municipal jurisprudence, where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy cannot be had in Courts of common law. (Story's Eq. Juris. section 33.)

of the Revenue Law of 1861, provides that "the rt shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity." And section 9 provides that the power of the Justice of the Peace "shall not in any case trench upon the jurisdiction of the several Courts of record."

It is insisted by the respondents that this action is a proceeding in equity, and as the District Court has jurisdiction in all cases in equity, and no jurisdiction in equity cases is expressly conferred by the Constitution upon any other Court, the jurisdiction is exclusive in the District Court, without regard to the amount in dispute, and that this action is therefore prosecuted in the proper Court.

If this action is a case in equity within the meaning of the constitutional provision under consideration, we think the conclusion of the respondents is correct. It becomes necessary, therefore, to determine the character of the action in this respect. It is not pretended that this particular action was known to Courts of equity; but it is claimed that although this is a statutory right, and the remedy for enforcing it is prescribed by the same statute giving the right, yet the character of the action is to be determined not from the origin of the remedy, but from the nature of the relief sought; and if the relief sought is analogous in form to the relief granted in Courts of equity, that then is a case in equity within the meaning of the Constitution. That under the statute the tax is a lien on the land; that the object of this proceeding is to foreclose the lien and procure a sale of the premises under a decree of the Court the nature of a decree to foreclose a mortgage, or to enforce a vendor's lien; and the form of the decree and nature of the relief sought being such as, under the old system, could have been obtained in a Court of Chancery only, the case must be one of equitable cognizance. It was assumed in the argument of this case that this action was brought under the Act of 1861 alone. The action contemplated by the Act referred to does not, in our view, embrace any element of equity jurisdiction, either in substance or in form. The Act does not appear to us to contemplate any special decree for t property, or any specific direction upon the sub-judgment. The land, as well as the owner, is owing the amount of the tax levied; and the as the owner, is made a defendant in the action purpose of enforcing the liability. Both the owner and are to be served with process. The prayer of plaint, prescribed by the Act, is for a judgment for money. If both owner and land are served with judgment may be rendered against both for such they may be respectively liable to pay. "Such stitute such a lien only as the judgment would create upon the other real estate of the party served; but if the land is served, the judgment against the land would be a lien upon it as against all claimants, whether known or unknown, and it is to secure this result that the land is authorized to be made a defendant. There would seem to be no good reason why any special order or direction for a sale of the premises made defendant in the action should be inserted in the judgment, any more than in a case where an attachment has been levied before judgment, and a specific lien on the property attached acquired for the security of the judgment when obtained; and none seems to be required or contemplated by the provisions of this Act.

The lien for taxes thus fixed and rendered certain by a judgment takes precedence of all other claims of every kind whatsoever. There are no conflicting claims to be determined or equities to be adjusted between the parties. No more land is to be sold on the execution than is sufficient to pay the judgment and costs, and there are no surplus proceeds to be distributed. The issues formed by the pleadings prescribed by the statutes are few and simple. There is nothing to be done in the proceedings except to try the few issues raised by the pleadings, and render a money judgment for the amount found due, either against the owner or the land, or both, as the exigencies of the case may require; and the judgment is to be enforced by execution, as in ordinary civil cases. If, then, the action depends upon the Act of 1861, without reference to any other, it is not a case in equity, and the amount claimed, being less than $300, the District Court would have no jurisdiction of the case. But it will be necessary to consider a subsequent Act.

In 1862 a second Act was passed relating to this subject. It does not purport to be an amendment to the Act of 1861 yet from its terms it evidently had some relation to that Act and was doubtless intended to be supplementary to it. It makes some further and different provisions in relation to and provides for a different mode of service of summons. The District Attorney is at liberty to pursue in these Acts of 1861 or 1862, at his option; for section 9 of the Act of 1861 provides that "the remedies authorized by this Act are cumulative and shall not be construed as prohibiting any remedy, or proceeding heretofore authorized."

The Act of 1862 prescribes no form for a complaint, but contemplates the various actions and proceedings already authorized by law, and doubtless contemplates that the pleadings provided for in other Acts may be used in connection with such actions as to the parties and service of process as are provided for in this Act, at the option of the District Attorney. Section 10 of the Act of 1862 also provides that "in hearing and trying an action for enforcement of a lien for taxes, in which it is pending shall have and exercise all the powers that pertain to Courts of equity in foreclosure of mortgages and liens; but when the decree of the Court contains special directions as to the mode of selling, no more property shall be sold than is necessary to pay the judgment and costs, nor shall the property be sold for less than the value of the judgment and costs." (Laws 1862, p. 523.) This provision seems to contemplate that under the several Acts authorizing a decree foreclosing the lien for taxes already provided for with specific directions for selling the land, and prescribing the mode of sale, or that a money judgment, without special directions, may be had at the option of the District Attorney.

It also contemplates that, in some cases where special directions for a sale are given in the decree, more property shall be sold than sufficient to pay the taxes, and that there may be a surplus to be distributed. It was the province of Courts of equity to take cognizance of liens on real estate. The forms of proceedings in those Courts were adapted to this purpose, and to adjusting the conflicting and cross equities of the different parties. In decrees of foreclosure provision was made foreclosing and enforcing the lien already existing, with specific directions for a sale of the land, and the application of the proceeds in satisfaction of the lien, according to the exigencies of the case. But at law, only a money judgment could be entered. The judgment, when entered, might become a lien upon real estate in modes prescribed by law, to be enforced by execution. The different jurisdictions proceeded upon different theories. In equity cases, there was a specific lien already existing, which was to be perfected and enforced by a decree peculiar to that Court, containing special directions for a sale of the property. At law, there was only a general money demand, which was to be ascertained by the judgment; and when so ascertained, the judgment itself might become a lien upon land, to be enforced by execution. In one of the cases contemplated by the several Acts under consideration, the proceeding goes upon the former theory, and the Court, in rendering its decree, is to "have and exercise all the powers that pertain to Courts of equity in the foreclosure of mortgages and liens;" and the proceeding is essentially, in substance and form, a "case in equity." In the other case, the proceeding is upon the latter theory, and is in substance and form a case at law. At this day, under our system of practice, these distinctions may seem of little moment, and they doubtless were so at the time these several Acts were passed. So far as the recovery of the taxes is concerned, the same result is sought in either mode, and probably the judgment in either form of the proceeding would be equally efficacious in attaining that result. It would seem to be a matter of little practical consequence whether a lien already existing is foreclosed and enforced as such, or whether a money judgment becomes an original lien taking effect by relation from the time of the assessment, or even at what period of time the lien commences to operate, since from the moment the lien for taxes attaches, whether by judgment or otherwise, it takes precedence of all other liens or claims upon the land, and can only be discharged by payment.

But in adopting the amendments to the Constitution, the

The People v. F. Mier et als.

It seems fit to retain the terms law and equity in that case, and to make the principles upon which these departments proceed, the test of jurisdiction. In this view, the distinction becomes important. The result under the constitution and the several statutes as they now stand, the District and Justices' Courts, in tax cases, where the amount claimed is less than $300, have or have not jurisdiction, depending upon the nature of the judgment sought by the District Attorney in his complaint. The form of complaint is prescribed by the statute, and the facts required to be alleged in that form are all that are necessary to authorize either a judgment foreclosing the lien already existing, with an order of sale and special execution, as authorized by the Act of 1862, or a money judgment, as contemplated by the Act of 1861. The character of the case, therefore, must be determined by the prayer of the complaint.

In the present case, the prayer of the complaint is for a declaration of the lien, and for a sale of the premises. The same also follows the prayer of the complaint. We are correct in the view we have taken of the several provisions of the Constitution under consideration, that this is an equity case, and the District Court has jurisdiction.

When the question is not presented by this record, it is well before leaving this branch of the case to consider some other provision of the Constitution, which, under certain circumstances, may also determine the jurisdiction in the collection of taxes under the revenue laws of this State.

Section 3, Article VI, also provides that "the District Courts have original jurisdiction * * * in all cases at law and equity to enforce the legality of any tax, impost, assessment or municipal fine," etc.

The revenue Act of 1861 provides that in the answer to the writ in a suit for taxes, only certain matters specified in filed his petition in the County Court, in pursuance of the statute, for the purpose of contesting the election. The hearing of the case was set for the 12th of December, and a special term of the Court appointed for that purpose. On the 12th of December an affidavit was filed on the part of the relator, showing that the relator and respondent are first cousins of the wife of the Judge before whom the proceeding was pending; and on this affidavit the relator moved the Court for a change of the place of trial to the County of Los Angeles, or some other county on the ground of disqualification of the Judge to hear the case by reason of this relationship.

On the same day the respondent filed his answer, in which among other things, he alleged that a similar proceeding had before been commenced by the same party in the same Court and for the same object; that upon the motion of respondent the said proceeding had been dismissed; that the relator had appealed from the judgment and order of dismissal; that said appeal was still pending and undetermined, and that there was, therefore, another suit pending between the same parties for the same cause of action. Upon which answer he prayed that the petition of the relator be dismissed. In the answer the respondent refers to the record of the former proceeding and prays that he may have leave to make the original or certified copies of the same a part of his answer; but he does not annex copies, or in any other mode than as above stated make them parts of the answer. The answer also contained defenses on the merits of the case. There does not appear to have been any trial of the issues thus formed. On the 12th of December, the day previously appointed for the hearing, when the relator's counsel moved for a change of the place of trial as above stated, the respondent's counsel made a counter motion to dismiss the case on the pleadings, upon the ground that there was another action pending between the same parties for the same cause. Both motions were argued and submitted at the same time, and taken under advisement. On the 19th of December the Judge filed his decision in which, referring to the two motions, he says: The petitioner moves a change of venue on the ground of the incompetency of the Judge of this Court to both parties. The respondent claims that 'a change of the place of trial in which on its face discloses there is nothing to try, is oppressive,' and further insists that 'an examination in bar has nothing to do with a trial of the action.' A careful examination of the statute which gives the trial jurisdiction in the case, section 63, it appears to be between an examination of the pleadings and a trial of the case."

The Judge then states the former proceeding, and that the same was made a part of the answer — that from this it appears that the appeal in that proceeding is still pending — and adds: "In the present position of the case, the rule must be that where two suits are commenced for the same action, the former may be pleaded in abatement of the latter."

The action is dismissed."

The foregoing quotation and order contain all that was said, and is the only order entered in the case after the arguing to the motion for change of the place of trial.

The notice of appeal filed on the same day states "that the respondent appeals * * * from the judgment and order refusing to change the place of trial therein made and entered in said case * * * in favor of said respondent and against said petitioner and from the whole thereof."

The order in form was made refusing to change the place of trial. The Judge did not formally pass upon the motion. In the case and ordering it to be dismissed, the Judge, as appears from the foregoing quotations from his decision, does not imply, if he does not directly admit, his incompetency to the parties, and adopts the theory of the case to the effect that there is a distinction between a change of venue and examining the pleadings to see if there is anything to be tried which would render it necessary to send the case to another county for trial; and that, although he was not qualified to sit in the former case, yet he might determine the latter question. Having satisfied himself that there was nothing to try, he concluded that it was unnecessary to send the case to another county, and dismissed the action. The dismissal of the action, under these circumstances, necessarily involved the refusal to transfer, although no formal order denying the motion was entered. There were two motions pending—a motion to change the venue, and a cross-motion to dismiss. Both were argued and submitted at the same time. The latter motion was granted, and the case dismissed without any formal order as to the former. This was a virtual denial of the motion to change the venue. But whether it is or not, the relator claims that it was error in the Court below to render a judgment of dismissal in the case when it was made to appear on the record that the Judge was prohibited from acting by reason of relationship to the parties, and while a motion for a change of the place of trial was pending. This is one of the errors assigned. The affidavit in the record, showing that the wife of the Judge is cousin to both relator and respondent, is uncontradicted—and the Judge, for the purposes of his decision, assumes it to be true.

For the purposes of this decision we must, therefore, assume the relationship to exist. The relator claims that the degree of relationship must be computed by the canon law, which is followed by the common law; while the respondent insists that the computation shall be by the rules of the civil law. If the former rule is adopted, the parties are within—if the latter, without—the prohibited degree. At an early day the common law was adopted as the rule of decision in this State; and the rule of the common law prevails except as to those particulars in which modifications have been made by statute. In the statute relating to descent and distribution, the rule of computation which prevails under the civil law has been adopted; but the statute does not purport to extend the rule beyond the purposes contemplated by that Act. The late Supreme Court so held in several cases, and we are satisfied rule as laid down by them is correct. (Ord v. De, 18 Cal. 67; De la Guerra v. Burton, 23 Cal. 592.) Eighty-seven of the Act concerning Courts of Justice that "a Judge shall not act as such in any of the following cases: * * * When he is related to either by consanguinity or affinity within the third degree. But this section shall not apply to the arrangement of the docket or the regulation of the order of business." These are the only exceptions mentioned in the Act. Section twenty-four of the Practice Act authorizes the Court to change the place where, when, from any cause, the Judge is disqualified from sitting in the action." These are mere formal matters, and determine no question in dispute between the parties in affecting the merits of the controversy. But, beyond this, the Judge is totally disqualified from sitting in the case. Even if no objection is made, he has no right to act, and, of his own motion, to decline to sit as Judge. In Aspinwall, 4 N. Y. 514, where a Judge sat in the case at the earnest solicitation of the party most interested in the result, and with the consent of both parties, it was held that the judgment which depended upon his concurrence was void.

In the present case, the Judge thought the section of the Act under which he was proceeding made a distinction between trying the case and examining the pleadings and deciding from them the question whether the action ought to be dismissed or not, and upon this ground thought himself authorized to make the order of dismissal. But in this he was mistaken.

His act was a judicial act — one that required consideration and the exercise of his judgment. It was, therefore, an act that he was not competent to perform. The dismissal of the proceeding was void on the ground of incompetency of the Judge to act, and the refusal to change the order of trial erroneous. But, conceding the action of the Judge in dismissing the case to be void on the ground stated, he insisted that if he determined the case correctly upon the merits this Court will order the same judgment to be entered. If the proceedings below were void for want of jurisdiction in the Judge to act in the case, this Court could hardly be expected to assume original jurisdiction and order a judgment. But there is nothing before this Court to enable it to determine the right of the matter. The record of the former case forms no part of the answer in this proceeding. Records and papers cannot be made a part of a pleading by merely referring to them, and praying that they may be taken as a part of such pleading, without annexing the originals or copies as exhibits, or incorporating them with it so as to form a part of the record in the case.

But, if considered as a part of the answer, still, the question cannot be determined upon the pleadings. The pleadings raised an issue. The new matter in the answer, under the Practice Act, is deemed to be controverted, and, in this case, the new matter set up in abatement raised an issue, which required proof, like any other issue. The issue must be tried, and the facts found, before the answer can be assumed to be true. In the trial of one case the Court can no more take judicial notice of the record in another case in the same Court, without its formal introduction in evidence, than if it were a record in another Court; much less can this Court take notice of the existence of a record not introduced in evidence in the Court below. There was no trial in this case, but the question was determined upon an inspection of the pleadings — and the proceedings in the first case are improperly in the record.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

CONCURRED, IN ERROR.—Mandamus will not lie to compel a party to proceed with the trial of an action after an order has been made for the place of trial. The remedy, if an injury is sustained, is by writ from the final judgment.

question is a plain one, and is, "Had the District Judge the right or power to change place of trial?"

And, of course that ends the matter—while if he had been entitled to a direction from this Court to the Judge to proceed with the cause, notwithstanding his illegal conduct, per force, he would set aside in the exercise of his legitimate power than that used by him in granting it.

There is no question of discretion in this case, because the facts are that the defendant had failed to bring himself within the statute, and we urged that a mistaken notion of the law was not either a cause for a change of venue, or a reason why the plaintiff should incur the expense and delay incident to a removal out of his county.

We do not understand that it is possible to review this order after judgment, or that if we could, it would afford any relief.

The remedy lies when the remedy by appeal is not plain, and is inadequate.

And, at the trial in the new county, get judgment for the damages which we claim, or we may get as much as we can by law warrants, or as much as we could get on a re-

The People v. Warren T. Sexton.

In the first event, we would not appeal, nor in the second or suppose the defendant should satisfy the claim just before the trial in the new county, no appeal would lie.

The fact is, that there is no remedy but that of mandamus to compel the observance of plaintiff's right, and I have not seen any case that decides to the contrary.

The cases cited upon the brief of opposite counsel do not touch the point. (7 Cal. 253.)

The life of the objectionable order in this cause was attacked when we moved the Court below to disregard it. It has no more foundation in law than if a Judge, having the power to punish a litigant for contempt by a limited fine or imprisonment, should order him hung; all that could be said against such an order applies to the order in this cause; in one case the Judge would exceed his statutory authority, and so it would be in the other.

These questions of venue at common law always went to the jurisdiction. (1 Chitty's Pleadings, 284; 12 Wendell, 51, 265; 6 Hill, 475.)

H. H. Hartley, for Respondent.

By the Court, CUREY, J.

An action was commenced in November, 1863, in the District Court in and for the County of Butte, by L. Meminger plaintiff, against Joseph Gluckauf, defendant, for the recovery of a debt of about two thousand dollars. The plaintiff had applied by petition to this Court for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the Judge of said District Court, commanding him to proceed to the trial of said action, in its order, in the County of Butte. The petition shows that the action was commenced and the Court acquired jurisdiction of the parties in the mode provided by law, and that, after an issue of fact was joined in the suit, at a term of the District Court held in said county, in December, 1863, the defendant applied to the Court, on an affidavit, to change the place of the trial of

The People v. Warren T. Sexton.

from the County of Butte to some adjoining district ground that he could not obtain a fair and impartial trial in said county, because the plaintiff and others, considering "to prejudice the public mind in Butte County and vicinity" respecting the matters in issue joined between the plaintiff and defendant, had been busily circulating a report in such county, deemed injurious and prejudicial to his interests and dignity as litigant in said District Court; and because, second, of his opinion and belief, he could not have a fair and impartial trial of said cause before the Judge of said District Court, either on questions of law or fact, on account of the prejudice of the Judge against the defendant.
The plaintiff held the affidavit on which the defendant based his application for the change of the place of trial to be insufficient, stating that he was not conscious of any bias or prejudice on the part of any reason or fact on which the defendant could rely, and such an opinion or belief, decided that under the circumstances of the imputation thus made, though general in character, he was unwilling to try the cause, and, therefore, granted the application and ordered the place of trial changed from the County Court for Butte County to the District Court for the County of Yuba.

After changing the place of trial having been made, the plaintiff, by his attorney, requested the Court to set the trial; whereupon the Judge thereof refused to comply with the request, and declared that he would not try the cause, nor at any other time. To the decision granting the application for changing the place of trial, and to the refusal of the Court to try the cause, the plaintiff duly excepted.
The facts here stated are set forth in the petition and papers annexed, as a part thereof.

In this state of facts and circumstances the question is presented:

Is the petitioner entitled to the writ for which he prays?
Provided by statute that the writ of mandamus may be issued by any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person,

The People v. Warren T. Sexton.

to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station; and that the writ shall be issued in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. (Practice Act, sections 467 and 468.)

The duty of a District Judge to proceed with the trial of causes pending in his Court is a duty resulting from the office which he holds; and whenever it appears that he refuses so to do, it is not to be doubted that this Court possesses the power to require him, by mandamus, to proceed to the performance of such duty. But the exercise of this jurisdiction depends upon conditions which must be found to exist in every case before the Court will issue its mandate. If the subordinate officer or tribunal has refused to perform a positive duty resulting from his office, or by some act equivalent to a refusal has manifested such an intention, it becomes the duty of this Court, upon proper application, to issue its mandate to compel the performance of such duty, provided there is not open to the party aggrieved a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the due course of law.

In the matter before us it is necessary to determine, in the first instance, whether or not the action above entitled was pending in the District Court for Butte County when the defendant presented to this Court his petition; for if the action had then been transferred by lawful authority to Yuba County for trial, it follows that the Judge against whom the writ of mandamus is sought is under no duty to try such action. This seems to be conceded on the part of the petitioner; but it is argued that the order changing the place of trial was not warranted by the proof of any facts whatever as cause for the change; and that, therefore, the order was a nullity, leaving the action still pending in the District Court where it was commenced. This position is for the petitioner a necessity, as a surrender of it would be an abandonment of his application. It may be admitted that the defendant in the action did not by his affidavit show any cause for a change of the place of trial, does not result from this that the Court had not to grant the change upon the defendant's applica-ing the order changing the venue, the Court acted upon a matter within its cognizance. By this order, the trial of the action became changed from Butte county. If, thereby, error intervened, to the petitioner, it cannot be corrected by means of the writ of (The People v. The Judges of Duchess County, 20)

The People v. Warren T. Sexton.

v. Blackstone Canal Company, 10 Pick. 244, the applied for a mandamus to County Commissioners, to n to allow him certain legal costs, to which he was on an assessment of damages to his land by reason of construction of a reservoir to the Blackstone Canal. denied the application, holding, in effect, that when the tribunal had acted in a judicial capacity upon a matter properly before it, its determination could not be corrected by means of the writ of mandamus. In that case the Court said: "The writ lies either to compel a subordinate tribunal to exercise their functions and render some judgment in cases before them, when otherwise there would be a denial of justice from delay or refusal to act. But when the act done is judicial or discretionary, the Court will not interfere, and that decision shall be made."

case of The King v. The Justices of Monmouthshire.

Ryl. 334, a petition was made to the Court of Common Pleas for a mandamus to the Justices of Monmouthshire to compel them to enter continuances and hear and determine an appeal which the Justices, being equally divided upon one trial, had failed to decide; and having thus refused, an application was made to them to continue the trial to the next sessions. The Justices refused to grant the continuances, but instead thereof quashed the appeal.

J., with whom Justices Bayley and Holroyd concurred, refused the application for a mandamus, saying:

The People v. Warren T. Sexton.

"When the sessions forbear to give any judgment at all, the Court will interpose to compel them to go on and pronounce judgment; but when they have actually given judgment, even under a mistake of law, this Court has never yet interposed to disturb their decision. In form, this is an application to enter continuances and hear and determine the appeal; but it is in substance an application to expunge the proceedings which the Justices have already taken." (See, also the following authorities: 18 Wend. 89; 1 Denio, 645; 3 Binney, 273; 5 id. 103; Halstead, 58; 2 Bibb, 573.)

The writ of mandamus, which, under our statute, may be directed to a subordinate judicial tribunal to compel performance of a duty enjoined by law, is like the writ of procedendo ad iudicium at common law, which issued out of the Court of Chancery, commanding, in the name of the sovereign, the Judges who failed to give judgment in any suit before them when it was their duty so to do, to proceed to judgment. But the command was not to give any particular judgment; for that, if erroneous, could be set aside in the course of appeal, or by writ of error, or false judgment. (1 Black. Com. 109.)

If the Court should grant the writ in this case, it would, in effect, be a reversal of the order granted changing the place of trial, or the expunging of the order, as a judicial proceeding, from the records where it is entered. This we cannot do. The defendant, upon an affidavit, made in the action in which the Court below had jurisdiction, applied for a change of the place of the trial of the cause. The application being made, it was the duty of the Court to hear, consider, and decide it. This duty the Court performed, and in so doing acted judicially. If, by the decision made, the plaintiff in the case sustained injury, the remedy for it is, in legal contemplation, plain, speedy, and adequate, by appeal after final judgment. (People v. Stillman, 7 Cal. 117; De Barry v. Lambert, 10 Cal. 503.)

The application for a writ of mandamus must be denied.

therefore, be improper to do so. The case was tried by the Court, and on the findings of fact as presented in the record the alleged trust, confessedly, cannot be upheld. Neither of the findings of the Court contain any facts showing by conclusion that the legal title to the premises is in the defendant, and we are therefore confined to the appeal from the order refusing a new trial.

The motion for a new trial was based upon surprise, newly discovered evidence, and errors of law occurring at the trial.

We shall limit ourselves to the single point of "surprise."

The plaintiffs, at the trial, to make out their title as the representatives of Sebastian Rodriguez, relied upon a patent issued to him by the United States, based upon an inchoate title or grant made to him by Governor Alvarado in the year 1837.

The defendants, who claimed an older and better title than that—derived from Alexander Rodriguez, brother of Sebastian—introduced a certain petition, signed by Sebastian and Alexander, addressed to Governor Gutierrez, and dated September 30th, 1836, tending to prove that they had been in the joint possession of the premises in controversy for eight years prior to said date; and further, tending to prove that such possession had been taken and held by them under a grant made in their favor; and also introduced a certain other petition of Sebastian to Governor Alvarado on the 27th of September, 1837, together with the deposition of Maximo Martinez, both tending to prove that the written evidence of such concession by Governor Arguello had been lost, and that such grant was made by him to Alexander and Sebastian jointly, in the year 1823. Thereafter, the defendants called Victorine Martin to the stand, for the purpose of proving a delivery of juridical possession to the two brothers jointly, in 1823, by Maria Estrada, Commander of Monterey, he acting therein by order of Governor Arguello.

The witness, on being interrogated, testified that many years ago, and during the time that Arguello was Governor port of the motion of defendants for a new trial, a of affidavits were filed, and were read in the Court the hearing. From these affidavits it appears as fact that Comstock, one of the defendants, had been by the witness, some time before the trial, that he, ss, was present at the time when juridical possession ered by Estrada of the Balsa del Pajaro, and that the was to Alexander and Sebastian; and it further apt the defendants relied upon Martinez as a witness to prove that fact on the trial of this action. It appears that a short time before the witness was essential ceremony when there was any uncertainty as to the precise bounds of the land granted, and involved a definite ascertainment of the land to be delivered, and for that purpose required a survey and measurement—in other words, a location of the land.”

We furthermore consider that the defendants were surprised by the failure of their witness, and in the sense in which the term “surprise” is used in the law of new trials. The parties applied to the witness seasonably in advance, and he then asserted that within his personal knowledge and recollection the fact in relation to which he was interrogated was with them. The defendants secured his attendance at the trial, together with that of an interpreter. When the witness was needed he was called to the stand, and on being inquired of, he completely defeated the just expectations that he had previously excited. It is of no moment, in our judgment, that the defendants did not, at that stage of the trial, move for a continuance; for at that time they did not know, and therefore could have given no assurances to the Court, that a continuance would enable them to retrieve the disaster that had befallen them.

In Wilson v. Brandon, 8 Geo. 136, after verdict for the plaintiff, defendant moved for a new trial because his witness, by mistake, failed to prove a fact to make out his defense, (the witness having previously assured the defendant that he could and would do so,) whereby the defendant was prevented from procuring other testimony to prove the same fact. Held, that such mistake operated as a surprise on the defendant, and that he was entitled to a new trial.

In Levy v. Brown, 11 Ark. 16, in a trial on a note, a witness for defendant swore that it was usurious. On appeal, the same witness testified to a different state of facts, and a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff. Held, that the defendant was entitled to a new trial on the ground of surprise.

APPEAL from the District Court, Second Judicial District Santa Barbara County.

On the 12th day of December, 1860, one H. C. Peters died leaving an estate, mostly in Santa Barbara County, of which at the time of his death, he was a resident, and also leaving a will, in which the plaintiff and the defendant were named as joint executors.

On the 6th day of February, 1861, the will was admitted to probate in the Probate Court of Santa Barbara County, and the executors qualified soon after, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of their trust. On the 2d day of January 1862, the defendant, D. W. Ap Jones, filed in the Probate Court his final account, and notice of the time and place of settling the account was duly given. On the 30th day of January, 1862, the Probate Court settled the account, and allowed the defendant the sum of $674.42 for commissions as executor, and the sum of $337.21, for extraordinary services, which it seems the defendant retained out of funds that came into his hands from the estate.

No one objected to defendant's account in the Probate Court, nor was the plaintiff's name mentioned, either in the petition or decree.

The plaintiff did not file any account in the Probate Court, nor did he appear in the Probate Court and claim any allowance for commissions or services in the settlement of the estate.

When an executor has done nothing, and has borne no responsibility, he should not share in the commissions. (Same case; Kenan v. Hall, 8 Geo. 417; Hall v. Wilson, 14 Ala. 295; Fall v. Simmons, 6 Geo. 265.)

Eugene Lies, for Respondent.

We attack no part of the decree of the Probate Court. The question of compensation was adjudicated, but not the proportional share of each executor. The act of one executor in obtaining compensation is the act of both. (Probate Practice Act, §49; see §47, Act of 1857.) Co-executors are one person. (Williams Ex. 201.) Probate by one inures to the benefit of all. (Ib. 318.)

The case of Stephenson v. Phillips is not in point. There the question of proportional share of commissions was directly adjudicated in the Court of Orphans. (1 N. J. 70.) Co-executors are jointly liable. (Lees v. Sanderson, 4 Sim. 28; Lomax on Executors, 2, 491.)

Their bond is joint and several. (Probate Act, §73.) Appellant cannot claim that he alone administered. He had no right to do so. (Probate Act, §49.)

The decree of Probate Court only adjudicates one thing—that is, the amount of compensation. (Williams Ex. 201.)

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

The partnership relation does not exist between co-executors, and they have no joint interest in the commission allowed by law for their services in administering upon the estate. They are not each entitled to an equal share merely upon the naked ground of their relation to each other. The share to which they are respectively entitled is to be determined on entirely different considerations. In other words, their respective portions are not ascertained by any established rule of law, but upon the principles of equity. The compensation and of service must be the same, or as the circumstances of the case will permit. Each is to be paid with the full amount of the assets which may be in his hands, and is entitled to be credited with all disbursements legally made on behalf of the estate. Each may keep a separate account, and present the same for final settlement. They are only entitled to share and share alike where their contributions and services have been equal. One who takes charge upon himself touching the estate or any part thereof collects no debts, makes no disbursements, and thus he who takes no service whatever, is not entitled to any share in the allowance.

The appellant seems to have rendered some service, and was entitled to some portion of the commissions, but sought his relief in the wrong forum. He should have applied to the Probate Court. If, as he contends, the allowance to the appellant inures to his benefit, and the decree of the Probate Court does not assume to pass upon the question of apportionment, but only determines the amount of allowance, it follows that the question of apportionment is still open, and he might and should have applied to the court for a further and supplemental decree, designating the share to each his proper share. Then, upon the refusal of the appellant—the money being in his hands—to pay his share, he might have maintained this action.

The Probate Court has no jurisdiction over the allowance of the commissions of executors and administrators, and if it can interfere at all with the decree of the court, it can only do so as a Court of Chancery, and not further than to set aside the decree on the ground of error or other like ground of equitable interference, and direct the parties to make another settlement in the Probate Court. See Searles et al. v. Scott, Administrator, etc., 14 S. & M. 1. It is doubtful whether it could interfere, even in such a case, unless all opportunity to move in the Probate Court to open the account, or appeal from the decree, has been exhausted. Until this has happened, it would seem the power of the Probate Court and the right of appeal are adequate to the relief sought.

Under the view we have taken of this case, it becomes unnecessary to pass directly upon the question as to whether the decree of the Probate Court awarding all of the commissions to the appellant was a bar to this action.

There may be some doubt as to whether the respondent was a party to that decree or not. The appellant filed, as he has a right to do, a separate account, in which the existence of co-executor was entirely ignored. The respondent did not appear, and, consequently, took no part in the proceedings and it is possible that he is not included among the persons described in the 237th section of the Probate Act, against whom the settlement and allowance of the account is there declared to be conclusive. It is sufficient to say that the whole subject matter belongs to the jurisdiction of the Probate Court, and the Court below ought to have dismissed the case upon that ground.

The judgment is reversed, and the Court below directed to dismiss the action.

Court, CURREY, J.

This case was called in its order on the calendar, the day, by his counsel, in pursuance of notice given for the purpose, moved the Court to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the copy of the notice of appeal was served on the respondent's attorneys two days before the notice was filed in the Clerk's office of the Court wherein the appeal was made, and order from which it was desired to appeal were made. The record shows that the notice of appeal was filed on the 23rd day of July, 1863, and that a duplicate thereof was served on the respondent's attorneys on the 25th day of July, 1863, and that on the day of the filing of the notice of appeal, executed on the 25th of July, was three hundred and thirty-seventh section of the Practice Act provides that an appeal in a civil case shall be made by filing with the Clerk of the Court in which the judgment appealed from is entered a notice stating the appeal, and the part thereof, or some specific part thereof, and serving a copy of the notice upon the adverse party or his attorney. This section of the statute the filing of the notice of appeal is made a constituent element of its character as a condition precedent and consequently must precede or be contemporaneous with the service of a copy of the notice on the adverse party, and that which may purport to be a copy of a notice, or a copy thereof, fails to be such for the want of an original copy. This section of the Act does not provide, in addition, within what time the copy of the notice must be served; but is ordered in connection with sections three hundred and forty-eight, three hundred and forty-nine, three hundred and fifty, and three hundred and fifty-two of the Act, requiring an undertaking to be executed and filed, or a deposit made as therein specified, to render the appeal effectual, and also in connection with section three hundred and fifty-five, which gives to the respondent five days after the filing of the undertaking within which to except to the sufficiency of the sureties therein named, it follows that the copy of the notice filed must be served on the proper party before or at the time of filing the undertaking. This construction is rendered imperative in order to secure to the respondent the full five days from the filing of the undertaking within which to except to the sufficiency of the sureties. To comply with these provisions of the Act is a matter of no inconvenience because of the residence of the attorneys of the respective parties in different places, inasmuch as the Act provides a mode of service by mail in such case, at once convenient and effectual. (Practice Act, Sections 520, 521, 522.)

In Warner v. Holman, 24 Cal. 228, the late Supreme Court first determined that the judgment in that case ought to be affirmed, and then proceeded to consider the objection made by respondent's counsel, after having argued the case upon its merits, to the effect that the copy of the notice of appeal was served three days before the notice itself was filed with the Clerk of the Court below. The record disclosed the fact to be in accordance with the objection; upon which the Court ordered the appeal dismissed. On a rehearing, this Court, doubting the correctness of the judgment dismissing the appeal, directed the judgment to be vacated, on the ground, though the opinion in the case does not express it, that the respondent, by counsel, had appeared and argued the case upon its merits, whereby he became estopped from denying that a copy of the notice of appeal had been served at the proper time, notwithstanding the record failed to show a copy of the notice duly served. In this case the respondent has not become concluded by his appearance, which is only for the purpose of making an application to dismiss the appeal for the cause stated; decision of this Court in Warner against Holman is correct, when understood, inconsistent with the rule laid down in this case.

Eugene B. Buffendeau v. Powhattan E. Edmondson.

Appellant having failed to serve on the respondent a copy of the notice of appeal filed on his behalf, and by the statute, the motion should be granted, and dismissed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

Court, CURREY, J., on petition for rehearing.

Defendant, by his counsel, has applied to this Court to rehear the motion heretofore made on behalf of defendant to dismiss the appeal in this case. This application is based on the third section of the Act of 1861, entitled "to regulate appeals in this State," which reads as follows: "No appeal shall be dismissed for insufficiency of the notice of appeal or undertaking thereon; provided, that a good undertaking, approved by a Judge of the Supreme Court, be filed in the Supreme Court before the motion to dismiss the appeal, and upon payment of reasonable costs as the Court may adjudge; provided, that the respondent shall not be delayed, but may move when he is regularly called for the disposition or dismissal of the appeal, if such undertaking be not given." (Laws of 1861, as amended by defendant's counsel that this Court has not refused to dismiss an appeal for insufficiency of the notice, and that on that reason the judgment of dismissal should be reversed and the cause restored to the calendar. The section of the Act of 1861 above cited presupposes the existence of an appeal, to which the word insufficiency stands in no relation. The question of the insufficiency of the notice is not involved in the determination of the motion to dismiss the appeal; but the point made by the party moving, that the notice was considered by the Court, was that the proceeding under the 337th section of the Practice Act requires that an order to constitute an appeal, had not been taken.

Anita Lewis and Joseph W. Chard v. S. D. Johns et. al.

The construction which the counsel claims for the Act of 1861 would give it the effect to abrogate the conditions which the fact of a subsisting appeal must of necessity depend upon. In our view, the Act of 1861 was intended to relieve appellants from the results which, without it, would be likely to happen in consequence of defects of form and deficiencies of substance apparent on the face of notices of appeal; but we cannot find in this Act any authority for excusing, in any case, the performance of the acts necessary to effect an appeal in accordance with the provisions of the 337th section of the Practice Act—viz: the filing and service of notice—and without the performance of which acts the appellate Court could not acquire jurisdiction.

The petition for a rehearing must be denied.

Mr. Justice SHAFER, having been of counsel in another case involving a like question, did not sit on the trial of this.

SAWYER, J., expressed no opinion.

WIFE — SEPARATE PROPERTY OF.—All property which can be shown by satisfactory testimony to belong to the separate estate of the wife, whether real, personal, or mixed, and all the rents, issues, profits, and increase thereon, are, under section fourteen of Article XI, of the Constitution, sacred to the use and enjoyment of the wife, and cannot be held to answer for the debts of the husband.

HUSBAND — RIGHT TO WIFE'S PROPERTY.—No legal or beneficial interest in the use or enjoyment of the wife's separate property passes, by the fact of marriage, to the husband, and the wife's right of property in the same is as complete after marriage as while a feme sole.

SAME.—The husband cannot by any independent act of his acquire an interest in the separate estate of the wife, nor by his supervision or labor can he acquire any interest in the increase of the same.

HUSBAND'S LABOR ON WIFE'S PROPERTY.—In the absence of an express agreement to that effect, there is no implied obligation on the part of the wife to compensate the husband for his supervision of and labor bestowed upon her separate property.

band. In the case at bar, however, the crop produced upon the wife's land was the direct result of the work and labor, the enterprise and credit, of the husband. Hence, the case can have no bearing on the one at bar.

But, not only is the doctrine contended for by respondents the law of California, but equally so in all civil law countries whose systems are identical, or nearly so with ours. Such is the French, Spanish, and Mexican civil law; such the law of Louisiana, and such the law of Texas. Domat White, in his Nov. Recop., Brown, in his Civil Law of Spain and Mexico, and innumerable decisions in Louisiana and Texas, affirm the principle, whilst there is really nothing to cause us to doubt it.

By the Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

William G. Chard—the father of Anita Lewis and Joseph W. Chard, the first being a married woman, and the latter a minor, plaintiffs and appellants in this case—in consideration of natural love and affection, conveyed to his said children the tract of land described in the complaint, in December, 1860. After the conveyance, Anita Lewis, and her husband, E. J. Lewis, moved upon the land in question, and resided on it from that time until the commission of the trespass alleged in the complaint, cultivating and farming the same. In 1862, a crop of wheat was raised upon about one hundred and thirty acres of the land, amounting, as charged in the complaint, to about four thousand bushels. At the time of the alleged trespass, about forty acres of this crop was cut and lying on the field, and the remainder standing ready to be harvested. When in this condition the crop was levied upon by the respondent S. D. Johns, Sheriff of the county, at the suit of his co-defendants against the husband, E. J. Lewis, alone, and upon his separate liability. Anita Lewis and Joseph W. Chard, by their guardian ad litem, William G. Chard, sued for damages laid in the complaint at $3,675. The case was tried by the Court without the intervention of a jury.

In addition to the facts already stated, the Court found that ing business was carried on ostensibly in the name of E. J. Lewis; that he employed men, purchased seed, and made contracts to be paid out of the proceeds of the growing crop; that he superintended the farm labor, and did some himself; that there was no showing of any interest by Joseph W. Chard in the business of the farm, and the statement of the husband, Lewis, 'that the farm was run on by his wife and Joseph W. Chard.'"

The judgment was for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. The court below does not find as a fact that the suits against the defendants, under which the Sheriff made his levy, arose out of transactions connected with the farming business, and for the purposes of this opinion we shall assume that they did.

The story of the respondents is that the crop of wheat in question although raised upon land which was the separate property of the wife, was the common property of both, and therefore to be taken in execution for the husband's debts; that the common property of both, the husband at least had an interest in the crop, which could be seized and sold in execution; and unless one branch or the other of this theory be maintained, it is evident that the judgment must be reversed.

In Wright v. Ransom, 15 Cal. 322, the late Supreme Court held so much of the 9th section of the Act defining the rights of husband and wife as declares the rents and profits of the real estate of the wife to be common property as is in violation of the Constitution. Justice Baldwin, who delivered the opinion of the Court, said: "We think the Legislature has exceeded its constitutional power to say that the fruits of the labor of the wife shall be taken from her, and given to the husband and his creditors. If the constitutional provision be construed in favor of the wife against the exercise of this power, there would seem to exist of a right of property in one half of all beneficial interest; the barren right to hold in fee and the beneficial right to enjoy in the husband. The object of the provision was to protect the wife against the improvidence of the husband; but this object would wholly fail, in many instances, if the estate of the wife were reduced to a mere reversionary interest, to be of no avail to her except in the contingency of her surviving husband." There the property, which it was sought to subject to the payment of the husband's debts, was dividends, due from a corporation to the wife, upon certain shares of stock held by her as separate estate. Although the property in the present case is different in kind, it has a common origin, and is likewise the fruit of a separate estate.

We are unable to perceive any difference in principle between the two cases. Carried to its logical conclusions, the doctrine announced in George v. Ransom must afford a shield to the separate estate of the wife, in whatever form it may assume, against the attacks of the husband or his creditors. Under that doctrine, all property which can be shown to belong to the separate estate of the wife, by satisfactory testimony, whether the same be real, personal, or mixed, and all the rents, issues, profits, and increase thereof, whether the same be the fruit of trade and commerce, of loans and investments, or the spontaneous production of the soil, or wrested from it by the hand of industry, is, under the Constitution, sacred to the use and enjoyment of the wife, and cannot be held to answer for the debts of the husband.

The manifest object of the framers of the Constitution was to protect the wife, as well during the lifetime of the husband as after his death, should she survive him, against the consequences of his improvidence or misfortune, by securing to her separate and apart from him, such property as she may hold in her own right at the time of marriage, and such as she may afterwards acquire by gift, devise, or descent. The Constitution, therefore, to that end, departs widely from the rules of the common law, and, in effect, provides that the relation of the wife to her property, so far as title, use, and enjoyment are concerned, shall not be prejudiced by the fact of coverture, and that no legal or beneficial interest therein shall thereby pass and vest in the husband. In this respect it does away

That the hus- ot, by his management, supervision, or labor, acquire st in the estate itself, is conceded, and by parity of cannot acquire any interest in the increase, for that so, and upon the same terms—the latter being a f the former proposition. There is no magic in the manipulation of the husband by force of which sepa- nsformed into common property. If he acquires, as ed by respondents, any right whatever as against his rtue of his supervision and labor, it is not a right, ure of a lien, in the thing supervised, or upon which s bestowed, but merely a right to compensation, and rs could only proceed by the process of garnishment. ence of an express agreement to that effect, there is d obligation on the part of the wife to compensate d for his services, and in either case there would be mperfect obligation which neither the husband nor his creditors could enforce. The doctrine contended for would banish the husband from the premises of the wife, and deprive her of his counsel and guidance, for his presence there might bring ruin instead of affording protection. No such alternative is contemplated by the provision of the Constitution, so wisely intended for her benefit.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

AUGUSTUS SCHENK AND ADOLPHUS SCHWARTZ v. JOHN EVOY AND JOSEPH MULLIKEN.

DESCRIPTION OF LAND IN DEED.—Where a deed conveys a given quantity of land, parcel of a larger tract, and the deed fails to locate the quantity so conveyed by a sufficient description, the grantee, on the delivery of the deed, becomes interested in all the lands embraced within the larger area as tenant in common with his grantor. The grantee has no right to locate the quantity called for by his deed on any portion of the larger area, against the will of his grantor, unless such right is conferred upon him by some stipulation to that effect in the deed.

SEGREGATION OF LAND SOLD.—Where the calls of such a deed do not identify the land with certainty, the mere fact that at the time of the delivery of the deed the grantee paid to the grantor the purchase money, raises no presumption that the grantor segregated and placed him in the possession of a particular tract as the land conveyed.

ISSUE IN PLEADINGS.—The complaint charged that on a day mentioned the plaintiffs were lawfully seized and possessed and had the right of possession of a certain tract of land, and that defendants afterwards entered into and upon the said tract, and ousted plaintiffs therefrom. The answer in response to these allegations averred, that the defendant was not guilty of the supposed trespasses and ejectment in the complaint mentioned, nor of any part thereof: held, that the answer raised no issue.

CONFESSION OF ALLEGATION OF COMPLAINT.—The complaint in ejectment was filed on the 27th of January, and averred that the defendants were in possession of the demanded premises. The answer was filed on the 8th day of February, and the only response to this averment was as follows: And "this defendant further says, that he is not in possession of the land and tenements described in the complaint, or any part thereof;" held, that the allegation of the complaint must be taken as confessed.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fourth Judicial District, Contra Costa County of Contra Costa.

The complaint averred that on and after the first day of January, 1860, the plaintiffs were lawfully seized and po had the right to the possession of a certain tract consisting of about one thousand acres, situate and in Contra Costa County of Contra Costa, and being particularly as follows, to wit:

A certain piece of land, situate, lying, and being in the County of Contra Costa, and being part of the rancho known as the "Sobrante," on the western side of San Pablo about seven miles from San Pablo town, in a valley known as Cruzito Valley. [Then followed a description by the plaintiff of the demanded premises.] The complaint alleged, that "the defendants, afterwards, and before the commencement of this action, to wit: on or about the fourteenth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixty, at said place, unlawfully entered into and upon said tract of land, and ejected the plaintiffs therefrom, and have hitherto unlawfully withheld, and now do unlawfully withhold the possession of said tract of land at the commencement of this action by the plaintiffs," etc.

It was the separate answer of defendant Mulliken: That the said defendant, Joseph Mulliken, comes and says, that he is not guilty of the supposed trespasses and ejectment mentioned in the complaint mentioned, or any part thereof. He further alleges that he is not in possession of the lands and tenements mentioned in said complaint, or any part thereof, nor does he unlawfully withhold the same from the plaintiffs, as alleged in their said complaint, wherefore he prays that he go hence without delay," etc.

On the 18th, 1856, Frisbie and De Zaldo sold to Germon one thousand acres. The description of the land as contained in the complaint is found in the opinion.

On the 11th, 1857, Germon sold to plaintiff Schenk, by the same description. December 18th, 1859, Schenk sold to Schwartz one half of his interest in the one thousand acres. On April, 1857, Frisbie and De Zaldo sold to Adams one half of the entire Sobrante claim, and to Hepburn one half of the same tract. In January, 1858, Hepburn sold to Sanders one eighth of one half of the Sobrante.

On the 21st of February, 1859, Frisbie and Adams executed to plaintiff Schenk a deed of one thousand acres, in which the land is located and described by metes and bounds, as in the complaint, and as surveyed by the witness Whitcher.

At this time, Hepburn and Sanders had become tenants in common with the other owners in the Sobrante, and they did not join in this deed, nor was there any proof that they had consented to the segregation of the one thousand acres.

The plaintiffs recovered judgment in the Court below, and the defendants appealed.

M. S. Chase, for Appellant.

The complaint was sufficient in ejectment, and the answer of this defendant (Mulliken) denied the allegation neither of seizin, entry, ouster, or damage, and traverses the character only, and not the fact of the detention.

"Every material allegation of the complaint not specifically controverted by the answer shall, for the purposes of this action be taken as true." (Civ. Prac. Act, sec. 65; Dewey v. Bowman, 8 Cal. 145; Busenius v. Coffee, 14 Cal. 91.)

A grant of a specified number of acres, to be taken out of a larger quantity of land, passes title to them as an undivided portion, and a subsequent location of the acres, pursuant to the right of election given, followed up by possession, is good as a partition by parol. (Corbin v. Jackson, 14 Wen. 619; Jackson v. Livingston, 7 Wen. 136.)

Besides, there is no uncertainty on the face of the deed, and "certum est quod certum reddi potest."

There could be but one survey which could be correct, and that survey could be precisely made from the calls in the deed. Those calls were for one thousand acres in the Cruzito Valley on the west side of the San Pablo Creek, "to be laid out near as possible in a square form," having for its eastern boundary the course of the creek, and the other three boundaries to be all straight lines," etc.

There was, therefore, on the line following the course of the creek (say for six or eight miles through the valley, testifies,) a certain part of said line where this one acre tract, with three straight lines for its three sides, if not squared, at least, "laid out as near as possible in form," and it is equally clear and mathematically that there was but one portion of that line on which to be done. For it is axiomatic in nature, and the so judicially notice, that no natural stream or creek is straight for a distance of six or eight miles, but the contrary, through such a distance, every one will more or less, and vary from a straight line somewhat, little be the variation, and the Court will not fail to in the case at bar, that where in this valley this under the least, and where, at the same time, this last meander would so conform with the other three given of the one thousand acre tract, that the same laid out in a form nearest square, there was the easterly corner by the deed.

Augustus Schenk et al. v. John Evoy et al.

A. Brown, for Respondent.

Description of the premises in the deed of the 13th March, in Frisbie & De Zaldo to Germon (under which the claim the premises in controversy) is indefinite and (if the deed is not absolutely void for uncertainty of description of the premises intended to be conveyed.) The the grantees can claim, under the deed, is an undivided the Sobrante Rancho to the extent of one thousand and, to be located on the west side of the creek in the valley.

Apparent from the language used in the deed, taken testimony of the surveyor, that the land conveyed be located at any particular place without some furtherment between the parties. The tract could as well located at any other point on the San Pablo Creek, Sanito Valley, within a distance of six or eight miles, it was located. The effect of the deed is to be located in as near a square form as possible; this would give each side of the square length of one mile and one fifth of a mile, and according to Whiteher's testimony, the Cruzito Valley contains about six times as much land as was conveyed, and the grantees took, if anything, an undivided portion of the land in that valley, and the other tenants in common own the remainder.

The cases of Jackson ex dem. Gamsey, 7 Wendell, 136, and afterwards affirmed in Corbin v. Jackson, 14 Wendell, 619, cited in appellants' brief, do not support appellants' case.

In those cases, six hundred acres of land was sold, to be surveyed or taken off of a large tract, and the right of election was given to the grantees, which they subsequently made. It was held, that "though by the deed the grantees became tenants in common with the owners of the tract, the election, followed up by possession, operated as a parol partition."

In the case at bar, no right of election was given to the grantee, nor can any location of the land conveyed in the deed to Germon be made except by consent of all the tenants in common, or by partition.

The portion conveyed, not being set forth by metes and bounds or other description, from the remainder of the land on the west side of San Pablo Creek, in Cruzito Valley, by means of which it can be separated or distinguished from the remainder, the grantee, Germon, takes the one thousand acres as tenant in common with the other owners of the land. (Lick v. O'Donnell, 3 Cal. 63.)

The case may be stated thus: The plaintiffs own an undivided interest, to the extent of one thousand acres, in the Sobrante Rancho, to be located in the Cruzito Valley. The defendants own an undivided interest in all the land on the Sobrante Rancho. Both parties, as tenants in common, are entitled to the possession, and neither has the right to disturb the other. The possession and seizin of one tenant in common is the possession and seizin of the other. Both parties trace title from the same source—Frisbie and De Zalda.

3. That the deed, being for a valuable and sufficient consideration, raises the presumption that the grantors were in possession, and that they, at the date of their execution of said deed, gave possession of the particular one thousand acres in controversy to the grantee Germon.

Where a deed is of a given quantity of land, parcel of a larger tract, and the deed fails to locate the quantity so conveyed by a sufficient description, the grantee, on delivering of the deed, becomes interested in all the lands embraced within the larger area, as tenant in common with his grantor; and as such tenant, the grantee can claim a partition under proceedings instituted for that purpose, or, alternatively, a partition may be made by amicable agreement between the parties. The grantee has no right to locate the quantity called for by his deed on any portion of the larger area, as against the will of his grantor, unless such right is conferred upon him by some stipulation to that effect in the deed.

These principles are fully recognized in Jackson ex dem Gamsey v. Livingston, 7 Wendell, 136. The plaintiff claimed to recover a certain lot known as No. 6, part of a tract of fifteen thousand three hundred and sixty acres of land granted to Malachi Treat and William W. Norris by letters patent. The plaintiff claimed under the patentees by a deed calling for six hundred acres, to be surveyed or taken off the aforesaid tract by the grantee at his election; the grantee elected to take the lands in controversy. It was held by the Court, that by the deed the grantee became tenant in common with the owners of the fifteen thousand three hundred and sixty acres and that an election on his part to take Lot No. 6, followed up by possession, operated as a parol partition.

The judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed in the Court of Errors. Chancellor Kent, who delivered the opinion, in discussing the question, remarked as follows: "The title to the undivided six hundred acres passed immediately to the grantees under the deed, with the right to elect in which pa-

We shall here assume the facts which the testimony of the surveyor, Whitcher, tended to prove. He surveyed the one thousand acres, claimed in the complaint, in 1859 or 1860, and his survey was according to the calls mentioned in the deed; but the land, according to his testimony on cross-examination, "could, perhaps, as well have been located to answer the calls of the deed at any other place on the western side of San Pablo Creek, within a distance of six or eight miles from one end of the valley to the other, as at the place where it was located."

If the stream was perfectly straight, then five perfect squares of a thousand acres each might have been erected on the western side of the creek on the 13th of March, 1859, each square having the stream for its eastern boundary. If the stream meandered through the valley, and the meanderings were perfectly uniform, a like number of perfect squares could have been formed at that date; but if the meanderings were unequal, then a square erected upon that section of the creek which approximated most nearly to a straight line would have been the square called for by the deed. But under the latter hypothesis, even, there might have been two or more sections of the stream whose respective variations from a straight line were precisely the same. Whether the course of the stream was straight or otherwise, does not appear—nor, in the light of the surveyor's testimony, is it material to inquire. While his testimony tended to prove that the square formed by him in 1859 or 1860 answered the calls of the deed, it also tended to prove that five squares, at least, might have been formed upon the stream, each of which would have filled the calls of the deed quite as well. It is true that the witness says "perhaps as well;" but the witness was a surveyor of long standing, and was intimately acquainted with the valley. The burden was upon the plaintiffs in proving that the thousand acres could be located within the calls of the deed only at the place where it had been located by the surveyor in 1859 view of the numerous decisions of the late Supreme Court familiar to require citation, we are not at liberty to try a new trial on the ground that the Judge who tried the case failed to find on the testimony of Whitcher (which was the only testimony bearing on the question) that there was a spot only in the western half of the valley to which the law could be applied.

The relation established between Frisbie and De Zaldo and Evoy by the deed of March 13th, 1856, was the relation of tenants in common, and that relation now subsists between the plaintiffs who have succeeded to the rights of German, defendant, Evoy, who has succeeded, in part, to the rights of Frisbie and De Zaldo.

Respondent, Mulliken, answered separately. In his answer he says "that he is not guilty of the supposed trespass and ejectment in the complaint mentioned, nor of any part thereof." This, at the best, amounts to a general denial of the charges as the complaint was sworn to, the traverse raised. The answer proceeds as follows: "And this defendant says, that he is not in possession of the lands and premises described in said complaint, or any part thereof." The answer was filed on the 8th of February, 1860, and the traverse was taken on the 27th of January of the same year. The defendant charges that the defendants were in possession at the commencement of the action, and to this allegation the plaintiff makes no response, and therefore the truth of the charge must be taken as confessed. The further allegation in the plaintiff's answer—"nor does he withhold, nor has he ever made the same from the plaintiffs"—is not a sufficient answer to the charge that he was in possession at the time the action was brought.

The general judgment in favor of Mulliken is reversed, and a new trial is ordered, and the judgment in favor of Evoy is ALCALDE'S BOOKS.—WHEN RECEIVED AS EVIDENCE.—An entry of a grant of land in the Pueblo de San José, made in the Book of Alcalde's Grants, is entitled to be received in evidence upon proof that the persons by whom it is signed were the Alcalde and Clerk of said pueblo at the time it bears date, and that their signatures are genuine, and that the book was one of the books of the Alcalde's office in which Alcalde grants were entered, and that the book belonged to the Recorder's office of Santa Clara County.

ALCALDE'S GRANTS.—The statement of an Alcalde's official character, in the commencement of a grant signed by him, is sufficient to show that he acted in his official capacity, without a descriptive officio appended to his signature.

SAME.—DELIVERY OF.—Where the original grant of an Alcalde is contained in the book of grants kept by him, no proof of a delivery of the grant is required. The production of the book has the same force and effect upon the question of delivery as the production of an original deed or grant would have by one claiming under it.

QUITCLAIM DEED.—A quitclaim deed will enable the grantee to maintain ejectment for the land it conveys if his grantor could have done so.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURTS.—Probate Courts have no jurisdiction to administer upon the estates of deceased persons who died prior to the adoption of the Constitution.

RECORDS OF PROBATE COURTS.—Where a Probate Court administers upon the estate of such deceased person, its proceedings are not entitled to be received in evidence.

EQUITABLE DEFENSE TO BE PLEADED.—If a defendant in an action of ejectment desires to avail himself of an equitable defence as a bar, he must set it up in his answer with the same particularity which is observed in a bill of equity.

COURT MUST PASS ON EQUITABLE DEFENSE.—The Court, and not the jury must pass upon the equitable title set up in the answer, and it must be sufficiently pleaded to warrant the Court in granting a decree which will estop the further prosecution of the action. The Statute of Limitations does not begin to run against the title to land derived from the Government of Mexico until a confirmation by a patent from the Government of the United States.

APPEAL from the District Court, Third Judicial District, Santa Clara County.

This was an action of ejectment to recover possession of a lot in San José, Santa Clara County, commenced October 9th, 1861.

The complaint averred, that on the 20th day of September, 1861, plaintiff was seized in fee as the owner of the demanded premises, and that on said day defendant entered upon the premises and ousted and ejected him therefrom, and still detains the same.

Jenkins, at his death, left as heirs, brothers and sisters, and the plaintiff's quitclaim deed from them was dated July 15th, 1847.

The proceedings in the Probate Court relative to the administration upon the estate of Jenkins bear date at the time averred in the answer, and the deed of the administrator to the grantor of defendant's lessor was executed as therein set forth. Defendant's lessor claimed the title to the demanded premises by virtue of the administrator's deed, as well as Sheriff's deeds, executed under sales made on executions against one Curl, who, defendants claimed, was Jenkins' partner at the time of the grant, and that the grant was made for the joint benefit of the two.

Plaintiff recovered judgment in the Court below, and defendant appealed.

of his own case. His own assumed title is inchoate and unfirmed, and wholly unfortified by possession, and, according to his own theory, he can have no title upon which ejectment can be maintained.

If we understand the counsel, the proposition is stated, because J. W. Jenkins died in 1848, the Probate Court of this State, succeeding the Mexican regime, could have no jurisdiction over his estate, and that all of the acts of his several administrators were therefore void. In support of the proposition, Grimes v. Norris, 6 Cal. 624, Tevie v. Pitcher, 10 Cal. 477, and De la Guerra v. Packard, 17 Cal. 182, are cited. Unfortunately, however, for the argument, none of these cases are of the least aid. They recognize the doctrine that the law of the forum governs the remedy, and are wholly antagonistic to the position that because a man died before the inauguration of the new government, therefore there could be no administration of his estate. The cases cited are all in reference to questions of real estate, and the questions were as to the validity of devises in view of the Mexican law, without probate under the succeeding State law.

The counsel having assumed that the sale was without jurisdiction and void, then, as a corollary, asserts that the statute of Limitations could not run. We conclude the reverse from our antagonistic point of view. Besides, we hold the defendant, and those under whom he claims, having been in all the time in the adverse possession, may successfully rely upon the statute. He may rely on either or both statutes. In our view of the case, there is no necessity for invoking the aid of the Act of 1860, page 16; but we have a right to rely on it in aid of irregularities in the proceedings of a Court administrator with full jurisdictional and functional powers. In our view, these proceedings were, at most, irregular, and we maintain they were not even that. If merely irregular they might have been attacked by a direct proceeding, but not collaterally.

The cases of Smith v. Morse, 2 Cal. 542, and Billing v. Hall, 7 Cal. 13-6, are in harmony with our theory. The second fully recognizes the power of the Legislature

7, however, that the counsel came to a singular conthat the decision itself had provided the specific rule der of the Probate Court directing the sale was a judicial act, and, as such, is entitled to the benefit of all legal presumptions. (Halleck v. Grey, 9 Cal. 195.)

The title of the purchaser does not depend upon the return or other mere ministerial acts of the officer over which he has no control. (Cloud v. El Dorado County, 12 Cal. 133.)

In our view, nearly all the questions hitherto presented including the effect of the statute of 1860, have been decided by this Court. (Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 616.)

The defendant and his grantors having had the possession and at least an equity, the plaintiff, when he purchased, was bound to take notice of that title. (Bryan v. Ramirez, 8 Cal. 467.)

Neither is the defendant's case weakened if it should be held that his paper title is defective. He still has his possessory title unimpaired, and that is all that is necessary. (Morton v. Folger, 15 Cal. 278.)

The deed under which the plaintiff seeks to deduce his own claim of title, is a mere release or quitclaim, without any words operative as a conveyance. It is only equivalent to the vendor saying, in a legal form, that as against the vendee he would not thereafter assert any claim. It operated as an estoppel only.

It could not pass such a title to the plaintiff as would enable him to maintain ejectment against another in possession and claiming adversely. By the common law there could be no conveyance of land valid as against one in adverse possession. We concede that the rule has been modified in some of our States by statutes, and in others by decisions; but with hazard the opinion that in none has it been so modified as to authorize an ejectment upon a mere deed of release and quitclaim, without words of grant, or a positive enabling statute. Here, we have no such statute — not even a Statute of Uses. (Mesick v. Sunderland, 6 Cal. 297; Washburn on Real Estate 596, 606, 620; Jackson v. Dermont, 9 Johns. 55; *Jackson et al. v. Such a deed is not sufficient even to catch a title by the vendor subsequently acquired. Its highest effect is by way of

San José de Guadalupe, in which the land in controversy located, and that White was his Clerk; that both Burton and White were dead; that the signatures of Burton and White appended to the grant, were genuine, and that the book was one of the books of the Alcalde's office in which Alcalde grants were entered. It further appears, from the testimony of the witness Tisdall, who was Deputy Recorder of Santa Clara County, (the county in which the land is located,) that the book belonged to the Recorder's office of that county. From these facts, we think the Court was warranted in finding that the book was one of original entries, and therefore entitled to be admitted as evidence upon that ground; but whether upon that ground or not, the evidence was sufficient to entitle the book to admission under the provisions of the Act to legalize certain records in the Recorder's office of the County of Santa Clara. (Statutes of 1861, 507.)

The further objection to the grant itself, on the ground that Burton had not appended to his signature his official designation, is, in our judgment, without merit. The Alcalde's signature, in his official character at the commencement of the grant, which together with the fact already proved that he was the Alcalde at the time the grant bears date, was sufficient to show that he acted in his official capacity notwithstanding no descriptive of his office was appended to his signature.

The objection that there was no proof of delivery is untenable. The grant contained in the book being the original grant, it follows that there could have been no delivery to the grantee other than such as the entry of the grant in the book kept for that purpose imports, except by duplicate. The production of such duplicate, if any was given by the person claiming under the grant, would be prima facie evidence of delivery.

The second section of the Act above cited provides that books of record mentioned therein (of which Book No. 3 is one) " * * * may be offered in evidence in the same manner with the same force and effect in all cases as if they had been produced from the custody of the person claiming under tion over the estate of Jenkins, and that all its proceedings and their consequences, being, therefore, null and void, were properly excluded.

The next error assigned is, that the Court erred in excluding a mass of evidence tending to prove in the defendant's favor, that he held an equitable title to one half of the premises in controversy, derived from one Curl, who was the surviving partner of Jenkins, and claimed that the lot in question had been purchased by Jenkins with partnership funds, and that by reason thereof he held in trust for him to that extent. A sufficient answer to this assignment is found in the fact that no equitable title is set out in the answer. The name of Curl is nowhere mentioned in the answer, nor his claim of title is referred to, nor are any other facts upon which an equitable title could be based intelligibly stated. Under the pleadings, the parties are compelled to hold that the parties stood upon their legal rights only. If the defendant in an action of ejectment desires to avail himself of an equitable defense as a bar, he must set it up with the same particularity which is observed in a bill of equity. The equitable title is for the Court, and not the jury, and must be sufficiently stated to warrant the Court in granting a decree which would estop the further prosecution of the action; and, unless this is done, the defendant must be regarded as relying solely upon his legal title. For these reasons, the Court did not err in excluding the evidence in question.

Under the view we have taken, the defendant is forced to rely upon his possession, which cannot stand in the presence of the plaintiff's title. Nor can that possession be aided by the Statute of Limitations. The title of the plaintiff is derived from the Mexican Government, and being yet unconfirmed, the statute does not run against it.

Judgment is also to be rendered against the losing party for costs, "which may be collected in the same manner in which similar costs are collected in the District Courts;" and, by section 69, "either party feeling himself aggrieved by the judgment of said Court may appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court, as in other cases of appeal thereto from the County Court."

There can be no doubt that such proceedings are purely judicial in their character, and being so, and the case being special, the County Court has jurisdiction. (Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 152.)

Section 74 is as follows, to wit: "In case of any contest regard to any election to fill the office of County Judge, such contest shall be tried in like manner by the Board of Supervisors of said county." This is the only section specifically referring to the matter in the case of contesting the election of a County Judge. According to this provision, the Board of Supervisors are to proceed in the same manner as the County Court and to exercise functions purely judicial in their nature, not such as are appropriate to that body. Article III of the Constitution provides that "the powers of the Government of the State of California shall be divided into three separate departments: the Legislative, the Executive, and Judicial; no person charged with the exercise of powers properly belonging to one of these departments shall exercise any functions appertaining to either of the others, except in the cases hereinafter permitted."

The case under consideration is not found among the exceptions. Here, there is an attempt to confer purely judicial powers upon the Board of Supervisors—the power to judicially hear and determine the title of parties to an office, and

ELIAS BLUM v. J. R. ROBERTSON.

FACT.—When one is appointed, by written instrument, the attoract of another, his power to bind the principal must be ascer-one from the language of the instrument by which he is clothed ority to act for and in the name of the principal.

Elias Blum v. J. E. Robertson.

SAME—HIS POWER.—The agent cannot, in the exercise of the power delegated, bind the principal by any act beyond the power, or beside it, though it is competent for him to perform such subordinate acts as are usual, incidental to or necessary to effectuate the object expressed.

ONE DEALING WITH ATTORNEY IN FACT.—The party dealing with an attorney in fact is bound to know at his peril what the power of the agent is, and to understand its legal effect.

CONSTRUCTION OF POWER OF ATTORNEY.—V., the owner of an unconfirmed Mexican grant, executed to B. a power of attorney, which, after reciting appointment, read as follows: "I give him full, complete, and perfect power, as my said attorney in fact, to do any and everything to secure title to said rancho, and to prosecute the pretension of the same in the Courts of the United States; and by this I ratify, confirm, and approve all the doings of my said attorney in fact concerning said rancho." Held, that the power did not confer on the agent any authority to sell the land or any part of it, or enter into any contract which would bind the principal to convey the same or any part thereof.

WHEN EQUITABLE TITLE MUST BE PLEADED, AND HOW.—If the defendant, in an action of ejectment, relies on an equitable title to the demanded premises as a defence, it must be pleaded, and the answer setting it up must in substance at least, possess all the elements and essential qualities of a bill in equity, and the equity presented must be of such a character that it may be ripened by the decree of the Court into a legal title to the premises, or such as will estop the plaintiff from the prosecution of his action.

PAROL AGREEMENT TO SELL LAND.—A party who claims a right to a conveyance of land under a parol contract on the ground of part performance must make out by clear proof the agreement as alleged; and the actual performance proved must be unequivocal evidence of such agreement, and the agreement must be certain in its terms, and just and fair in all its parts.

TENANCY AT WILL—HOW CREATED AND TERMINATED.—A tenancy at will cannot exist without express grant or contract, and when it does exist, the tenant is entitled to a reasonable notice of his landlord's intention to terminate the estate before an action can be maintained against him to recover the possession.

The objection was taken, upon the argument, that if this were an equitable defense, defendant does not ask for specific performance in his answer, in compliance with Lestrade v. Banks, 19 Cal. 660.

plish the object proposed." (Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 58; Valentine v. Piper, 22 Pick. 85.)

Similar language has frequently undergone construction, in chancery, in cases where powers of appointment have been created by deed or will.

Thus, in Bateman v. Bateman, 1 Atk. 421, it was held that a power to raise money out of a copyhold estate, authorized sale of the estate. So, a power to pay debts out of rents and profits, has been held to authorize a sale or mortgage of the estate. (Bostle v. Blundell, 1 Meriv. 193, 232; 2 Story Eq. §§ 1064, 1064a.)

So, in the case of Kenworthy v. Bate, 6 Vesey, 793. The Master of the Rolls says: "The case of Long v. Long, 5 Vesey, 445, determines this: that to enable a person to sell land, it is not necessary to have that authority expressly given to him. There the party had no right to sell, but had a right to charge."
* * * But it was held that, as there was nothing to restrain him in the amount, and he might have charged the utmost value, he had done only what was equivalent to that" (by sale of the premises.) * * * "That is, therefore, a direct determination that a power to charge includes a power to sell."

2. If the power of attorney did not authorize a conveyance, it authorized Casimero to give possession of the land, or in other words, to give a lease at will.

The principal is bound by the action of the agents in matters left to the agent's judgment and discretion, although he acts erroneously. (Ruggles v. Wash. Co. 11 Mo. 496.)

3. But if the Court is of opinion that the power of attorney is insufficient to authorize the execution of the deed or contract, or to give possession of the premises to Bates, Lawrence, and Hastings, then we must look elsewhere for the power.

Counsel cannot say that because Mrs. Valencia had authorized her son to employ counsel to prosecute her claim by written instrument, that therefore she did not authorize him to convey the land by another power of attorney, or even by parol. She might have done so at another time, or by a

This Court has repeatedly held that a subsequent ratification is equal to an original authority. (Taylor v. Robin 14 Cal. 400; 13 Cal. 230; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 623; 1 Hilliard Vend. 436; Story on Agency, §§ 242, 244, 3

E. W. F. Sloan, for Respondent.

The letter of attorney, though under seal, grants no power to the agent either to sell or convey the estate of the principal, or any part of it. The power is limited to the employment of counsel to prosecute her claim of title to the Rancho de San Felipe. (Berrien v. McLane, 1 Hoff. Ch. R. 4; Billings v. Morrow, 7 Cal. 173.)

There was no ratification or confirmation of such conveyance on the part of the principal. A ratification could not have been by deed. (Hunter v. Parker, 7 Mees. & Wels. 343; Hanford v. McNair, 9 Wend. 54; Story on Agency § 242.)

There is no executory agreement contained in the deed in question on the part of M. M. Valencia, who is there made to figure as the party of the second part.

If it is her deed, then it took effect as a present immediate conveyance to Bates et al. of an undivided half of the rancho.

If it is not her deed, it could not have had any operation upon her estate at all.

The only executory agreement contained in the instrument is on the part of Bates and others, parties of the first part.

him, in his own name, for his principal, would answer the demands of the Statute of Frauds, there is no impropriety in holding the sale to be good, though the deed could not operate as a conveyance of the legal estate.

This is all that can be deduced from the numerous authorities cited by appellant's counsel.

The principles are plain enough, but cannot be made to apply to this case, where no power, either to sell, convey, or to contract to sell or convey, is to be found in the letter of attorney, with or without seal.

There is no pretense for saying that the letter of attorney in question constitutes or creates an "universal agency." No general expressions can make it so. (Story on Agency, § 21.)

Davis, having taken from Brady an assignment of his interest, procured from M. M. Valencia, in 1858, a formal conveyance of two tenths of the ranch.

It is not, nor does it purport to be, a deed of ratification. It contains no reference to the deed made by Casimero Briones.

It seems to vest Davis with a legal title of two undivided tenths of the ranch.

Neither the appellant, nor any one under whom he claims to hold, has any connection with it.

By the Court, CUREY, J.

This is an action of ejectment, brought to recover the possession of a certain tract of land in the County of Contra Costa, known as the Rancho "Boca de la Cañada del Pinole" or San Felipe, containing three square leagues of land. The plaintiff alleges that on the 20th day of March, 1860, he was the owner in fee simple and in the possession of the undivided one sixth part of said rancho, and that on the day following while he was so the owner and in possession of said land, the defendant unlawfully entered thereon and ousted him therefrom, and has, from that time to the commencement of this action, which was the 21st day of April, 1861, withheld, and still withholds, said land from plaintiff, to his damage in the erally and specifically, each and every allegation contained; and, in the second place, alleging affirmaat one William B. Agard became the owner of the d three tenths of said tract of land by conveyances and delivered to him prior to the time of the s alleged seizin, by George C. Bates, Edwin A. Law-d S. C. Hastings, who, with William H. Davis and rady, became "invested with the title in fee simple to the undivided one half of said rancho," by virtue ain conveyance made by Maria Manuela Valencia, by rney in fact, Casimero Briones, bearing date on or e 31st day of May, 1854, and that such deed was rded in said county on that day; that after said con-were executed and delivered by Bates, Lawrence, tings, to said Agard, to wit: on the 31st day of May, entered into the possession under said conveyance of 54, with the full knowledge, consent, and approval of Valencia, and that from that day to the time of such answer, the said Agard "has been in the quiet, e, and undisturbed possession of said premises, with knowledge of the said M. M. Valencia and of said of all his rights in said premises, and with the claim to the undivided three tenths of said rancho;" that at was the agent of said Agard, and as such agent, ore said 20th day of March, 1860, entered into the n of said land to occupy and retain possession of said nths thereof for said Agard, and that "he ever since d now doth retain and hold possession of the same agent of said Agard, and that he has and claims no le, interest, or possession of said premises, except as t of said Agard." The defendant then prays that the t may be dismissed, and that he may have judgment osts.

These affirmative allegations of the answer the plaintiff controverted by replication. By the pleadings, the parties agreed that said tract of land was granted to the said Madame Valencia by the Mexican Government in 1841, and that her claim and title to the same had been finally confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

On the trial the plaintiff produced, in evidence, a deed executed by Mrs. Valencia, bearing date and acknowledged by her on the 20th of March, 1860, which was duly recorded on that day, by which she conveyed to Simon Blum, Elias Blum, and T. A. Brown, all and singular her right, title, and interest in and to said rancho, excepting four hundred acres. It was then admitted by defendant that he was and had been in the possession of the portion of said rancho set forth in his answer, as the agent of said Agard.

To maintain the affirmative matter pleaded by defendant, he gave in evidence a power of attorney, under seal, executed by Mrs. Valencia; on the 17th day of May, 1854, to Casimero Briones, her son, which was acknowledged and recorded, by which she constituted him her true and legal attorney, for her and in her name to take all necessary steps and to do all necessary things to secure the validity of her claim to said rancho; to employ lawyers, gather testimony, and, in general, to do all that was necessary to secure her right, title, and pretension to said rancho, and to provide the necessary expenses for the same; and for this she declared: "I give him full, complete, and perfect power, as my said attorney in fact, to do any and everything to secure my title to said rancho, and to prosecute the pretension of the same in all the Courts of the United States; and by this I ratify, confirm, and approve all the doings of my said attorney in fact concerning said rancho." The defendant then gave in evidence an instrument in writing, bearing date May 22d, 1854, purporting to have been entered into by Bates, Lawrence, and Hastings, "partners at law at San Francisco," William H. Davis, and Lewis Brady of the first part, and Maria Manuela Valencia of the second part, by which the parties of the first part covenant to and with her to undertake to perfect in the Courts her title to said rancho, and to render their said Courts, and obtain a judicial confirmation of and to bear all the expenses in the premises, including a survey and partition of said tract of land; and patent for the same should be issued, to pay to her legal representative one thousand dollars in addition; follows, in the same instrument, that in consideration premises, and to enable the parties of the first part to said case with vigor, the said Valencia grants, sells, says to them all the one undivided half of the said This instrument, by the testatum clause, purports to be signed by the parties respectively under their hands, and to have been signed by the several persons comprising the first part, and also by Mrs. Valencia, by Casimero Briones, "her attorney in fact," and recorded on the 1st of May, 1854. It appeared on the trial that this instrument was executed by the parties of the first part, and the name of the party of the second part was subscribed Casimero Briones' name does not appear anywhere in the instrument, except as subscribed under the name of Manuela Valencia, as follows: "Per Casimero Briones." It appeared that Mrs. Valencia was not present when said instrument was thus executed.

The defendant also gave in evidence deeds of conveyance by Bates, Lawrence, and Hastings, respectively, to said defendant whereby Bates and Hastings each undertook to convey the undivided one tenth of said ranch; and Lawrence to the said grantee all his right, title, and interest in the property. The deeds of Bates and Lawrence were executed and recorded in the year 1856, and the deed of Hastings was executed and recorded in January, 1857. In these deeds reference is made to the title of Mrs. Valencia to the land of their own, and to the instrument bearing date of 1854, as the means by which they acquired their interests.

The defendant entered upon the ranch in 1856, after the deeds of Bates and Lawrence to Agard were executed, as his agent, and from that time to the trial of the cause was in possession of the land or living upon it, claiming to be in possession of an undivided three tenths of it, as such agent. It does not appear that the defendant was let into the possession by Mrs. Valencia; but the defendant himself testified that some six weeks or two months after he first took possession he had a conversation with her for the first time, and between that time and August, 1860, he had occasionally conversed with her in respect to his occupation for Agard, and that at one of those conversations she expressed herself as very much pleased that Mr. Agard had purchased "into the ranch from the lawyers." The defendant also testified that she always showed him great respect as Mr. Agard's agent. While defendant was so in possession, Agard made improvements on the land of the value of from eight hundred to a thousand dollars. The defendant further testified that at one time Casimero Briones, by instructions of his mother, showed him a contract between Bates, Lawrence, Hastings, Davis, and herself, granting them one half of the ranch on their obtaining the final confirmation of it and paying her one thousand dollars. It was proved in general terms that Bates, Lawrence, and Hastings rendered the professional services by them to be performed, as mentioned in this instrument, and that some expenses had been paid by Agard in the employment of counsel to attend to the case, and some other expenses that had accrued subsequent to the final decree of confirmation.

It was also proved by the defendant that Mrs. Valencia had by deeds, conveyed two undivided tenths of said rancho to William H. Davis, and an undivided interest of four hundred acres to Encarnacion Briones de Vaca, both of which deeds were executed and recorded before the execution and recording of the deed under which the plaintiff claimed; but the defendant did not show that he had any interest in or occupied said premises under either of such deeds.

Much of the evidence offered on the part of the defendant was objected to by the plaintiff, on the ground that the same was art before which the case was tried rendered judgavor of the plaintiff against the defendant for the f the possession of the premises in controversy, and ousand dollars damages for the wrongful withhold-same premises from plaintiff. In due time the de-plied for a new trial, which was denied. From the ing the application for a new trial and from the judgdefendant appealed, and now asks this Court to reverse ent, mainly on the grounds:

That the power of attorney from Mrs. Valencia to (asimero) was sufficient to authorize him to convey e the tract of land mentioned; and that by the instru-ng date May 22, 1854, Bates, Lawrence, and Haered title in fee to an undivided three tenths of the and that said Agard, under whom and by whose he defendant entered and occupied the land, became ith title in fee to the same undivided three tenths the deeds of conveyance executed to him by Bates, and Hastings, respectively; and that therefore the was at the commencement of this action, and from been, entitled to the possession of said tract of land.

—That, if the foregoing proposition be deemed unen Mrs. Valencia should be held bound to convey ded half of the land on the happening of the events in said instrument in writing, and which were de conditions precedent to her obligation to convey, sons that subsequent to the date of such instrument ized its existence and ratified it by letting Agard session of the land, and thereafter encouraged him and conduct to make expenditures in improvements mises, by which she became estopped from denying ce of a subsisting right in him to possession of the atrovery; and that, until default on the part of the he first part in said instrument named, an action of ejectment ought not to be maintained by her or her grantee against the said Agard or his agent in possession.

Thus the appellant relies, first, on a defense at law upon his supposed legal title, and second, on a defense in equity upon a contract binding Mrs. Valencia, the existence of which appellant asks the Court to find from the facts and circumstances proved under his answer, setting up, as he claims, this second ground of defense.

By the letter of attorney executed by Mrs. Valencia to her son, he was constituted her agent for a particular object, and his powers are to be ascertained alone from the instrument by which he was clothed with authority to act for her and in her name and stead. In the exercise of the power delegated, the agent could not go beyond it nor beside it, though it is competent for him to perform all such subordinate acts as are usually incident to or necessary to effectuate the object expressed.

In order to bind the principal in such case, it must appear that the act done by the agent was in the exercise of the power delegated, and within its limits. (Mech. Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 5 Wheat. 326.) No man can be bound by the act of another without or beyond his consent; and where an agent acts under a special or express authority, whether verbal or written, the party dealing with him is bound to know at his peril what the power of the agent is, and to understand its legal effect; and if the agent exceed the boundary of his legal authority, the act, so far as it concerns the principal, is void. This is a rule of the common law, and is indeed elementary in the doctrine of powers. (Beals v. Allen, 18 John. 363; Hubbard v. Elmer, 7 Wend. 446; Rossiter v. Rossiter, 8 Wend. 494; North River Bank v. Aymar, 3 Hill, 263; Cox v. Robinson, 2 Stew. and Porter, 91; Stow v. Wiss, 7 Conn. 214.)

The power of attorney under consideration authorizes Casimero to take all the necessary steps and do all necessary things to secure the right, title, and claim of Mrs. Valencia to the ranch therein mentioned, and to employ lawyers, gather testimony, and to provide the necessary expenses for the same.

114.) Has the appellant presented such a case, by his answer and the evidence, as entitles him to a decree in his favor?

In our judgment the evidence in the case does not warrant the conclusion that Mrs. Valencia was a party to the instrument on which the appellant relies as a contract to convey, either by the execution of it by her son, or by subsequent adoption of it as such a contract; nor does it appear that she ever made any other agreement with the parties under whose appellant claims to defend his possession. It is a rule well settled that a party who claims a right to a conveyance of land under a parol or verbal contract, on the ground of part performance, must make out, by clear and satisfactory proof, the existence of the contract as alleged by him; and it is not enough that the acts of part performance proved are evidence of some agreement, but they must be unequivocal and satisfactory evidence of the particular agreement charged in the complaint or answer, as the case may be; besides which, the agreement must appear to be certain in its terms, and just and fair in all its parts. (Phillips v. Thompson, 1 John. C. 131; Parkhurst v. Van Courtland, Id. 273; German v. Mack, 6 Paige, 288; Colson v. Thompson, 2 Wheat. 336.)

William H. Davis, who was one of the parties to the instrument bearing date in May, 1854, and the defendant, and his principal, Agard, were examined as witnesses for the defendant, for the purpose of proving that Mrs. Valencia knew of the existence of the instrument, and that she ratified and adopted it by her conduct subsequent to its date. Davis testified that Mrs. Valencia on one occasion detailed to him its contents, and declared its import, with as much precision as the most enlightened person could have done it. Why she should have been so particularly minute in giving him information which, according to his own statement, she must have known he possessed, he does not explain; and another thing which is especially singular in this narrative is, that Mrs. Valencia, who, it appears from the record, was a woman nearly sixty years of age at the time, and whose vernacular language was, as the defendant expressed it, "Californian,"

Eliaz Blum v. J. R. Robertson.

" understood the character and import of the document which she was talking much better than did Davis and his lawyers who were parties to it. This must be so, if we are to regard the answer of the defendant in this action as positions assumed by his counsel in the argument of the case as an exposition of their understanding and interpretation of the instrument.

We are not surprised that the Judge of the Court below sustained this and other testimony of like character as failing to establish what is claimed for it on the part of the appellant, even if it could have been admissible under the pleadings for such purpose.

It is claimed by the appellant, in his answer, and also in his argument, that Bates and his associates, immediately after executing the instrument, took possession of the land and by virtue of it, with the knowledge, acquiescence, and consent of Mrs. Valencia; and also that when Agard took possession he entered under said instrument, as a conveyance of the tract to convey, with her knowledge, consent, and approval. In short, that the several parties were let into the possession by Mrs. Valencia, in subordination to and in recognition of a right in them respectively to the enjoyment of the land in common with her under such instrument, as a contract or conveyance of an interest therein. But a new point was introduced on the re-argument of the case, granted after judgment was pronounced affirming the judgment of the Court below, to the effect that the defendant was let into the possession by license of Mrs. Valencia under circumstances that would place him in the status of a tenant or quasi tenant at will; and therefore the action could not be maintained without proof that he had notice to quit before it was commenced.

We have examined with care the record to ascertain if there is any evidence showing that the defendant or his principal, or the principal's grantors, were let into the possession of the land by Mrs. Valencia, and have not been able to discover any therein that would have justified a Court or jury to find as found. Davis and the defendant, and the defendant's principal, each testified in relation to their several entries and subsequent occupations; but no one of them proved, when his evidence is considered in the concrete, the fact that they or he entered by her permission, or sought to obtain her license so to do. Davis was asked, "Under what authority did you seek to make your location, and to what extent?" And to this he answered, "Under the authority of the contract, and by Mrs. Valencia's consent, who knew I was making the location under said contract. I was then making the location of my interest in the ranch." This entry, he says, was made in the Fall of 1854; and it appears that it was under a claim of right, independent of any license then obtained from her. If Davis entered under the authority of what he terms the contract, for the purpose of making a location of his interest in the ranch, such an entry and location could not inure to the benefit of the defendant, who held no interest in relation with him — and hence, all this testimony may be laid out of view in considering the new point made.

The defendant testified that he took possession of a portion of the ranch in September, 1856, for Agard, with the consent of Casimero Briones and his mother. Subsequently, in answer to a question propounded to him by his own counsel, he said the first conversation he had with her was about six weeks or two months after he first took possession. The testimony of Agard relates entirely to circumstances that transpired after the defendant's entry — none of which involve the question of an entry by license of Mrs. Valencia.

"Tenant at will," says Littleton, (Sec. 68,) "is where lands or tenements are let by one man to another, to have and to hold to him at the will of the lessor, by force of which lease the lessee is in possession. In this case the lessee is called tenant at will, because he hath no certain or sure estate; for the lessor may put him out at what time it pleaseth him."

Any act of ownership exercised by the lessor which is inconsistent with this estate will operate as a determination of it. Thus, if he enters on the land and cuts down trees demised, or makes a feoffment, or a lease for years to com-

Ellas Bium v. J. R. Robertson.

Immediately, the estate at will is thereby determined. (242, 245.) This is the common law doctrine on the subject; but the law of tenancy has become very much modified by judicial decisions. The language of the books is, that a tenancy at will cannot arise without express grant or agreement (2 Preston on Abstracts of Title, 25,) and when it does arise, the tenant is entitled to a reasonable notice of the landlord's intention to terminate the estate before an action can be maintained against him for the possession. In Jackson v. Johnson, 3 John. 417, it was held that if there was no tenancy existing and admitted relation of landlord and tenant, a notice of notice to quit does not apply.

It is to be the rule in England and in some of the United States, that an occupant under an executory conveyance is a quasi tenant at will, and that he cannot be evicted without a previous demand of the possessor. (See McDonald v. McDonald, 4 Dana, 337; Don v. Webster, 10 R. 510; Right v. Beard, 13 East. 115; Newby v. B. & C. 448.) So far as this doctrine has obtained in this country, it is on the theory that the occupant is to be considered as a tenant at will. (Roe v. Street, 2 A. & E. 329; Jones v. B. & C. 718.) In New York a different rule has obtained, and a vendee in possession under a contract to convey is entitled to notice to quit before an action of ejectment can be maintained against him. (Jackson v. Miller, 7 R. 233; Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. 29; Wright v. Eddy, 7 Barb. 78.) The relation of landlord and tenant in no sense exists between the landlord and vendee. (Watkins v. Holman, 16 Peters, 54.) If the occupant enters under deed or an agreement for purchase, or by naked license, his right of entry must be considered as subsisting in grant or contract.

There is nothing in this case from which it can be justly inferred that the defendant entered in pursuance of a license. Valencia; the answer sets up no defense except as stated upon the instrument executed in May, 1854, and it is maintained throughout by the answer and in argument that the defendant entered under and by virtue of that instrument claiming independently of any right granted at the date of his entry. A party thus entering into possession cannot adopt alternative lines of defense which are essentially inconsistent with each other. He cannot in the same case claim that he entered by deed absolute, and also under a contract for a conveyance, and also by leave or license requiring notice to quit. (Shackelford v. Smith, 5 Dana, 237.)

Upon the re-argument of the case, the appellant's counsel insisted that the deed executed by Mrs. Valencia to Davis in 1859 inured to the benefit of Agard, and as a predicate for this proposition it was assumed that the instrument entered into in May, 1854, between Bates and his associates and Casimero Briones, was a deed of conveyance executed by Mrs. Valencia; and as the statute abolishing joint tenancies was not passed until 1855, the deed to Davis inured to the benefit of his co-tenants, and the title thus derived may be set up in defense at law to the plaintiff's action.

This proposition is a petitio principii. The premises on which the deduction depends is wanting. The document called the deed of Mrs. Valencia was not her deed, and so was held, and the counsel for appellant had treated it on the first argument as amounting to no more than a contract to convey. The question as to the invalidity of this instrument as a deed or contract of Mrs. Valencia having been disposed of, an argument based upon it as a deed of conveyance cannot be entertained.

Returning to the case as presented upon the pleadings, we hold that the defendant's answer, though it sets forth some of the facts necessary to be alleged as constituting an equitable defense, is, both in form and substance, defective and insufficient as a pleading under which facts constituting such defense could be given in evidence, or on which the Court could grant a decree in defendant's favor, and therefore it is unnecessary to pass upon the rulings of the Court below in excluding a portion of the testimony offered in support of the theory of an equitable defense. Such offered testimony, a defendant, if return thereof be adjudged." Now, that undertaking is distinct; it is not qualified by any other language in the instrument. Then, what allegations besides the mere formal part of the pleadings must be made to entitle the plaintiff to recover?

First—That a return of the property had been adjudged.

Second—That it never had been returned.

Now, those allegations are doubtless made in proper form in the complaint demurred to.

The undertaking contains no condition or promise about the alternative judgment or value, but a simple undertaking for the return of the goods replevied.

If such condition is incorporated therein by operations of law, it can only be because the law in effect declares that no judgment for the property without the alternative shall be a good and valid judgment. Indeed, Mr. Justice Burnett put it expressly on that ground. He says: "It would seem that the sureties only bind themselves to make good such judgment as the plaintiff may lawfully obtain against the defendant." Here, then, is the whole foundation of Mr. Justice Burnett's surmises. A judgment without the alternative value would not be lawful. In Ginaca v. Atwood, 8 Cal. the Court decides such judgment would be lawful in case of nonsuit. In Nickerson v. The Cal. Stage Co., this Court decides it is a lawful judgment in a case where there was not a nonsuit, but a finding of the jury on the issues submitted to them. If, then, such judgments are lawful, what becomes of the surmises founded on the supposition they are not lawful.

The form of the undertaking is prescribed by legislative Act. If it was intended to limit the liability of the sureties in the manner contended for, why was not this alternative condition inserted in the form of the bond?

taining the point made. One other point made by the appellant was decided by the Court in his favor, and the reversal of the judgment of the Court below was placed on both grounds. It is insisted by respondent that because there was another point decided upon which the judgment of reversal was correct, that the decision on this point is merely dictum. But we might just as well treat the decision on the other point as dictum. The appellant directly made and relied upon both points, the Court considered and decided both, and devoted much the larger share of the opinion to the discussion of the point now before the Court. The opinion closes with these words: "For these reasons we think the judgment of the Court below ought to be reversed."

The opinion was written by Mr. Justice Burnett, and concurred in by Mr. Chief Justice Murray. We cannot find that the decision on this point has been questioned in any subsequent case, although several have arisen where the Judges would have been likely to have suggested doubts had any existed in their minds.

In Ginaca v. Atwood, 8 Cal. 446, it was sought to apply to that case the doctrine laid down in Nickerson v. Chatterton. This was also an action on a similar undertaking. The plaintiff in the suit to recover the property had been nonsuited, and a judgment for the return of the property had been entered in favor of the defendant. As the plaintiff was nonsuited, there had been no opportunity for a jury to find the value. The breach was a non-delivery of a portion of the property. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, the point of which was that the value of the property had not been ascertained by the jury. Mr. Justice Field delivered the opinion of the Court, Mr. Justice Terry and Mr. Justice Burnett concurring. No doubt is intimated as to the correctness of the rule laid down in Nickerson v. Chatterton. On the contrary, the Court takes an obvious distinction between the two cases, and by strong implication approves the doctrine of the former case, as will be seen from the following passage. Mr. Justice Field says:

John A. Clary v. A. Rolland et al.

Section 177 of the Practice Act applies only where the case has been submitted to and passed upon by a jury. It does not apply to a case of judgment of nonsuit. The decision of the Court in Nickerson v. Chatterton, 7 Cal. 568, and others, also, only applies to cases which have been submitted to a jury. The present case is like a judgment of a discontinuance, in which no jury is called. The result upon a trial by a jury would have been found in a writ of replevin suit are by such a judgment left to the discretion of the jury called in the suit on the undertaking, as the conditions of the undertaking will authorize the jury to enter into them."

The point made and relied on was the same relied on in the present case. The Court certainly had a legitimate authority to suggest a doubt as to the correctness of the decision in Nickerson v. Chatterton, if they had any, or if they intended to adhere to it. But not only was no doubt suggested, but the Court seeks other grounds upon which to base its decision, and expressly put it upon the ground that section 177 of the Practice Act, and "the decision of this Court in the case of Nickerson v. Chatterton, 7 Cal. 568, construing section 177 as only to apply to cases which have been submitted to a jury;" thereby strongly implying that the decision in that case would govern where the case was tried by a jury. Here was a Court comprised, in the opinion of other Judges, tacitly, at least, recognizing the validity of the decision laid down in Nickerson v. Chatterton.

The plaintiff in Nickerson v. Chatterton having failed in his attempt to recover against the sureties, subsequently brought an action against the principal — the California Stage Company — to recover the value of the property. The same case was substantially set up in the form of a former replevin suit, and this case found its way to the present Court. (Nickerson v. California Stage Company, 21 Cal. 51.) Still another Judge (Mr. Justice Baldwin) had concurred in the Bench. In deciding the case, the Justice who delivered the opinion of the Court says: "The defendant objects that under our statute there should have been a finding of the value in the replevin suit, and an alternative judgment for the return of the property, or the payment of its value. This would have been necessary to enable the plaintiff to recover against the sureties on the replevin bond; but the failure to do so cannot affect his rights as to the defendants."

Here the rule in Nickerson v. Chatterton was invoked and relied on, and the Court directly, in express terms, approved the rule as applied to a case where it is sought to hold sureties—but say it does not apply to the principal. Applied to that case it may be dicta, but it shows that Justice had no doubt as to the propriety of the construction given to the provisions of the Practice Act under consideration.

Again, in Mills v. Gleason, 21 Cal. 280, the same section of the Practice Act came under consideration—Justices C. and Norton having in the meantime come upon the Bench. Mr. Justice Cope, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the Court, says: "A dismissal stands upon the same footing as a nonsuit, leaving the parties to settle in an action upon the undertaking those matters which, if the original suit were prosecuted, it would be necessary to determine in the first instance."

Nickerson v. Chatterton was cited by counsel in the argument; and the Court, in the passage just quoted, and which follows, assume that if the action in the original suit had been dismissed, but had been prosecuted, it would have been "necessary to determine, in the first instance," the matter provided for in the sections of the Practice Act under consideration.

The decision in Nickerson v. Chatterton was rendered several years ago. In these repeated instances the construction of the statutes announced in that decision has been brought to the notice of the Court, and recognized both expressly and by implication, and no doubt as to its correctness, so far as it can find, has been, in any instance, suggested or intimated.

The question arises upon the construction of a statute

APPEAL from the Second Judicial District, Santa Barbara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Eugene Lies, for Appellant.

Charles E. Huse, for Respondent.

By the Court, CURREY, J.

The plaintiff commenced his action against the defendant to recover the value of a quantity of beans and corn, alleged to be of the value of one thousand dollars, which the defendant, as Sheriff, seized and carried away, under and by virtue of writ of attachment issued out of the District Court of the Second Judicial District, for Santa Barbara County, in an action therein of Abidie & Brothers against one Zuniga.

The plaintiff's right to the property was acquired by a mortgage of it, executed by Zuniga to him on the 8th of November, 1862, to secure the payment of six hundred dollars, which the mortgagor owed to the mortgagee. The mortgage was filed for record in the Recorder's office of the county on the day of the 19th of said month. The property described therein as being at the farm cultivated by the mortgagor at a particular place named. Immediately after the mortgage was filed for record, the plaintiff took possession of a part of the property, which at that time had been gathered. At the same time the greater portion of the beans and corn was upon the ground where the same grew, unharvested. The portion of the crop which had been gathered, and that which standing on the ground unharvested, were seized by defendant under said attachment on the 19th day of November at some time in the day after the mortgage was filed and recorded. The defendant harvested the portion of the crop upon the ground and then took it away, together with which he found gathered and in plaintiff's actual possession and thereby the property became lost to the plaintiff. Cause was tried by two referees, who reported a judgment in the sum of five hundred and thirty-five dollars for plaintiff against defendant, upon which final judgment was entered.

The defendant moved the Court, on the judgment entered, to set aside the report of the referees and to grant a new judgment. The Court denied the motion, from which the defendant appeals.

Counsel for appellant has assigned several grounds on which he claims that the judgment should be reversed, only one of which, under the notice of appeal and the assignment of error in the Court below, it is necessary to consider, and that is to the effect that the Court erred in refusing to set aside the report of the referees, for the reason that they reported a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of five hundred and thirty-five dollars, when the facts in the case warranted a judgment for eighty dollars only.

The objection is sought to be maintained on the ground that the portion of the property which was gathered and came into the actual possession of the plaintiff before the defendant harvested the crop was found by the referees to be of the value of eighty dollars, and that the portion of the property which remained unharvested when it was attached was not at the time in the plaintiff's possession, and therefore he had not acquired by his mortgage such an interest in it as the law protects as against an attaching creditor of the mortgagor. The objection made to the mortgage is, that it was not executed in the mode and with the formalities prescribed by the Act relating to chattel mortgages, passed in 1857, (Digest, 108,) and for that reason should be pronounced invalid as to the creditors of the mortgagor. The

J. N. Williams v. W. G. Hall.

Act of 1857 enumerates the kinds of personal property to which its provisions particularly apply. Growing crops are not found in the enumeration; but they are comprehended in the seventeenth section of the Act concerning fraudulent conveyances and contracts, (Wood's Digest, 107,) which provides that "no mortgage of personal property hereinafter made shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee; provided, that a mortgage upon growing crops, executed, acknowledged, and recorded, like mortgages upon real estate, shall be valid against third parties without delivery of possession; but the lien of such mortgage shall cease as against subsequent purchasers, unless such crops, when harvested, be delivered to the mortgagee, as required in other cases of mortgage of personal property."

The mortgage in this case was executed, acknowledged, and recorded, like mortgages on real estate, and was a valid mortgage on the crop standing upon the ground when the defendant attached and harvested it. The other portion of the property mortgaged, the referees find, was in the plaintiff's actual possession when the defendant seized it and took it from him. The mortgage of the property in controversy was valid under the Act last cited, and the defendant could not, by virtue of the attachment in his hands, legally take it from him to satisfy the demands of other creditors of the mortgagor.

Judgment affirmed.

DECREE OF COURT FOR PAYEE TO SUE SURETY—COMPLIANCE WITH.—A.

B. executed a joint promissory note to C.; B. was surety for A. B. brought an action against C., after the maturity of the note, to compel him to proceed and collect the amount due on the note from A., the principal, and obtained a decree requiring C. to commence legal proceedings against A. for the collection of the note, upon B.'s tendering to him a sufficient amount to pay reasonable costs and expenses, or be forever debarred from collecting the same from B. B. deposited with the Clerk and Sheriff a sufficient amount to pay their costs, and tendered to C. the services of an attorney employed by B. C. refused to commence the action, and A. subsequently became insolvent. Held, that this was not a compliance with the conditions of the decree by B., the surety, and that he was not released from his liability on the note.

APPEAL from the District Court, Fifth Judicial District, Tuolumne County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

H. P. Barber, for Appellant.

The decree was never fulfilled by the defendant, the plaintiff invoking its provisions; consequently he could not plead its bar.

The decree compelled plaintiff to sue on defendant tendering to him a sufficient sum to pay reasonable costs and expenses.

A party obtaining a decree cannot substitute his ideas of equity for the plain language of the decree; if he does so, he does it at his peril. (Hoffman v. Treadwell, 5 Paige, 33; Sparhawk v. Buel, 9 Vermont, 41.)

The decree ordered him to tender to plaintiff a certain amount for costs and expenses. The tender must be made to the plaintiff himself. (Hargous v. Lahens, 3 Sandf. 213.)

"Costs" mean the fees, etc., allowed by law. "Expenses" have a broader signification, and involve what it would reasonably cost a party to conduct such suit, including a reasonable fee for his lawyer.

All the cases show that a Court of equity will compel a surety fully to indemnify the creditor against expense in a suit he may be decreed to bring against the principal debtor.

we that upon an examination of the authorities point it will be found that we are correct in saying a well settled doctrine, maintained by the Courts of the several States of the Union, that: "If the surety can and clearly show injury to himself, by the failure of the principal to prosecute, after request, he is exonerated pro se." (Paine v. Packard, 13 Johns. 174; King v. Baldwin, 13 Johns. 384; Bruce v. Edwards, 1 Stew. 11; Manch. Iron Works v. Iron Works, 18 Wend. 162; Goodman v. Griffin, 3 Stew. 162; *Thompson v. "The surety will not be discharged unless the failure to comply with his request has resulted in actual injury, which must be shown by proving that the principal was solvent when it was made, and has become insolvent subsequently (Huffman v. Hurburt, 13 Wend. 377; Herrick v. Burt, 4 Hill 650; Gardener v. Ferree, 15 S. & R. 28; Merrett v. Lincoln, 21 Barb. 249; Thompson v. Watson, 10 Yerg. 362.)

In Ohio the surety is discharged, if the notice to proceed against the principal is in writing.

In Massachusetts the request must be accompanied with an indemnity against costs and charges.

The main objection to the maintenance of this doctrine, viz. that the surety has always the right and power to pay the debt himself and then proceed against the debtor—has been fully considered in some of the cases which we cite that we do not think it necessary to more than allude to it.

It cannot be urged that we are in any way endeavoring to lessen the obligation of the contract between the payee and the surety. In seeking to maintain this doctrine we only ask that the payee be held to respect those equities which are inseparable from the contract of suretyship. The surety's obligation is certainly only collateral, and the maintenance of the doctrine in question would necessarily result from the recognition of this position.

In concluding our argument on this point we cite the authority of the leading American text book on this subject.

Professor Parsons, on the Law of Contracts, Vol. 1, Book III, p. 50 says:

"From a consideration of the cases and the reasons which they rest, we think this rule may be drawn: That the surety is discharged when the creditor, after notice and request, has been guilty of a delay which amounts to gross negligence, and by this negligence the surety has lost his security or indemnity."

Exra Dane v. F. Corduan.

Justice Story, speaking of the equities between the grantor and surety, says (Story Eq. Jur. Vol. 1, §325):
 "If the grantor omits to do any act, when required by the surety, his duty enjoins him to do, and the omission proves a breach to the surety, in all such cases, the latter will be entitled to recover; he may set up such conduct as a defense to any action brought against him, if not at law, at all events in equity."

It is a well settled doctrine that the surety can proceed to compel the grantee to take immediate steps to pay the debt from the principal.

As was done in the case at bar, and the only question is, whether there have been any laches on the part of the defendant which will preclude him from pleading this as a bar to any recovery in the premises against the estate of V. Dehameau, deceased?

That laches have we been guilty, that we should be denied of the protection granted to us by the decree of the court in the case of Corduan, Administrator, v. Dane?

The court required us to tender to Dane, in that case, an amount sufficient to pay reasonable costs and expenses to which we would be put in proceeding against the principal, and in evidence, uncontradicted, that we paid into the hands of the proper officers, for Dane, the costs which would be incurred in the suit ordered to be taken by him against the principal, and also tendered him the services of a lawyer to defend the case. What more could be required from us?

The learned counsel for the appellant will perhaps say: "We could have tendered us a reasonable amount with which to employ a lawyer of our own selection; that was clearly the intent of the decree; you did not, perhaps, offer us a commended lawyer, or we choose to have one of our own choice in whom we could place confidence."

But we conceive, is as insufficient a reason as was ever advanced in a Court of equity to deprive a suitor of the benefit of which had been granted to him.

Esra Dane v. F. Corduan.

Who was the most interested in the success of the suit ordered by the decree of the Court to be commenced against Volpillac? Or, indeed, we might ask, was there any one interested in the gaining of that suit except the administrator Corduan? If Dane lost, did he lose anything? Not a dollar. We had given bonds to secure our paying over all assets of the estate which came into our hands to those who were entitled thereto. It would have been damnum absque injuria.

It has been repeatedly affirmed that the party most interested in the result of a suit is entitled to the control in the selection of counsel, and, indeed, there would be but little equity in maintaining a contrary doctrine.

By the Court, SAWYER, J.

The note sued on was executed in favor of the plaintiff by Dehameau as surety for Volpillac, the joint maker. After the maturity of the note, the defendant Corduan, as administrator of Dehameau, deceased, filed his bill against the plaintiff, Dane, setting up the circumstances under which Dehameau executed the note, asking a decree requiring the plaintiff, Dane, to proceed at once against the principal, Volpillac, and collect the amount due. It was accordingly decreed in this suit: "That said defendant make an immediate demand on E. Volpillac for the payment of the note executed," etc.; "that on said E. Volpillac's refusal, defendant commenced legal proceedings against said Volpillac for the payment of said note and interest, * * * within ten days from the filing of this decree, or be forever debarred from claiming the same from the estate of said Dehameau, plaintiff, * * * on the plaintiff tendering to said defendant a sufficient amount to pay reasonable costs and expenses in the suit against E. Volpillac for the payment of the note aforesaid."

The defendant "deposited with the Clerk and Sheriff a sufficient amount to pay their legal fees in the proposed suit of Dane v. Volpillac." The defendant, by his attorney, wrote a letter to plaintiff, in which he says: "Please take notice that her proceedings having been taken by either party state of facts two questions are raised in the argu-unsel. The respondent insists:

That the first suit and decree may be regarded as a mand made by the surety upon the creditor to proce and collect the debt from the principal; and the aving failed to proceed against the principal upon est, at a time when he was solvent, the surety, by re, has been injured, and is exonerated.

—That he has substantially complied with the terms ecree on his part, while the plaintiff has failed to prosecute, as required by the decree, and he is thereby barred from recovering against the surety.

As to the first question, admitting that a request and failure to prosecute has been shown, is the security exonerated from liability? Such a state of facts did not discharge the surety in England. His remedy was to pay the debt himself, and then sue the principal; or, perhaps, he might, by bill in Chancery, compel the creditor to proceed against the principal. Chancellor Kent says: "There is no case in the English law in which the personal application of the surety to the creditor was held to be compulsory on the creditor, at the hazard of discharging the surety." (2 John. Ch. Rep. 562.)

There was a departure from the English rule on this subject in Paine v. Packard, 13 John. 174, and in that case the surety was held to be discharged. But this case was combated and overruled by Chancellor Kent in King v. Baldwin, 2 John. Ch. Rep. 554. The case was appealed, and in the Court of Errors reversed by the casting vote of the Lieutenant-Governor, who, like many Senators voting on the question, was a layman. This fact detracts very much from the weight of the decision as authority, and the arguments of Chancellor Kent in the Court of Chancery, and of Senator Van Vetchin in the Court of Errors, against the principle announced in the case, appear to us to be conclusive. The Courts of New York have since followed the case of King v. Baldwin, while they have disapproved of the principle established by it. Mr. Justice Cowen, in commenting on this case in Herrick v. Boest, 4 Hill, 65, says: "What principle such a defense should ever have found to stand upon in any Court it is difficult to see. It introduced a new term into the creditor's contract. It came into the Court without precedent, was afterward repudiated even by the Court of Chancery, as it always has been both at law and in equity in England, but was restored on a tie in the Court of Errors, turned by the casting vote of a layman. Platt, J., and Yates, J., took that occasion to acknowledge they had erred in Paine v. Packard, as Senator Van Vetchin showed most conclusively that the whole Court had done." Yet courts of Pennsylvania have also followed King v. but they assign as a reason for so doing that in ania there is no Court of Chancery, and the common exercise chancery powers to a very limited extent for this reason a surety in that State cannot, as in es, compel the creditor to sue the principal. He is, without remedy, unless he can protect himself in a. In some other States, King v. Baldwin has also owed. In some, the rights and remedies of sureties ated by statute; and in others, the doctrine of King in has been entirely repudiated. (Bull v. Allen, 19 8; 2 Am. Lead. a party contracts jointly with another, as in this case, n himself and the creditor, he is a principal debtor— ly undertakes to pay the debt. It is his duty, both nd legally, to pay it; and we are of the opinion that t, both of authority and reason, is decidedly in favor oposition that the failure of the creditor to sue when so to do by the surety, does not operate to discharge y from his liability. This was evidently the opinion e Supreme Court of this State. (Hartman v. Bur- 9 Cal. 561, and Humphrey v. Crane, 5 Cal. 175.) And ess necessity for following a contrary doctrine in this r the reason that the Practice Act furnishes to the ore ample remedy than he formerly had, even in equity, for he can himself bring a suit against the nd principal debtor, and compel the latter to pay the Practice Act, 527.) The action contemplated by this as, doubtless, intended as a substitute for the proceed- ancery to compel the creditor to sue, and it may be whether any other action by the surety against the s allowed in our State.

the second point, admitting the decree to be suffi- cific in its provisions to be valid, of which there is much room for doubt, we do not think the defendant complied with its terms. To render the decree available as a bar it was necessary for him to perform specifically the condition imposed by it; and the condition was, that he should tender "to said defendant (plaintiff in this suit) a sufficient amount to pay reasonable costs and expenses in the suit against Volpillac," etc. He is not at liberty to do something else which he may deem to be equivalent to making a tender to the defendant in the decree; he must do the specific thing required by it. Paying to the Clerk and Sheriff a sufficient amount to pay their fees in the contemplated suit, is not the same thing as tendering it to Dane. (Dubois v. Dubois, 6 Co. 494.) Or, if so, it is certainly not the same thing as tendering to Dane "a sufficient amount to pay reasonable costs and expenses in the suit, etc. There are other costs than Clerk and Sheriff's fees, (even admitting payment to them of the fees to be a good tender under the decree, which we are not prepared to do,) such as witness and jury or referee fees, say nothing of the expense of procuring an attorney; and the tender of the services of an attorney is not equivalent to furnishing money to pay the expense of procuring one. The plaintiff was entitled to select his own attorney. (Peck v. Acker, 20 Wend. 605.) If the defendant desired to select his own attorney, or superintend the disbursements of the costs and expenses of the suit, he could have done so by bringing his suit under section 527 of the Practice Act, and making the principal as well as the creditor a party. In that mode, also, he could just as well have accomplished his whole object by a single action, instead of subjecting himself and the creditor to the trouble and expense of litigating a second suit. But he has chosen to pursue a different course, and he must rely for his discharge strictly upon the terms of his decree. Having failed to comply with those terms, the decree can afford him no protection.

Under the views we have taken of the case, the Court erred in dismissing the complaint and rendering judgment for the defendant.

Plaintiff recovered judgment below, and defendants appealed.

F. L. Hatch, for Appellants.

The appellants contend—first, that the demurrer to the amended complaint was well taken, and that the Court below erred in overruling the same.

There is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, and an improper joinder of two separate and distinct causes of action.

The plaintiff sues as the administrator of two separate and distinct estates. He is acting in a double capacity as the representative of two deceased persons, although it appears that they were husband and wife. As such representative, he stands in the shoes of A. Y. Brown and Cecelia Brown, his intestates. As the representative and successor of each and both of them, he is clothed with their rights, and, in suing, is subject to all the disabilities which would attach to them, were they living and in Court themselves.

The complaint having shown that A. Y. Brown and Cecelia Brown were husband and wife, it should also show such state of facts as would enable them to join as plaintiffs in an action of this character, were they living. Strike out the name of the plaintiff, Munch, and consider this an action brought by A. Y. Brown and Cecelia Brown—the several and independent owners of separate estates—for a trespass committed upon the separate estate of each, with nothing to show that they were husband and wife, and the complaint would be demurrable for an improper joinder of parties and action. On the other hand, consider them as man and wife, and the complaint would be demurrable for the reason that it would not present such a state of facts as would make it proper to make the wife a party plaintiff under our system of practice.

appeal is from the judgment and the order overruling on for a new trial. It is contended, on the part of the ent, that we cannot review the order denying the new cause the statement was not filed within the time prey of January, A. D. 1863, and notice of motion for al was served on the 30th of the same month. The a waived by the respondent, either expressly or by ion. At the foot of the statement is an indorsement

Sebastian Munch v. James Williamson et al.

to the effect that the respondent waives all objection as to the time of filing the statement, but this indorsement is not signed by either the respondent or his counsel. There is, therefore, no express waiver.

The appellant contends that the respondent appeared by his counsel at the hearing of the motion, and participated in the argument, and that thereby he has waived all irregularity as to the time of filing the statement. Admitting this to be so, the fact of the appearance is denied by the respondent, and the controversy can be settled only by a resort to the transcript. The only matter bearing upon this question of fact is found in the order of the Court overruling the motion, which is in the following words: "Now, at this day, in open Court comes on to be heard the defendants' motion for a new trial, and, thereupon, after having heard the arguments of counsel, the Court overrules the same, to which ruling of the Court the defendants, by counsel, except."

We are unable to perceive how it can be seriously contended that this entry shows any appearance on the part of the respondent. It is only by a resort to a shadowy inference that we can say that there was an appearance even on the part of the appellant. It is claimed that the use of the word "arguments" shows that the motion was argued upon both sides. If upon questions of this character the doctrine of presumption can be invoked at all, the presumption in the present case is very much weakened and attenuated by the fact, disclosed by the record, that each defendant in this case had two counsel, making four in all. We are of the opinion that no appearance is shown. A party who claims the benefit of a waiver of this character must prove the waiver beyond cavil, and not leave it to be ascertained by conjecture or doubtful inference. This disposes of the appeal from the order denying a new trial, and leaves for our consideration only the appeal from the judgment, which rests entirely upon the judgment roll.

It is contended that the Court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. The plaintiff seems to have sued an administrator of two, as it is claimed, distinct estates, to each

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman and Wells, for Appellant.

Respondents were not entitled to a specific performance because they are not found to have been ready or desirous to perform. (Story on Equity, Sec. 776; King v. Hamilton, Peters, 311; Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 175; Brown v. Cowland, 6 Cal. 571; Weber v. Marshall, 19 Cal. 447; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 404; Williams' Equity, 292.)

The act of the defendant in denying title, or disclaiming the vendee's title, was a forfeiture of all rights under the contract. (Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 175.)

Defendants insist that they made a tender in 1858. In 1860 they deny our title, set up adverse possession and the Statute of Limitations. What were they doing in this but endeavoring to deprive us of the money they had tendered?

We submit, also, that the bills of sale offered in evidence from which the defendants seek to deraign their title to a specific performance, are competent to pass only a possessory interest in land or improvements. No contract is named in them, nor sought to be assigned.

The defendants have not the legal title under the contract and are not the legal successors in interest to the original contractor, the parties being sub-purchasers of several parcels.

under a bill of sale. (Wood v. Perry, 1 Barbour, 114; Equity, 226, 272; Auldrich v. Putney, 11 Paige, 204; Equity, Secs. 3, 788, 789.)

have they a legal title, but a simple chattel or personal succeeding to the tenancy of Brown only. (Willard's 298; Meador v. Parsons, 19 Cal. 298.)

who seeks specific performance must come recenti facto, the remedies must be mutual. There must have been a change of circumstance affecting the character of justice in the contract.

who asks specific performance must be in a condition to perform his own part of the contract, and must have shown himself ready, desirous, prompt, and eager to perform it. (Equity, 776.)

Wheaton, for Respondents.

Deeds of sale executed by Brower and Crockett were intended to convey his interest in the contract with Owen, and to confer upon the assignees a perfect equity which they could enforce. (Wood's Dig., Arts. 394, 396.)

Plaintiff was a stranger to these transfers, and had no right to question them, as they did not change his status in relation to his own contract.

Tender of one hundred dollars to plaintiff, and his refusal to accept it, placed him in the wrong, and he could not avoid the effect of the tender by offering to accept the money and execute the deed. He could not avoid his contract by the conduct of the defendants so long as they held him ready for him and he refused to accept it. (2 Greenleaf's Evidence, §608.)

The Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an action of ejectment brought to recover the possession of lands situate in Suisun Township, County of Solano. The defendants answered jointly, disclaiming all title to or interest in the premises demanded, except as to a certain part thereof particularly described, and as to that part the defendants aver that they hold and occupy it by title derived from one Brower. That Brower, in May, 1857, made a verbal contract with the plaintiff for a purchase of the particular parcel named, for one hundred dollars, payable in labor as the plaintiff should require, or in cash, at Brower's election. That plaintiff bound himself by the contract to execute a deed of the lot to Brower, on full performance on his part, and that Brower, in pursuance of the contract, went into possession of the lot, and made valuable improvements thereon. That he performed labor for the plaintiff, under the contract to the amount of thirty-five dollars, and always worked for the plaintiff when requested by him so to do. That on the 9th of June, 1858, the defendants succeeded to the rights of Brower, and on the same day tendered to the plaintiff one hundred dollars, and presented to him for execution a quitclaim deed running to them, and that plaintiff declined the tender and refused to execute the deed. Defendants also aver that they have ever been ready and willing to pay the balance of the consideration due, and they offer to pay the one hundred dollars tendered into Court, and pray that the plaintiff may be decreed to perform his contract specifically.

The replication denies all the allegations in the answer, asserts the Statute of Limitations as a defense, and the Statute of Frauds also, and claims that the rights of the defendants, if they ever had any, have been forfeited on the ground of alleged repudiation by them of the plaintiff's title to the land manifested in speech and by adverse occupation. The trial was by the Court, and on the findings judgment was entered for the defendants in conformity to the prayer in the answer. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

1. The appellant insists that the respondents were not entitled to specific performance, because they are not found to have been ready or desirous to perform on their part.

It is true that there is no direct statement in the findings that the defendants were either ready or desirous to perform it is found that Brower, under whom the defendants claim, performed personal services for the plaintiff of the value of thirty-five dollars, and that within thirteen months from the date of the agreement, the defendants, having succeeded to the rights of Brower, tendered to the plaintiff one hundred dollars—thirty-five dollars more than was due. These facts, taken in connection with the offer of the defendants to put the money into Court, we consider as sufficiently evincing readiness and willingness on their part to perform. Further, the Court does not find, neither is there any testimony tending to prove, that either Brower or the defendants had promised their legal rights under the contract by a breach of any of its provisions. Brower was to perform services from time to time as required, and he had the privilege of paying the hundred dollars, or any part thereof, in money, or he could at any time choose so to do. The Court finds that the service to a certain amount was performed, and that more than the balance due was tendered in money, and if additional service was ever called for by the plaintiff and refused by Brower, the burden of proving it was clearly upon the plaintiff.

It is insisted that the defendants, as the successors of Brower, have repudiated and abandoned the contract. It appears that the contract was made in May, 1857; that Brower entered at once into possession under it, made valuable improvements, and performed for the plaintiff the labor before referred to; and that on the 30th of May, 1857, he assigned to Crockett, through whom the defendants claim. A witness for the plaintiff testified that titles to land in Suisun were complicated and conflicting; that Frink was "an ardent man," and that he (the witness) had heard Frink conversing with miscellaneous crowds, debating the matter frequently, and that on such occasions Frink always took sides against the plaintiff's title. It further appears from the record, that the defendants, in their original answer, denied all the plaintiff's allegations, and pleaded the Statute of Limitations, neither of which defenses, however, was reproduced in the amended answer filed thereafter.

In so far as the criticisms put by Frink upon the plaintiff's title are concerned, they may have had some tendency, perhaps, to show that he was not in possession of the property on the faith of the contract, of which he was, in part, an assignee; and the original answer may, after it became derelict, have been admissible as evidence tending to the same conclusion. But the entry of Brower—the further fact that before parting with his interest he paid thirty-five dollars on account of the contract, and expended sixty dollars in improving the property—the fact that the defendants paid a valuable consideration for the equitable rights of Brower, and thereafter tendered to plaintiff thirty-five dollars more than was due, and that, too, in advance of any breach on their part, or by those under whom they claimed, were also before the Court as matters of conduct, having a clear bearing upon the abandonment or repudiation alleged. The question raised was a question of fact, (Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 175,) and by the whole course of the decision the finding of the Court thereon is conclusive.

3. It is further objected on the part of the appellant, that the equitable rights of Brower have not, on the proofs in the case, passed to the defendants.

The defendant Frink claims under Crockett by deeds signed, sealed, acknowledged, and recorded. The defendant Peko claims under Crockett, by a bill of sale of all the vendor's right, title, and interest, and Crockett's title, derived from Brower, stands upon a bill of sale of like character.

In Ingoldsby v. Juan, 12 Cal. 577, it was considered that "there is no authority which holds that a conveyance of an interest in land must necessarily be under seal; and if it were so at common law, it does not follow that it is so required by our statute." But the right of Brower was purely equitable; and though the contract was by parol, still, by part performance his rights were rescued from the operation of the Statute of Frauds, (Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 160,) and there can

John W. Owen v. W. R. Frink et al.

But that Brower's right to a conveyance passed by his sale to Crockett. If the written but unsealed transaction were of a legal estate in the land, though not operative as a conveyance in presenti, still, it would have been good enough to convey under the Statute of Frauds.

It is claimed by the appellant that inasmuch as the facts set up, in effect, that the defendants were joint assignors of Brower's right, that the documentary evidence shows that one part of the lot affected by the equitable title was assigned to Frink, and another and distinct part assigned to Crockett, would have been excluded by the Court.

To the objection there are two answers:

The first objection taken to each document, as offered, was "irrelevant and immaterial." The objection was too general. (Dreux v. Crockett, 8 Cal. 83.) Where objection is taken to the introduction of evidence, the party objecting should, as a general rule, state the exact point of his objection. (Kiler v. Kimball, 267.) If this rule had been observed at the trial of this case, the defendants, perhaps, could have produced proof of an assignment from Crockett to them, subsequently to the sale.

It is true, if an estate should be sold in lots to different purchasers, each purchaser could not join in exhibiting one bill against the vendor for a specific performance; for each party's bill should be distinct, and would depend on its own circumstances; and, therefore, there should be a distinct bill for each contract. (St. Eq. Pl. Sec. 272.) But that is not the case here. Here there was but one contract to convey, and the lands affected by it have come to the defendants jointly in divided moieties. The general rule is, that interested parties may join in bringing a bill in equity where there is one connected interest among them all, centering in the same point in issue in the cause.

In Wells et als. v. Fellows et als. 5 Cowen, 682, the bill was filed that the defendants had confederated among themselves with the debtor of the complainants, to defraud the complainants by taking a conveyance to each, in separate parcels.

cels, of all the debtor's real and personal property, with consideration, and with intent to avoid execution upon plaintiff's judgment. To this bill one of the defendants demurred, for multifariousness. The demurrer was overruled and substantially on the ground above suggested. In the case at bar the plaintiff made but one contract to convey, and can be subjected to but one suit upon it for damages at law and to but one for specific performance in equity. Though the defendants are not jointly interested in the contract, in a narrow sense of that term, yet, they have a common interest that it should be specifically performed to the whole extent of its terms. The plaintiff is in no manner prejudiced by a joint assertion of the equitable right in the answer, for his judgment will be not only a joint, but several, bar against any further proceedings upon the contract.

5. But it is urged for the appellant, that no decree for specific performance can properly be entered in this case, for the reason that "the remedies are not mutual."

In support of this objection counsel refer to Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 404.

The principle is this: Where one is employed to work at a given time, or to do work by the job, the employer has the power to stop the work at any time, in his election; but the exercise of this power subjects the employer to damages commensurate with the injury sustained. (Clark v. Marsig, 1 Denio, 317; Derby v. Johnson, 21 Vt. 21.)

In the case cited from the 21 Cal., personal service on the part of Cooper was the sole consideration of Pena's contract to convey. The services were performed in part, and the plaintiff offered to perform the residue, but the offer was declined by Pena, and the plaintiff was, in effect, forbidden to proceed. In the case at bar, however, Brower was not bound implicitly to render any personal service, for, by the contract he was left at liberty to pay in money. He paid a part of the stipulated price in labor, and the defendants, claiming under him by assignment, tendered more than the just balance of money. On principle, no distinction can be taken, so far notice of his intention to move for a new trial of the cause and to set aside the judgment rendered. Some time afterwards the respective parties, by their attorneys, entered into a stipulation in writing, to the effect that the minutes of the testimony and proceedings in the case, taken by the Court Reporter on the trial, might be used in the place and stead of a statement on motion for a new trial, provided the defendant then had the right to file a statement or to make the motion, and had not waived such right; and it was declared by such agreement that it was not intended by it to waive any default committed, but to leave the rights of both parties as they were at that time. This stipulation was dated the 27th and filed on the 30th of June, 1863, in the office of the District Court, in Napa County, where the action was commenced and tried.

It will be presumed, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, that the testimony in the case, with the rulings of the Court, and the exceptions taken on the trial, were filed in the office of the Clerk of the Court within five days thereafter (Laws of 1861, p. 497), and that the same became at the time the stipulation of the parties was filed, the statement to be used on the motion whereof notice had been given; provided the time within which a statement for such purpose could properly be filed had not fully expired.

When the application for a new trial came on to be heard the attorney for the plaintiff objected that the Court could not entertain the motion because the defendant had not filed any statement of the grounds on which he intended to rely in support thereof. The Court overruled the objection, and heard the application upon the stipulation filed and the minutes of the evidence and proceedings taken by the Reporter, and the rulings of the Court and the exceptions referred to in such minutes, and thereupon made an order denying the motion for a new trial. From this order and the judgment the defendant in due time appealed.

The respondent, by his counsel, still insists upon his objection made on the hearing of the motion, and we think the objection well taken; because, by the terms of the order made

A. Y. Easterby v. Nicolas Larco.

8th of June, the twenty days granted to the defendant to file his statement expired four days before the motion of the parties was filed. The statute (Practice section 195) provides that a party may have, after he has given notice of his intention to move for new trial, five or such further time, not exceeding twenty days, as the Judge thereof may by order grant, within which he shall file with the Clerk a statement of the grounds on which he intends to rely; and it further provides that, if the statement is not filed within such period, or within such time as the parties may agree upon, the right to move for new trial shall be deemed waived.

The order granted by the Court giving to the defendant ten days in which to file a statement on motion for a new trial, construed by the appellant's counsel as granting to the defendant that period after the notice of the intention to move was given, and that as the notice was filed and served on the 8th of June, he was in time if he complied with the statute on the 27th of that month; and in aid of such construction reference is made to the decision of the Judge of the Court below, who, on the hearing of the motion, overruled the objection interposed, and thus, in effect, determined that the statement was duly prepared and filed. But the language of the order is plain and unambiguous, and its import is to be governed by its terms. No just construction of this order will extend the time specified to the day of the filing of the motion. The statute requires the statement to be prepared and filed with the Clerk within five days after notice given, or such further time as may be granted, not exceeding twenty days, and declares an omission to so file the statement to be a waiver of the right to move for a new trial. The statute referred to is peremptory in terms, and therefore the objection of the respondent must be sustained. This leaves the case to be considered upon the judgment roll alone, and as the complaint states a cause of action against the defendant, and no error in the judgment is apparent, it must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

Estate of George Harlan.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ESTATE OF GEORGE HARLAN, DECEASED.

JURISDICTION OF PROBATE COURT.—The Probate Court of the county of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, alone has jurisdiction to issue letters of administration upon his estate.

CHANGE OF COUNTY BOUNDARIES—EFFECT OF ON ADMINISTRATION.—If, after the death of the intestate, that portion of the county in which he resided at the time of his death, is erected into a new county, or attached to another county, the Probate Court of the old county still retains its jurisdiction over the administration.

IN WHAT COUNTY LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION ISSUED.—The residence of the party at the time of his death, and not the situation of the estate, is the test of probate jurisdiction.

APPEAL from the Probate Court of Santa Clara County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Rhodes and Drake, for Appellant.

Harlan, having been at the time of his death a resident of the County of Santa Clara, it follows that from that time to the time of the organization of the County of Alameda, the Santa Clara Probate Court had jurisdiction of the estate of Harlan, and was the only Court that could exercise active jurisdiction by the grant of letters, etc., upon a proper petition being filed.

There is a marked distinction between the meaning of the term "jurisdiction" when employed to designate the authority that a Court may exercise over any given class of person or property, or subjects of litigation, and when the term is used to designate the power and control that the Court is, in fact, exercising over a particular subject matter or person, upon action being brought.

The Court of Sessions of any county has jurisdiction of public offenses committed within the county, but it has no jurisdiction in fact of any particular case, or criminal action, until proper proceedings, by indictment or otherwise, have been had.

The statutory rule, that letters of administration must be in the county of which the deceased was a resident at the time of his death, is an arbitrary rule, and is not liable to be changed or varied, in any case, by considerations of convenience or expediency, or a subsequent change of facts, but, once ascertained of what county the deceased was a resident at the time of his death, if a resident of the State, the Probate Court of that county, upon the occurring of the death of the deceased, acquired jurisdiction of the estate of Harlan.

That rule being absolute, as well as arbitrary, if there be any exceptions to or qualifications of it, they must be found in the statute.

Reason, not of, but for the establishment of the rule was, that there might be but one administration granted within the estate of any estate.

The Respondent contends that the Probate Court of the county in which the place of residence of the deceased may be at the time of the filing of the petition for letters of administration has jurisdiction of the estate.

The rule would confer jurisdiction of an estate upon the Probate Courts, successively, of as many counties as might be included, by changes of boundaries, include the place of residence of the deceased. Suppose that a proper petition for letters of administration had been filed by Henry C. Smith, in Santa Clara County, and that some of the heirs or creditors of the deceased had successfully resisted the petition, and that, in the meantime, the Mission of San José had been included in Contra Costa County, and that the heirs or creditors should desire to sue the estate, where should they file their petition?

The Respondent says in the Contra Costa Probate that the widow, or other persons interested in the estate, should succeed in dismissing the last mentioned petition, and that, pending the pendency thereof, the Mission of San José had been included within Alameda County, the respondent's rule requires that the widow, or others desiring letters of administration, should file their third petition in the Alameda Probate Court.

The appellant contends that the Probate Court of San Clara acquired jurisdiction of the estate of Harlan by virtue of two facts concurring: First—the death of the deceased and, Second—his residence at the time of his death in San Clara County; and that the jurisdiction, having once attached, continues for all purposes relating to the administration and settlement of the estate. (Platt v. Beardsley, 1 Vermont, 151.)

If the statute had declared that the Probate Court of the county containing the last residence of the deceased, at the time of the filing of the petition for letters, or of the order granting letters, should have jurisdiction of the estate, the position of the respondent would be correct; but, instead of either of those rules, the statute has adopted the simple one of conferring jurisdiction upon the Probate Court of the county that contained the place of residence of the deceased at the time of his death, and the statute has failed to provide for a change of jurisdiction in case the boundaries of the county should be changed.

When a county is divided, the old county retains all powers, unless taken away by express Act of the Legislature (16 Mass. 86.)

The jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, in cases between citizens of different States, when it has once been acquired, is not divested by reason of both parties becoming residents of the same State. (Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. 290.)

There are, perhaps, no cases where jurisdiction attaches in the same manner, or for the same reason, as in the case of administration.

The statutes granting jurisdiction of estates to the Probate Court have been strictly construed, (Beckett v. Selover, 7 Cal. 233,) and all cases not strictly within the statute have been excluded from the Probate Courts. The will of a testator who died before the organization of our State government has not been allowed to be probated, it not being within the let-far as we can see, all reason is opposed to the Estate of George Harlan.

Suppose, after Yates County had been formed, two other counties had been formed out of and embracing all the balance of Ontario County, where, then, according to this decision would have been the jurisdiction to grant letters?

Suppose, after Alameda County was organized, the balance of Santa Clara County had been added, for jurisdictional purposes, to the adjoining County of Santa Cruz, where would one seek letters upon Harlan's estate?

It is evidently the object of the statute to require letters of administration to be issued by the Court having jurisdiction over the place of residence of deceased at the time when such letters are asked.

E. R. Carpentier & H. K. W. Clarke, also for Respondents.

The Probate Court of Santa Clara County, having once had territorial power sufficient to have given it jurisdiction over the estate of Harlan, if such jurisdiction had been called into exercise by proper proceedings and the production of the statutory facts, does that Court still retain that power, notwithstanding the erection of the County of Alameda in 1853 and the inclusion of Harlan's last residence in the latter county?

The Act of the Legislature creating Alameda County, (Session Laws, 1853, p. 59, Secs. 16, 17) transferred all judicial proceedings, the "subject matter" of which was in the new county, to the Courts of that county, and retained that part of the territory out of which Alameda County was formed "for judicial purposes" only until the County of Alameda should be organized under that Act. Thenceforth, it seems to us, the jurisdiction of the Courts of Santa Clara was limited to Santa Clara County with its restricted boundaries. And in view of this statute, we submit that even if the Probate Court of Santa Clara County had already acquired jurisdiction of the subject matter, that jurisdiction would have been transferred to Alameda County upon its organization by virtue of the statute and its clear intendment, and that after that period it would not have been competent for the Court

Estate of George Harlan.

Santa Clara County to proceed in the affairs of the estate of Harlan; and much less had it the power to acquire a new jurisdiction beyond its territorial limits over that estate.

the Court, SAWYER, J.

George Harlan died intestate, in the County of Santa Clara, 1850. Immediately before and at the time of his death Harlan resided at the Mission of San José, which was at that time in the County of Santa Clara. In March, 1853, by an Act of the Legislature, the County of Alameda was created out of territory taken in part from the County of Santa Clara.

The territory so taken from the County of Santa Clara included the land on which said Harlan resided at the time of his death, and the place of said Harlan's residence at that time, and ever since been, and it now is in the County of Alameda.

In June, 1863, the appellant, Charles Halsey, filed his petition in the Probate Court of Santa Clara County, stating, among other things necessary to entitle him to letters of administration, that Harlan died intestate in Santa Clara County, and that he owned real estate of great value in the County of San Francisco, and that said Harlan at the time of his death was a resident of Santa Clara County, and concluding with a prayer that letters of administration be issued to him. This application was opposed by sundry parties claiming to be interested in the estate, as heirs or otherwise, on the ground, among others, that the Probate Court of Santa Clara County had no jurisdiction over the reason that the place of residence of Harlan at the time of his death was no longer in the County of Santa Clara, but at the time of the said application was a part of the County of Alameda. The petition was denied on that ground alone, and the only question presented by the record is, whether the Probate Court of the County of Santa Clara has jurisdiction of the estate of the said George Harlan, and can grant letters of administration upon said estate, or whether such jurisdiction is in the County of Alameda.

The Act of 1850 relating to this subject provides that "Letters testamentary or of administration shall be granted: 1. In the county of which the deceased was a resident at or immediately previous to his death, in whatever place his death may have happened." The same provision is contained in the Act now in force.

The Mission of San José continued to form a part of Santa Clara County for three years after the death of Harlan, and during all that time the only Court that could take jurisdiction of the administration of his estate was the Probate Court of Santa Clara County. That county still exists, and its county government has been continued to the present time. Its territorial limits have been somewhat curtailed, it is true, but its legal identity is the same. The change in boundaries cannot affect the fact that Harlan died in Santa Clara County, and this is one of the jurisdictional facts prescribed by the statute. All the jurisdictional facts, then, once existed, and the Probate Court of that county, upon a proper presentation of those facts, would, at one time, have been authorized to take and in fact did take cognizance of the administration of the estate. Unless something has occurred to oust that tribunal of its right it still exists, and we find nothing in the law withdrawing the jurisdiction from the Probate Court of Santa Clara County unless the mere fact that the tract of land on which Harlan resided at the time of his death has been taken from the County of Santa Clara, and in connection with other territory erected into the new County of Alameda, works such a result. We do not see that this result necessarily follows. There is, in the nature of things, no necessary connection between the land and the jurisdiction. It was found convenient to establish some uniform test of jurisdiction, and the Legislature adopted the arbitrary one of making the residence of the party at the time of his death that test, although his property might be, as in this instance, to a great extent, in some other locality.

When a party dies, the jurisdiction to administer upon his estate, under the provisions of the Act, becomes fixed in the county of the residence of the decedent. The legal identity of the county may continue, notwithstanding its territorial limits may be modified. In contemplation of law, the legal entity known as the County of Santa Clara is the same with that which existed prior to 1853, at the time when the situs of the jurisdiction upon the estate of Harlan became fixed. In organizing the new County of Alameda no provision was made for transferring to the new county the jurisdiction to administer the estates of those who had already died in the County of Santa Clara. Provision is made for transferring certain records and certain legal proceedings of a local character from the County of Santa Clara to the County of Alameda. (Laws of 1853, p. 59, Secs. 16, 17.) It is insisted that this case is embraced in the term "subject matter" used in section sixteen. We think not. If the estate is the "subject matter" of this proceeding, then all of the estate now remaining, and consequently the subject matter, appears to be situate in the County of San Francisco, and not in either of the Counties of Santa Clara or Alameda. The residence of the party at the time of his death, and the situation of the estate, is the test of jurisdiction.

The provisions of the Act cited clearly do not embrace cases like the one under consideration. Had the Legislature intended to include such cases, they doubtless would have made provision for them. No such provision was made, and the presumption, from the fact of this omission, if any presumption can be indulged, is that the Legislature did not intend to deprive the Probate Court of Santa Clara County of jurisdiction in those cases in which the right to take jurisdiction had already become fixed in the County of Santa Clara, by the death of a party while a resident of that county. In considering the question in the light of authority, we have found but one case directly in point. In the matter of Bugbee v. The Surrogate of Yates County, 2 Cow. 471, the precise question arose under a similar statutory provision. A Bugbee died while a resident of the Town of Benton, in the County of Ontario. Subsequent to his death, the Town of Benton, in connection with several other towns, was erected to the County of Yates. An application was made to the surrogate of the new County of Yates for letters of administration. The Surrogate, having doubts as to his jurisdiction refused the letters, and the parties interested applied to the Supreme Court for a mandamus to compel him to act. The Supreme Court held that "the Surrogate of Yates County had no jurisdiction;" that "Alva Bugbee was, at the time of his death, an inhabitant of the County of Ontario, and the granting letters of administration pertained to the Surrogate of that latter county."

For the reason stated, and upon the authority of the cases cited, we hold that the Probate Court of Santa Clara County has jurisdiction, without reference to the question as to the validity of the proceedings taken in the matter of Harlan's estate in that county prior to the year 1853.

This view makes it unnecessary to consider the points made upon those proceedings, supposed to bear upon the present question.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

case was decided by the late Supreme Court, October 1858. The remittitur went down November 18, 1858, respondent now moves for a rehearing on affidavit. Affidavit states that the case was argued orally at the bar, Justices Terry and Baldwin, Justice Field not being present.

That the opinion in the case was signed only by Justices Baldwin and Field; and that within ten days after the decision, the counsel of the respondent informed Justice Field that he intended to file a petition for rehearing, on the ground that said Justice was not present at the argument; that counsel thereupon inquired if he, the said Justice, had any objection to the filing of such petition. That Justice Field replied to the question in the negative, but added that such petition, if presented, would be useless. It is admitted that briefs were filed in the case by the respective parties before the argument and before the decision.

From the entries in the case it appears that the respondent filed a petition for rehearing on the 11th November, 1858, and that the rehearing was denied November 13, 1858; and it further appears, from the minutes, that there was a full argument on the day when the case was argued and submitted.

The case of Blanc v. Bowman et als. 22 Cal. 23, is, in all respects, similar to this, and as we are satisfied with the correctness of that decision, we shall merely indicate the points upon which the question now presented will be argued.

It appears of record that the argument was before a full court, and the record cannot be attacked collaterally. If the record is erroneous, the error should have been brought seasonably before the court.

sonably to the notice of the Court, on a direct motion to correct it.

2. A cause cannot, unless, perhaps, the Court so order upon its own motion, be reheard, except upon petition, and under the rules of the Court ample provision is made for such applications. When a party makes up his mind to file a petition for rehearing it behooves him to include in it all the grounds of relief then known to him. It would seem from the affidavit filed in support of this motion that the respondent's attorney, when he filed his petition for rehearing on the 11th of November, 1858, was fully advised of all that he now alleges and that in consequence of a suggestion from Mr. Justice Field he, in the language of the affidavit, "desisted" from inserting in his petition the particular objection upon which this motion is made. The fact that counsel omitted then to make the point which he presents now, can be regarded in no other light than as a definitive waiver of the objection in question made more emphatic, if possible, by over five years of continuous silence.

Motion for rehearing denied.

JOHN W. OWEN v. S. H. FOWLER.

POSSESSION OF LAND—WHAT PROOF NECESSARY TO RECOVER.—In order to entitle a plaintiff in ejectment to recover, he must show a right to the possession in himself, and a possession in the defendant, at the time the action is brought, and if he fails to establish either proposition he cannot recover.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The judgment in the Court below was rendered against Josiah Wing, Josiah Wing, Jr., W. P. McCord, John Clark, D. W. McCollum, and S. H. Fowler. Fowler alone appealed.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Court, SANDERSON, C. J.

an action of ejectment brought against a large number of defendants who, as it appears from the record, severally separate and distinct portions of the general tract of land described in the complaint. The complaint was filed on the 1st day of April, A. D. 1860, but the summons was not served until the 13th day of February, A. D. 1861. The plaintiff filed a special answer, containing—first, the general denial, and second, a plea of the Statute of Limitations. In the first plea the defendant admits that he is “now” in possession of a small portion of the land described in the complaint, and in defense of that portion he invokes the aid of the Statute of Limitations. This plea was doubtless defective in not describing the land, and, for the purposes of this decision, it will be dismissed, and the answer held to be only a plea of the general denial, and the land described in the complaint embraces the site of the city, in Solano County. The evidence was taken before a referee appointed by the Court for that purpose. On the report of the referee, and before the trial, the action was dismissed by the plaintiff, upon his own motion, as to all of the defendants, only two of whom, in connection with the present case, it is material to mention, viz: Goodwin and Edwards. The first was served with summons, but the second was not. At the time the action was brought, as appears from the testimony, was in possession of the north half of Lot 2, in Block 11 of said city. Edwards was in possession of Lot 3, in Block 5, and the defendant, Goodwin, was in possession of an undivided interest in Lot 1, in Block 15. At the time the suit was brought the defendant occupied a room in Goodwin's house for lodging purposes, and boarded at some other place. But, as clearly appears from the testimony, he neither had nor claimed have any interest whatever in Goodwin's lot, and neither exercised nor claimed to exercise any control or acts of ownership over the same. Several months after the complaint was filed, and before the summons was served, Edwards sold and conveyed his lot to the defendant, Fowler, who soon afterwards went into possession, and continued in possession until the trial. Fowler's interest in Lot 1, in Block 15, was sold and conveyed to him by the plaintiff himself, long prior to the commencement of the suit.

Upon this state of facts the Court, having tried the case without a jury, rendered a judgment, as against Fowler, for the whole tract described in the complaint. On motion for a new trial, the Court first required the plaintiff to release the defendant's interest in Lot 1, Block 15, (the same conveyed by plaintiff to Fowler before the suit was brought), and then denied the motion. So the effect of the judgment, as it now stands, is to deprive the defendant of the possession of the Edwards lot only.

It is difficult to perceive upon what ground this judgment can stand. In order to entitle a plaintiff in ejectment to recover, he must show a right to the possession in himself and a possession in the defendant, at the time the action was brought, and if he fails to establish either proposition he cannot recover. The defendant, as clearly appears from the testimony, was not in possession of the Edwards lot until long after the action was commenced. The judgment is erroneous and must be reversed.

The judgment is reversed and the Court below directed to render judgment in favor of defendant.

Mr. Justice RHODES expressed no opinion.

WHO CAN TAKE ADVANTAGE OF.—No one can take advantage of act of infancy in avoidance of contracts except the infant himself, or heirs or personal representatives.

OF INFANT—HOW AVOIDED.—An infant may make or indorse a promissory note, and as to him, the note or indorsement will not be void, but merely voidable, at his election.

MAY CONTRACT BY AGENT.—An infant may execute a promissory note by agent, and an infant promisee may also authorize another to transfer the note by indorsement for him, and the transfer is valid until avoided.

TITLE OF NOTE BY INFANT.—An indorsee of a promissory note, deriving title from an infant indorser, acquires a good and valid title to the note against every other party thereto except the infant. The infant may, at any time before ratifying the transfer, intercept payment to the indorsee, or by giving notice to the maker of his avoidance, furnish him a valid defense against the indorsee.

OF INDORSEMENT BY INFANT.—Until the infant gives notice of his avoidance of his indorsement of a promissory note, the title of the indorsee is good, and the maker cannot plead the infancy of the indorser, in an action brought on it, as a defense.

OF INDORSEMENT OF INFANT.—An infant promisee sold a promissory note, and received the purchase money, and indorsed the note to the purchaser, and for eleven months after she arrived at her majority made no effort to return the purchase money, nor did she do or say anything indicating an intention on her part to disaffirm her indorsement; held, that she is bound by the note, and that her acts amounted to a ratification of the assignment.

OF INFANT.—The deed of an infant is not void, but voidable.

INFANT MAY AFFIRM DEED.—An infant grantor can neither affirm nor disaffirm a conveyance of land made during nonage, until he attains the age of legal majority.

INFANT—HOW DISAFFIRMED.—If an infant grantor, after attaining his majority, executes a conveyance of lands embraced in a deed given by him when a minor, the second conveyance will work a disaffirmance of the first, unless before the execution of the second conveyance the first has been affirmed.

INFANT ONCE RATIFIED CANNOT BE DISAFFIRMED.—If an infant grantor, after arriving at full age, ratifies a conveyance made by him during his minority, he will have no power to revoke the ratification and disaffirm such conveyance thereafter.

INFANT—HOW RATIFIED.—The voidable deed of an infant may be affirmed after he arrives at mature age, by an express verbal ratification in writing, or by acts which reasonably imply an affirmation, or by an omission to affirm the deed within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time will depend on the peculiar circumstances of each case.

S. C. Hastings v. E. W. Dollarhide et al.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellants.

The transfer and delivery of the note for a valuable consideration vested title in plaintiff. (Prescott v. Hall, 19 Johns. 284; Briggs v. Dorr, 19 Johns. 95; Jones v. Hitter, Mass. 304; Billings v. Jane, 11 Barbour, 620.)

There is no question but that in the case at bar the plaintiff paid a valuable consideration for the note. The Court finds that he paid eight hundred dollars. The payment was made to Munk, who had the note in his possession, by the permission and at the request of the payee, for the purpose of discounting or collecting the same, as he might be able. Upon the receipt of the money, Munk delivered the note to the plaintiff, who has since been the holder of the same, and, under the well settled rules of law before cited, has been the owner and entitled to collect the amount due thereon. Being the real party in interest under our statute, the suit was properly brought in his name, and could only be so brought.

The note passed to the plaintiff by indorsement, (Wood's Digest, p. 75, Art. 198,) for the fact of infancy did not interfere with the right of the payee to indorse. (Edwards on Bills, p. 246; Parsons on Bills, Vol. 1, p. 70; Parsons on Bills, Vol. 2, p. 3; Nightingale v. Wittington, 15 Mass. 272; Hart v. Waters, 38 Maine, 450.)

In Nightingale v. Wittington, Parker, C. J., said: "That an infant may indorse a negotiable promissory note, or a bill of exchange, made payable to him, so as to transfer the property to an indorsee, for a valuable consideration, seems to be well settled in the Law Merchant, and is no ways repugnant to the principles of the common law."

The payee, although an infant, could indorse by herself, or by her agent or attorney. Letters of attorney made by an infant generally spoken of as utterly void; but yet, it is conthat an infant may delegate authority to indorse a note, that there are exceptions to the rule that letters of attorney id. Mr. Parsons, in his work on Bills, Vol. 1, page 70, laying down the rule that an infant may indorse, goes on : "And it seems that such indorsement may be made agent or attorney of the infant, or at least that such ement is susceptible of ratification by the infant, after comes of age."

Story on Agency, page 7, we find the rule as follows:
infant may authorize another person to do any act which his benefit; but he cannot authorize him to do an act is to his prejudice. If, therefore, an infant should a letter of attorney to take livery of lands as a feoffto him, it will be good, for it will be intended for his
."

the policy of the law is to declare no act of the infant tely void; but to place all, excepting, perhaps, those are manifestly and unquestionably to the injury of the
, upon the same basis — to make them voidable at the of the infant. The protection of the infant, which is ject of the law, is thus allowed, and strangers are pre-from availing themselves of that which is properly the al privilege of the infant.

in the case at bar, were we standing solely upon the ement by Munk, as attorney or agent, and were it held his appointment, and his acts under it, were void, then ants could avail themselves of such a ruling as matter of e to this action, and put plaintiff out of Court, notwith-ng the infant might desire to ratify, or might actually attempted to ratify such acts. This would be absurd, t, and inequitable.

ce the delegation of authority and the acts done thereupon the basis of voidable acts only, and then the will have all proper protection, while the rights of the who may have had dealings with him or her will not be d.

The claim of defendants is that Ysabel Armijo, their grantor and payee of the note sued on, repudiated the contract and gave evidence thereof after reaching her majority by selling the same interest previously conveyed to defendants and others to H. H. Hartley. This amounts to nothing more than a plea of failure of consideration. To support this plea, the defendants offered a deed from said Ysabel to H. H. Hartley, which was admitted under the objections and exceptions of plaintiff.

We contend that the deed was improperly admitted, because the pleadings made no proper case for such admission.

Possession, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is deemed to actually accompany a conveyance of real property. The presumption then is, that the defendants received possession from Ysabel, that they went into possession under her, and so continue in possession. If so, then they should have offered to surrender their deed to be cancelled, and to have returned to her the rights derived from her.

They cannot be allowed to retain all they have received, and, at the same time, repudiate the consideration therefor. (Jackson v. Norton, 5 Cal. 262.)

But, we submit with confidence the proposition that the defendants have no right to raise the question of the infancy of their grantor, either in respect to the consideration of the note or the appellant's right to maintain the action.

"Infancy is strictly a personal privilege; no one can take advantage of it but the infant or his legal representative." (2 H. Bla. 515; 3 Camp. 254.)

"Several parties join in a security; the infancy of one cannot be taken advantage of by the others." (4 Taunt. 10, 46.)

"And the infant may always sue on his contract the same as if he was an adult." (2 M. & S., 205; 6 Taunt. 118; Strange, 938; 4 Taunt. 469; Bacon's Abridgement, Infancy, 1, 4.)

"Infancy (say the authorities) is not permitted to protect fraudulent acts of the infant," and with stronger reason may urge, nor of the adult contracting with the infant.

"No one but the infant himself, or his legal representative his voidable deed or contract." (2 Kent. Comm. 44; Bramer v. Cooper, 2 Johns. 279; Jackson v. Todd, 257; Oliver v. Houdlette, 13 Mass. 237.)

defendants, as has been well observed, are not, the of the legal rights of the infant; the question is not liability as arising out of or connected with the con- any aspect of the case, but it is simply an attempt of t one, but many, to repudiate their own contract.

as to be insisted on, with great force, by the learned or defendants, that the power of attorney of an infant tely void. We are not aware that the authorities hat position, and we believe it cannot be sustained her than a limited sense applying it to cases where power is necessary to be given under seal, to be ex- h all such solemnity as a deed imports, and even then submit that the tendency of modern decisions is hardly t the doctrine.

void, while the deed itself, if executed by the principal, would be only voidable; why the indorsement of a note by the agent of an infant, or a person claiming to be such, is of no effect though the infant might himself indorse it, and thereby pass a valid title; why the making of a note by a person of full age, competent to transact business in his own behalf, cannot be done in the name and as the act of an infant, and yet the same act, if done by the infant around whose acts the law, in theory at least, assumes to throw its protecting shield, is not may be valid and binding upon him, even to the destruction of his estate.

The infant may assume all these positions at his election and at his peril, guarded only by the right of disaffirmance, or the power to treat the act as voidable.

He may take upon himself the obligation of a surety. (Curtin et al. v. Patton et al., 11 Serg. & Rawle, 305, 310; Hinely v. Margaritz, 3 Barr. 428.) he acts he may do in his own name, and none but his personal representatives can question or avoid. The policy of the law which seems to harmonize the protection to the infant with a just regard to the rights is satisfied to hold all these acts as voidable only, at extent, and subject to the single contingency of age, he is regarded as competent and sui juris to act for his own benefit in all these matters; and yet it seems that while the law does not regard him as absolutely and fully disabled from acting in these matters for himself, yet denied the privilege of being allowed to delegate his own authority for such a purpose, though a person sui juris may do by himself he may do otherwise," is, we are told, the general maxim of law. Yet, it is asserted that when the infant would act thus, he is inconsistent with those with whom he deals; he has changed from the adult, who may disaffirm the contract without notice to rescind it, retain the property of the infant, yet convey it to his assignee, convey it away, pocket its proceeds, and still deny it to his own vendor.

such a doctrine, however, we find the authority of many cases, the guarded language of the courts, the cases above cited, the guarded language of the court in Snyder v. Sponable, 1 Hill, 567, in itself showing grave exceptions to the rule there given, and its conflict with the general principles of law applicable to infancy.

Murray, for Respondent.

Plaintiff claimed to be owner of the note on which the action was brought, as the assignee of Ysabel Armijo. The note being non-negotiable in form, the plaintiff took it, and acquired any right to it, subject to all the equities existing or arising between the immediate parties thereto. Darling, 5 Mason, 214; Wallis v. Twambly, 13

Mass. 204; Comstock v. Farnham, 2 Mass. 96; 1 Pars. Contracts, 198, 199.)

In a case of an assignment of a chose in action, which not by the terms of it assignable, the assignee takes it on credit of the assignor, and acquires no greater rights respecting the same than the assignor had, or would have had if he had retained it. (Wallis v. Twambly, 13 Mass. 204; 1 Parsons's Cont. 198, 199; Wood v. Perry, 1 Barb. 115, 131.)

The Act entitled "an Act relative to bonds, due bills, and other instruments in writing," has not changed the law so as to affect this case. (Wood's Dig. 75, 76, §§ 3, 5, 6.)

By Ysabel's last conveyance with Morales, her husband, disaffirmed and avoided the deed made and executed by her when an infant. (Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Peters, 59; Jackson v. Carpenter, 11 John. 539; Jackson v. Burchin, 11 John. 124; Boal v. Mix, 17 Wend. 119; Lessee of Drake v. Ramsey, 5 Ohio R. 251; Voorhies v. Voorhies, 24 Barb. 1; 2 Kent's Com. 234-239; 1 Am. Lead. Cases, 232-238.)

The note in question was not duly assigned to the plaintiff. The indorsement and assignment of it was by a person who professed to act for Ysabel Armijo by written appointment, executed by her when an infant. This power of attorney was void. (Sanderson v. Marr, 1 Hen. Black, 75; Zo v. Parsons, 3 Burrows, 1808.)

An infant cannot appoint an attorney. This was so held in Fonda v. Van Horn, 15 Wend. 634, 636; and in Thomas v. Roberts, 16 Meeson & Welsby, 778, it was held that an infant could not appoint an agent of any kind.

Messrs. Hare & Wallace, in 1st American Leading Cases, 250, say: "The constituting of an attorney by one who is an infant, and the acts he is authorized to do by him, are in their nature voidable, is repugnant and impossible, for it is imparting a right which the principal does not possess — that of doing valid acts. If the acts, when done, remain voidable, at the option of the infant, then he has done, through the agency of another, what he could not have done directly."

A warrant of attorney by an infant to confess judgment is absolutely void. (Bennett v. Davis, 6 Cow. 393; Waples vs, 3 Harrington, 483; Camahan v. Alderdice, 4 Hare prevails, if at all, because the transaction is for the of the infant. But it is nowhere said, that I am aware an indorsement can be made by an agent or attorney nfant. Mr. Parsons does not say in direct terms that y be done, but he says "It seems that such indorseay be made by an agent or attorney, or at least that ndorsement is susceptible of ratification by the infant after mes of age." So any act of one who assumes to be the f another may be ratified by the principal who is comto ratify; but until a ratification of an unauthorized act cannot be regarded as valid.

S. C. Hastings v. E. W. Dollarhide et al.

In this case there was no ratification of the act of Munk infant after she became of age.

es not appear that the transfer of this note was for the of the infant. It does not appear that she needed the undred dollars paid by plaintiff, as Munk testified, or e ever received any of it. Munk don't say she did—a thing he would have been likely to testify to if such had been the case.

It is worse than idle for plaintiff's counsel to speak of Hastings paying the value of this note, provided it was to become of value by a ratification on the part of Ysabel (after she might become of age) of the sale and conveyance of the land to defendants, for the note bore a fair rate of interest, namely, one per cent per month for the first eight months, and two per cent per month thereafter.

Then it is not evident that this pretended sale of the note in question was to the disadvantage of the infant, if the note was worth its face?

It is argued on the part of plaintiff, that because the note became due before she became of age, and because the defendants could then have been made to pay it, that therefore she then became liable, and that a subsequent destruction of the consideration of the note on the part of Ysabel could not operate to discharge the defendants of liability.

This argument seems to me to be entirely fallacious. If A. should on this day, in consideration that B. would sell and deliver to him a thousand bushels of wheat on the first day of September next, make and deliver to B. his (A's) promissory note for one thousand dollars, payable on the first day of August next, B. could sue and perhaps recover the amount of the note before the 1st of September, even though the consideration for the note was executory. But if B. should wait until after the first of September before he commenced his action, and should refuse to perform the consideration promised for the note, no lawyer would hesitate to advise A. that he had a good defense to such note, and no Court would say that such advice was not sound.

That the conveyance by Ysabel, after she arrived at her majority, to a third person, was a disaffirmance of the former conveyance to the defendants, seems to be in accordance with the settled law of the land. This was so held in Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Pet. 59-79; Jackson v. Carpenter, 11 John. 539; Jackson v. Burchin, 14 John. 124.

Tucker v. Moreland, at page 71, the Court say the nature of the original act of conveyance governs as to the nature of the act required to be done in the disaffirmance of it. If the act be of as high and solemn a nature as the former, it amounts to a valid avoidance of it.

Jackson v. Burchin, 14 Johns. 124, the question here involved was elaborately discussed, and the Court there say that it would seem, not only on principle but on authority, that the defendant can manifest his dissent in the same manner by which he assented to convey.

The case of Jackson v. Carpenter, 11 Johns. 589, is equally decisive on this point, as also the learned commentaries of Chancellor Kent, Vol. 2, pages 237 and 238, and notes. (See, 1 Am. Lead. Cases, 232-238, and notes by Hare and Walpole; Hayle v. Stow, 2 Dev. and Bat. 320; and Boal v. Mix, 17 Cal. 119.)

the Court, SHAFER, J.

This is an action on a non-negotiable promissory note, executed by the defendants to Ysabel Armijo, on the sixth day of September, 1858. The note was for one thousand dollars, bearing interest at one per cent per month until May 6, 1859, and at the rate of two per cent per month thereafter until September 6, 1859.

The complaint alleges that on the day the note was executed it was transferred to the plaintiff by indorsement, in consideration of eight hundred dollars paid by him to the plaintiff, Ysabel Armijo.

The complaint was filed October 6, 1860; summons was served November 20, 1860, and served on all the defendants (seventeen in number) except James Jeans; and all of the defendants, except Jeans, appeared and answered jointly. The answer contained:

First—A general denial.

Second—A special defense that the note was given without consideration.

Third—A special defense, setting forth that the said Ysabel

E. C. Hastings v. E. W. Dollarhide et al.

Armijo sold and conveyed an undivided one sixth of certain lands situate in the County of Solano to the defendants and others named in the deed, and that the said note "was a part of the consideration of the conveyance." That the grantor, at the date of the conveyance, was an infant under eighteen years of age, and that after arriving at the age of legal majority she refused to confirm the aforesaid deed, but executed a deed of conveyance of all her estate in the land to H. H. Hartley, whereby she disaffirmed the deed to defendants; and it alleged that the consideration of the note has thereby wholly failed.

The trial was by the Court, and on the findings judgment was entered for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

It appears from the record that Ysabel Armijo was born December 30, 1841, thus attaining her majority December 29, 1859; that on the 6th of September, 1858, she made the conveyance to the defendants alleged in the answer, and on the same day received from the defendants the note in question; that the note was a part of the consideration of her conveyance, the balance of purchase money (one thousand dollars) having been paid at the date of the deed; that on or about the day of its date, the note was delivered by Ysabel and her stepfather to one Munk, for the purpose of collection or discount; that Munk sold and transferred the note to the plaintiff, E. C. Hastings, on the 28th of October, 1858, for eight hundred dollars, which amount was paid to Munk in two instalments; that the note was indorsed as follows: "Ysabel Armijo. By her attorney in fact, Thomas K. Munk, as her power of attorney, filed October 28, 1858, and recorded in Liber 1, pages 182, 183, of Solano County records." It further appears that before October 27, 1860, said Ysabel intermarried with Diego Morales, and that on said 27th of October, 1860, she and her husband executed a deed, duly acknowledged, to H. H. Hartley, for the land mentioned in the said deed of September 6, 1858; that in the deed to Hartley there is a declaration id Ysabel to the effect that, by said deed, she rescinds s all contracts and conveyances made or purporting een made by her during her minority, in any way said tract of land. The deed also contained a cove-nst all legal conveyances previously made by the el. There was no evidence tending to prove that

S. C. Hastings v. E. W. Dollarhide et al.

It is now well settled as a part of the law merchant that an infant may make or indorse a promissory note or bill of exchange, and that, as to him, the note in the one case is the indorsement in the other will not be void, but void at his election. (Nightingale v. Wittington, 15 Mass. 292; Hardy v. Waters, 38 Maine, 450; Storey on Promissory Notes, section 78.)

It is also established by the tenor of the modern decisions that an infant may execute a promissory note by agent. Whitney v. Dutch, 14 Mass. 457, it appeared that of two partners in trade, one was an infant, and the other of full age. The adult, for a debt of the co-partners, made a promissory note in the name of the firm, and the infant, after coming of full age, ratified it; and it was holden good against him. It has been held that an infant promisee may, by parol, authorize another to transfer a note by indorsement for him, and the transfer so made will be held valid until avoided. (Hardy v. Waters, 38 Maine, 450.) In the case last cited, it was admitted that an infant might transfer a note payable to himself by indorsement, and the point directly presented was, whether he could confer upon another power to do it for him. 4 Wend. 479; 17 Wend. 419; 2 Hill, 120; 11 Wend. 85.)

Mr. Chancellor Kent, in summing up the doctrine, says: "It is held that a negotiable note, given by an infant, even for necessaries, is void; and his acceptance of a bill of exchange is void; and his contract as security for another is absolutely void; and a bond, with a penalty, though given for necessaries, is void. It must be admitted, however, that the tendency of modern decisions is in favor of the reasonableness and policy of a very liberal extension of the rule that the contracts of infants should be deemed voidable only, and subject to their election when they become of age, either to affirm or disallow them. If their contracts were absolutely void, it would follow as a consequence that the contract could have no effect, and the party contracting with the infant would be equally discharged."

In the case at bar the note executed to the infant pa not negotiable; but, on principle, no distinction can be between negotiable and non-negotiable notes in the of the power of an infant to make or to indorse them. Cases cited proceed upon the ground that infants are protected by the rule holding their contracts of every action voidable in their election, with the exception of a peculiar contracts, in relation to which the Court can say, section, that they are necessarily prejudicial to the infant, if these the contract of suretyship may be stated as an le.

view of the foregoing authorities, as well as upon principle we are satisfied that both, under the written power given Isabel Armijo to Munk, and the verbal directions given by him at the time she put the note into his hands for collection or discount, he was authorized to sell and transfer the to the plaintiff, and that when Ysabel became of age she in her power to ratify or disaffirm the assignment.

another and perhaps more important question here presents itself. It is whether the transfer by the infant is operation in favor of the plaintiff as assignee, so that he may receive the proceeds of the note from the defendants, and give satisfaction therefor. It seems now well settled that an indorsee taking title from an infant indorser, acquires a good and valid title to the note against every other party thereto, except the maker, since the title is not void, but voidable only. The infant indorser, at any time before ratifying the transfer, intercepts the title to the indorsee, or by giving notice to the maker of the assignment, furnish to him a valid defense against the claim of the indorsee. But until he does so avoid it, the indorsement is deemed, in respect to such antecedent parties, a good and valid transfer. (Grey v. Cooper, 3 Doug. 65; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Esp. 187; Jones v. Darch, 4 Price, 800; Nightingale v. Wittington, 15 Mass. 272; Story on Bills, Sec. 85.) In the case at bar there has been no attempt made on the part of Isabel Armijo, either before or since she became of age, to ratify her assignment to Hastings, nor has she at any time attempted to collect the note of the defendants in disregard of that assignment—nor, so far as the record shows, has she ever given any notice to the defendants that she did not intend to abide by the transfer to Hastings. In the case of Nightingale v. Wittington, 15 Mass. 272, a minor had received a negotiable promissory note in payment of labor in the employment of the maker of the note, and had indorsed the same to a third person for a valuable consideration, the indorsee knowing the indorser to be under age; and afterwards the father (who had previously emancipated his son in effect, by neglecting to provide for him) received the amount of the maker in discharge of the note, both the father and the maker knowing of the indorsement.

It was held that the maker could not himself deny the validity of the indorsement, and that inasmuch as the infant had never disaffirmed it, and inasmuch as the payment to the father was a payment by the maker in his own wrong, the indorsee was entitled to judgment.

The fact that the note given by Ysabel Armijo was non-negotiable, is, as we have already intimated, entitled to no consideration, so far as the question of the plaintiff's title is concerned. Notes non-negotiable at common law are made negotiable with us by positive statute. True, the persons to whom such notes are transferred hold them subject to all defenses that might be urged in suits against the maker brought by the payee; but that fact is not inconsistent with an absolute ownership of the securities vested in the party to whom the may have been transferred.

But there is another ground on which the title of the plaintiff to the note in controversy may be rested. Ysabel Armijo, since she became of age, has ratified her assignment to the plaintiff, and has thereby made it impossible for her to compel the defendants to pay the note a second time. In the absence of all proof to the contrary, it must be presumed that Munk accounted to his principal for the money paid him by the plaintiff. Ysabel became an adult on the 29th of December, 1859, and this action was commenced about eleven months thereafter. During this interval she made no offer to return el Armijo and husband, to Hartley, was in itself conan act of disaffirmance, it becomes material to ascertain whether she had not, in effect, ratified the prior deed the defendants before that act of disaffirmance was performed.

The exemption of infants from liability on their contracts proceeds solely upon the principle that such exemption is essential to their protection; and it is admitted that the law of infancy should be so administered that that result may, in all cases, be secured. But it has not unfrequently happened that Courts, in their anxiety to protect the rights of infants in the matter of contracts made by them during nonage, have, after they have become adult, treated them to some extent as infants still, exempting them from the operation of rules of law, not only of general obligation, but founded in essential justice. The strong tendency of the modern decisions, however, is to limit the exemptions of infancy to the principles upon which the disability proceeds.

In considering the question of ratification with which we have to deal, it is to be remembered that the contract of sale made between Ysabel Armijo and the defendants, on the 6th of September, 1858, was fully executed on the day of its date by the delivery of a deed on the part of Ysabel, and a payment to her by the grantees of a part of the purchase money and the execution of their note for the balance. There is no distinction taken between executory and executed contracts in the matter of ratification, but it is the law of the latter class of contracts only that we now have occasion to consult.

In Baylis v. Dinsley, 3 Maule & Sel. 481, it was held that a parol confirmation of a bond given by an infant after he came of age was invalid, and that the confirmation should be supported by something amounting to an estoppel in law, and of as high authority as the deed itself, and of equal solemnity.

In Tucker v. Moreland, 10 Pet. 75, after citing the foregoing case, Mr. Justice Story remarks upon it as follows: "Without undertaking to apply this doctrine to its full extent, and admitting that acts in pais may amount to a confirmation of a deed, still we are of opinion that those acts should be of such a solemn and unequivocal nature as to establish a clear to confirm the deed, after a full knowledge that it was voidable."

B. C. Hastings & B. W. Dollachide et al.

Johnson v. Carpenter, 11 John. 542, and in Curtin v. Johnson, 11 S. & R. 311, the rule stated in Baylis v. Dinahy was further relaxed; for, according to those cases, acts of an infant are not required to be "solemn," nor is it requisite that they should be absolutely "unequivocal;" but if, when construed, they are found to be "evincive of assent," they are held to be sufficient. But the rule in Baylis v. Dinahy has been subjected to still further modification. In Reynolds v. Houser, 1 Hayw. 143, the plaintiff and defendant were joined under one Wright, who, while an infant, had conveyed the lands to Houser, and after coming of age had conveyed the lands to Reynolds; but before making such conveyance, and after coming of age, he said to Houser: "I do not wish to take advantage of my having been an infant at the time of executing the deed, and it is my wish that you should ratify the deed." It was held that these words ratified the deed. Here, there was no act done, and the words were used informally. This decision is sustained in the case of contracts executory, by Goodsell v. Myers, 3 Wend. 101; Myers v. Hurd, 4 Day, 57; Wilcox v. Roath, 12 Conn. 341; Le v. Gerrish, 8 N. H. 374; Millard v. Hewlett, 19 N. H. 301. In Orvis v. Kimball, 3 N. H. 314, it was held that a declaration of an intention to pay a note, and authorization to take it up, was a good ratification, although the party had done nothing about it.

In real estate cases so far cited, though differing inter sese as to the rule of ratification now in question, all agree, however, that the deed of an infant cannot be ratified by mere acquiescence or inaction, no matter how protracted; and (in Boody v. Conney, 23 Maine, 523) a reason is suggested: "Where an infant has made a conveyance of real estate during infancy, he cannot afterwards affirm or disaffirm it after he becomes of age, inasmuch as mere acquiescence for years affords no proof of a ratification. There must be some positive and clear act performed for that purpose. The reason is, that by his silent acquiescence he occasions no injury to other persons, and secures no benefits or new rights to himself. There is nothing to urge him as a duty toward others to act speedily. Language appropriate in other cases, requiring him to act within a reasonable time, would become inappropriate here. He may therefore, after years of acquiescence, by an entry or by a conveyance of the estate to another person, disaffirm and avoid the conveyance made during his infancy." The consequences of the grantee of enduring silence on the part of the grantor after he has become an adult are, as we conceive, misapprehended in this opinion, and their character is very differently presented in cases to be cited hereafter. The decision in Lessee of Drake v. Ramsey, 5 Ohio, 251, marks another step in the progress of judicial opinion upon this subject, and the Court say: "In our opinion, lapse of time may frequently furnish evidence of acquiescence, and thus confirm the title of the first purchaser; but, of itself, it does not take away the right to avoid until the Statute of Limitations has run." The same doctrine was afterward affirmed in Cresinger v. Lessee of Welch, 15 Ohio, 193.

In the case of Kline v. Beebe, 6 Conn. 794, the effect of silent acquiescence on the part of a grantor — after becoming of age — to ratify a deed given during infancy, was fully considered and adjudged. The action was ejectment, and the plaintiff claimed title as tenant by the courtesy. He was the husband of Patty Kline, deceased, formerly Patty Bolles. In 1791, Patty, being then under age, executed to Ebenezer Bolles a quitclaim deed of the premises, and received from Ebenezer his promissory note for the purchase money. Within a year after Patty became of age she intermarried with the plaintiff, by whom the note was held during an interval of ten years, when this action was commenced. During this period of eleven years, and until the commencement of the plaintiff's action, a profound silence was observed relative to the disaffirmance of the deed, and the defendant was permitted to remain in the unquestioned occupation of the lands. It was held by Hooper, C. J. — Brainard, Lamm and Daggett, Justices, concurring—that there were three modes of affirming the voidable contracts of infants: 1. By express ratification; 2. By performance of acts from which an affirmation might be reasonably implied; 3. By an omission to disaffirm within a reasonable time; and that on the facts of the record before them there was both an implied and tacit affirmation of the conveyance.

In Scott v. Buchanan et al., 11 Humph. 468, it was held that the voidable deed of an infant might be affirmed by an express ratification, or by acts which reasonably implied an affirmation, or by the omission to disaffirm the deed within a reasonable time; and it was further considered that “reasonable time” was a question of fact necessarily depending on the circumstances of each particular case. Held, in Jones v. Butts, 30 Barb. 641, that infant parties to a marriage settlement could avoid it within reasonable time after coming of age, or could be considered as having been ratified by them.

In Richardson v. Bright, 9 Vt. 370, it was held “that in every case of every act of an infant, merely voidable, he must affirm it on becoming of full age, or he will be bound by it, and the case of Kline v. Beebe was cited with approbation, and Mr. Justice Redfield says in the opinion: “The doctrine of that case is but the long established doctrine of the common law.” This statement of the learned Judge is sustained by Co. Litt. 51b: “If an infant exchange lands, and at his full age occupy the lands taken in exchange, thereby the exchange is become perfect.” And it is further justified by the decision in Holmes v. Blogg, 8 Taunt. 35, in which case it is observed: “The infant is bound to give notice of the disaffirmance of a voidable contract in reasonable time; and in the case before the Court were that simple case, I (Dallas, Judge, afterward Chief Justice) should be disposed to hold that as the infant had not given express notice of disaffirmance within four months, he had not given notice in reasonable time.”

In Delano v. Blake, 11 Wend. 85, an infant, after becoming of age, held a note for eight months, given him for work and labor while an infant, and it was held that it was too late to disaffirm. Chancellor Kent, K. Com. 11, 263, referring to Holmes v. Bloggs, 8 Taunt., already cited, says: "The inference from that doctrine is, that without some act of dissent, all the avoidable contracts of the infant would become binding. * * * This is the usual course when the infant does not intend to stand by his contract; and the confirmation of the act or deed of his infancy may justly be inferred against him after he has been of age for a reasonable time, either from his positive act concerning the contract, or from his tacit assent under circumstances not to excuse his silence."

In the cases cited there is a marked disagreement as to whether mere acquiescence on the part of an adult will ratify a deed made by him while an infant; but in the case of a purchase made by an infant, the decisions are uniform that if the infant retains the property purchased, whether it be real or personal, and gives no notice of an intention to disaffirm within a reasonable time after he arrives at full age, it will be sufficient evidence of a ratification. Some of the leading cases upon the subject are Boyden v. Boyden, 9 Met. 519, Boody v. McKenny, 23 Maine, 517, Hubbard v. Cummings, 1 Greenl. 11, where this doctrine is applied to the purchase of real estate. On principle, we can see no difference between the case of an infant grantor and the case of an infant grantee, justifying a distinction between them. If the infant, on attaining majority, is bound by the rule of diligence in the one relation, then he must be in the other; and if he is exempt from the rule in either relation, then he must be exempt in both. Whether the infant stands as grantor or grantee in the deed to be ratified or avoided, good faith, public policy, and the very principle upon which the law of infancy is based, require that he should make his election within reasonable time after he becomes of age. To hold otherwise would make the disability of infancy a "sword" rather than a "shield," and, in the language of Mr. Chief Justice Hosmer, 6 Conn. 505, would extend to the adult unlimited license "to hold the scales in and there applied to the case of land acquired by exchange.

Differences of title by exchange and title by purchase are technical and circumstantial. They relate to the mode of acquiring rather than to the results of title when acquired; and where results are confessedly uniform and consistent, why should the law be at once embarrassed and blemished by arbitrary distinctions concerning them? The central idea and whole purpose of the law of infancy is the protection of the infant; and if infants, under the rule in Coke upon Litt., are adequately protected against improvident exchanges of land made during their minority, so they must be protected against improvident purchases and sales.

We have considered this case at length for the reason that the authorities are in conflict; the questions involved are made clear for the first time, and for the purpose, if possible, of substituting exchanges and executed sales and purchases of both real and personal property by infants to one uniform rule, so that the ratification or disaffirmance of such contracts is consideration is another question raised by the record, but as it is unnecessary to decide it, we shall refrain from discussing it.

An infant after becoming of age disaffirm a conveyance during infancy, without returning, as a part of the proceedings, the consideration received, in so far as the disaffirmance, the consideration received, in so far as the consideration, whether in money, securities, or chattels, was within his power or control?

JAMES H. LONG, GARRARD LONG, JOHN P. LONG, SOUTHEY LONG, WILLIAM B. LONG, AND WILLIAM
LONG v. A. H. DOLLARHIDE.

PAROL PARTITION.— A parol partition of land may be made by co-owners under the Mexican law, as well as by tenants in common under the common law.
SAME — WHAT CONSTITUTES.— In order to uphold a parol partition, under both the Spanish and common law, it must satisfactorily appear that there was not only an agreement to make the partition, but that the same was fully executed and followed up by a several possession, by either the parties themselves or their grantees.

SPANISH LAW — PAROL SALE OF REAL ESTATE.— Under the Spanish law, contracts for the sale of real estate rest upon the same footing with those relating to personal estate, and may be by parol or otherwise, at the option of the parties.

PRIOR AND SUBSEQUENT PURCHASERS OF LAND.— The rule that a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and whose deed is first recorded, will hold the land conveyed, as against a prior purchaser, only applies where both parties claim under the same grantor.

BONA FIDE PURCHASE — HOW PROVED.— The burden of showing that he is a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration is cast upon one claiming under a second deed but recorded first in point of time, and the deed itself is not evidence of these facts, but they must be shown by other testimony.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The defendant in this action, by his title deraigned from Pena, claimed to be a tenant in common with plaintiffs in the demanded premises.

The other facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellant.

A parol partition is only good, whether judged by the rule of civil or common law, when it is open, notorious, and followed immediately by possession.

The parol agreement is merged in the act, and though the agreement may be proved, it is not as a substitute for the act but to explain the acts. In this case, the most that can be made of the evidence is a loose declaration from one tenant in common to the other, or between the two, that each might sell a half league of land indeterminate in locality or quality and not reduced to possession. As against the defendant

That, even admitting plaintiffs' theory to be correct, as to the efficiency of the partition, and the effect of the subsequent conveyance from Vaca, defendant being an innocent purchaser, without notice for a valuable consideration, cannot be affected thereby.

Williams & Thornton, for Respondents.

According to the Spanish law unchanged by legislation, contracts in regard to land might be made by parol. Title to land was not conveyed by deed, but passed by virtue of the contract. Sales of land under that system of law could be made by parol. The Louisiana cases to this effect are numerous. The following are some of them: Gonzalez v. Sanchez, 4 Mart. N. S. 657; De Vall v. Choppin, 15 La. 566; Landry v. Martin, 15 Lou. 1; Leblanc v. Victor, 6 Martin's N. S. 257; Maes v. Gillard, 7 Mart. N. S. 317; Ducroix v. Bijean, 8 Mart. N. S. 197; Sackett v. Hooper, 3 Lou. 10; Choppin v. Michel, 11 Robinson, 233; Badon v. Bahen, Ann. 467.

See, also, 1 Sala's "Illustracion Derecho Real," 271; and 2 Tapias "Febrero Novisimo," (edition published at Paris 1855,) Sec. 3, p. 134, and Sec. 31, p. 147; where the same rule is stated as to sales of land. According to these authorities the Spanish law made no difference as to the requisites of sale of personal or of real property. (See, to the same effect, Law 6, Title 5, Partida 5.)

Such also seems to have been the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, in Strother v. Lucas. (See the opinion of the Court in that case, 12 Peters, 447, 448.)

The contract of exchange of lands can also be made under the Spanish law by parol, with or without writing. (See Law 1, Title 6, Partida 5.) Donation can be made also with or without writing. (Law 4, Title 4, Partida 4.)

Promises and obligations can be entered into with or without writing. (Law 2, Title 11, Part. 5.)

consent can be made judicially or extra-judicially, without the intervention of the judge. (Febrero Novisimo, 4th Vol. p. 61.) It can be made intellectually. (Ib. Sec. 1, p. 1. s v. Compton, 3 Martin, O. S. Marg. 143.)

The court say, in the case just cited from 3 Martin: "A partition can be ascertained by measurement, according to the already agreed on, produces as perfect a separation of the law as that which may be drawn by going to the marked object to another. There is no difference in the translation of the country, at the time the transaction took place. None. Febrero states, in express terms, that partitions may be either real or intellectual; for, says he, as things are divided intellectually by the law, they may be by man; and that the intellectual division may not only be of rights, but also of corporeal objects."

In the same manner we say in this case, the partition was made as the calls in the deeds. The south line across the valley was only described in the contract with Vaca, on the north line, one half a league of land was to be surveyed; and in the contract of Pena to Hoppe and Hollingsworth, a half a league of land was conveyed, having for its southern boundary the southern boundary line of the land sold by Vaca to the Pattens. Thus the partition was consummated, and Pena was the proprietor in the sale to Hoppe and Hollingsworth.

ated in Solano County. The plaintiffs obtained judgment the Court below, and the defendant appeals.

Both parties claim under a grant from the Mexican Nation to Manuel Vaca and Juan Felipe Pena, and under a patent from them from the Government of the United States, bearing date June 4, 1858. The plaintiffs claim under paper title from Vaca, and the defendant under like title from Pena, plaintiff's title being the oldest. The plaintiffs further claim that they and their grantors acquired Pena's estate in the land in question at the same time that of Vaca was obtained, by reason of a parol partition between Vaca and Pena, made at or before the sale by Vaca to plaintiffs' grantors, by which Vaca was to have in severalty a half league of land, of which the land in question is a part, and Pena was to have another half league in like manner. Whether the plaintiffs did thus acquire Pena's estate is the principal question presented by the record in this case.

That a parol partition of land may be made by co-owners or co-proprietors, under the Spanish or Mexican law, as well as by tenants in common under the common law, is a proposition not denied by counsel for the defendant; but it is insisted that the evidence fails to establish a partition in the present case. The determination of this question involves a patent analysis of all the testimony bearing upon the point.

In order to uphold a partition under the Spanish law, as well as under the common law, it must satisfactorily appear that there was not only an agreement to make the partition, but that the same was fully executed and followed by a several possession by either the parties themselves or their grantors. What will amount to a several possession sufficient to complete the partition must in a measure depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. So far as the question is controlled by legal rules, we have been unable to ascertain that there is any material difference between the Mexican and the common law; but, if any difference exists, it is certain that the less rigid rules are found in the former system, growing out of the fact that under that system less importance to real estate than has always been accorded to it by common law. Under the Spanish law — independent of what was avowedly had for the purpose of facilitating the performance of Government duties — contracts touching the sale of real estate are put upon the same footing with those relating to personal estate, and may be by parol or otherwise, at the option of the parties. (Law 6, Title 5, Partida 5.)

Also, contracts for the exchange of lands may be by parol with or without writing, (Law 1, Title 6, Partida 5,) and the alienation of land can be made in like manner; also, contracts and obligations can be made and entered into with or without writings. (Law 4, Title 4, Partida 4, and Law 2, Title 5, Partida 5.)

It is clear, therefore, that such acts as are sufficient to work a partition between tenants in common, under our system, can be made in satisfying all the demands of the Mexican law.

It appears from the record that Manuel Vaca and Juan Pena were jointly in possession of and living upon the Rancho Los Putos in 1847, under a grant to them from the Mexican Nation. In March of that year, Vaca entered into a contract with plaintiffs' grantors, John Patten, Sr., John Patten, Jr., and Albert G. Lyon, for the sale of half a league of land belonging to the Rancho Los Putos, the latter to pay therefor a valuable consideration, part in money and part in labor to be bestowed upon the house in which Vaca was at that time dwelling. This written contract was drawn up by one J. D. Hoppe, and signed by him and one John Coombs as witnesses. This document is contained in the transcript and designated "Paper A," which designation was adopted. On the 7th day of April, 1849, Vaca, pursuant to his covenant as expressed in "Paper A," made a deed of a Spanish league of land to the Pattens and Lyon. This deed is also set out in the transcript and called "Paper B." There is a slight variance between the descriptions of the land as contained in these two instruments; but it is explained by the testimony of a surveyor, who had run out the boundaries pursuant to the calls of both instruments, that either description embraces the land in controversy. All question of conflict between the two instruments must be determined by "Paper B," it being the more solemn and formal instrument, and the one by which the legal title actually passed. The land is described in "Paper B" as follows, viz: "One half of a Spanish league of land lying in the first valley east of the present residence of said Vaca, beginning at Alamo Creek at a certain oak tree marked "B," being near the first crossing of said creek; thence east, across the valley, to Ulattis Creek; thence up the said Ulattis Creek to a point where the said creek leaves the base of the mountain; thence along the base of the mountain a sufficient distance, so that running the north line parallel with the south across the valley to the western side of the valley and thence down the base of the mountain on said western side to the point of the small mountain, thence due west to said Alamo Creek, and then down said creek to the point of beginning, will include the quantity of one half of a Spanish league of land."

It further appears from the record that half a league of land lying on the north and adjoining that described in "Papers A and B," was sold by Pena to J. D. Hoppe and H. Hollingsworth. At what time this sale was made does not clearly appear, but the deed, which is contained in the transcript, bears date on the 30th day of March, 1850. It is apparent, however, from the recitals contained in a subsequent conveyance by Lucy Hoppe, widow of said J. D. Hoppe, and from the further fact, disclosed by the testimony, that Hoppe was residing upon the land at the time of the sale from Vaca to the Pattens and Lyon, (whose contract, "Paper A," he drew up), that the sale from Pena to Hoppe and Hollingsworth must have been about the same time as that from Vaca to plaintiffs and grantors, viz.: March, 1847. This theory is further sustained by other facts and circumstances which will appear hereafter.

The deed from Pena to Hoppe and Hollingsworth contains the following description of the land sold by the former to the latter: "All that certain piece or parcel of land being in the of the first valley east of the residence of Manuel bounded as follows, to wit: commencing at the corner of the lands of John Patten, Sr., John Patten and Albert Lyon, and running in a northeast direction north line of the said Pattens and Lyon, to the west of the mountain east of said valley; thence up said valley parallel with the base of said mountains, a sufficient distance to include half a league of land, Spanish measure; also, from the place of beginning with the base of the mountain west of said valley in a northerly direction, so that the line of said half league of land will run parallel to the valley with the south line."

Carol testimony upon the question of partition is conflicting. Nathan Coombs, one of the subscribing parties to "Paper A," who was called upon for that purpose as interpreter between the Pattens and Lyon on the one side and Vaca on the other, at the time the contract was made, testified that Pena was present at the sale, and that he (Pena) and Vaca stated at that time, either to him or in his presence, "that they had an agreement between them that this half league of land," (referring to the land sold to the Pattens and Lyon) "should be sold by Vaca on behalf of his interest in the rancho, and that Pena should have the right to select another half league in place of it; or if they thought their interests equal they should do this." Pena, when also examined as a witness, testified that there was no agreement between him and Vaca as stated by Coombs; that he admits that he was present at the sale, and knew of it, and that he had no objection to it; and further states that he sold the land to the Pattens and Hollingsworth, and Vaca sold to the Pattens and Lyon, and that they both had the right to sell.

The latter part of Pena's testimony can hardly be reconciled with the former, for it is difficult to perceive how either party could have the right to sell the estate of both in a particular tract of land unless there was some agreement between them to that effect. Moreover, the testimony of Pena is contradictory in other particulars, and it is evident that it is entitled to but little weight.

It further clearly appears from the testimony that Vaca and Pena both sold their respective half leagues for the same purpose, viz: to procure means and labor to repair and improve their dwelling houses; and that the entire consideration paid by the Pattens and Lyon was paid to and received by Vaca to his separate use, and that paid by Hoppe and Hollingsworth was in like manner paid to and received by Pena, all of which is admitted by Pena on the witness stand.

It further appears that, immediately after the sale, the Pattens and Lyon were put into formal possession by Vaca, and that the Pattens soon after built a house on the lower and Lyon on the upper end of the tract, and that both subsequently farmed and cultivated a small portion thereof, respectively contiguous to their dwellings, and kept more or less stock running over the land; that they, and others under them have been in possession since. It also appears that Hoppe and Hollingsworth were in possession of their half league in 1847, and so far as anything appears to the contrary, they and others under them have since continued in possession.

Thus it appears that the two half leagues were sold by Vaca and Pena, respectively, at about the same time and for their separate use; that their respective grantees went into the several possession of their respective tracts under deeds the calls of which are unambiguous and certain, and readily followed; that neither signed the other's deed, but each conveyed the land as though held by him in severalty, and each did this with the full knowledge of the other. The two tracts are contiguous, and constitute but one body of land, and embrace, apparently, all the land contained in the valley. The lower end is sold by Vaca and the upper by Pena. And this could not have happened by accident; but, on the contrary, it is manifest that these several acts were the result of design, and were performed by the respective actors in pursuance of an agreement between them of the character of that testified to by Coomba. That agreement, followed by the ac-and above, fully satisfies all the requirements of either the common or common law upon the subject of the parol partition of real estate, and establishes beyond a doubt, in our opinion, that a parol partition of the land in question was claimed by the plaintiffs in this suit. The execution of their respective deeds, with the calls therein contained, by Vaca and Pena, was a full ratification of their agreement, and a sufficient division and segregation of the land in question to create a common and create a several possession, which was kept up and continued by their respective grantees. We have examined the instructions of the Court to the jury upon the question of partition, and have been unable to find any error in them; on the contrary, we think the question was properly submitted.

The next contention by counsel for the defendant that inasmuch as the defendant's deed was first recorded, he is a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and that against him the plaintiffs' title, although prior in point of time, must fail. In order to avail himself of this defense, the defendant's and plaintiffs' grantor must be the same, which circumstance seems to have been entirely overlooked by counsel. The defendant has no conveyance from Vaca, the original grantor of plaintiffs, nor from their immediate grantors, Vaca, Lyons and Lyon. The defendant's subsequent title is derived from Pena alone, who, the partition being established, has no interest whatever in the land. Had the defendant, however, shown a deed from Vaca, recorded before that of the plaintiffs, he would have failed in making out this defense; and from the recitals contained in his deed, he offered no evidence showing himself a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration. The burden of proving the title rested upon him, and the recitals of the deed are not, as counsel contends, prima facie proof of a valuable consideration. The recitals are but the declarations of the grantor, and it has never been held that the declarations of a vendor or grantor, made after the sale or assignment, can be received in evidence at the title of the vendee or assignee. A party seeking to bring himself within the statute cannot rely upon the recitals of his deed, but must prove the payment of the purchase money aliunde.

The judgment is affirmed.

EXCEPTION TO FINDING OF FACTS.—A judgment rendered in an action tried by the Court without a jury will not be reversed for a defective finding of facts, unless exceptions are taken in the Court below to the defective finding, particularly specifying the defect, and the bill of exception is settled by the Judge, as in other cases.

APPEAL from the District Court, Seventh Judicial District, Solano County.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the Court.

Whitman & Wells, for Appellant.

John Currey, for Respondent.

By the Court, CROCKER, J.

This is an action to recover a sum of money due upon contract to construct a road, executed by the defendant to the plaintiff. The case was sent to a referee to take the testimony. The testimony was taken and reported to the Court, and the Court filed the following findings thereon: "The cause came on to be tried by consent of parties without jury, before the Court, and the Court having heard the evidence in the cause, finds that the plaintiff performed the labor and services by him alleged, at defendant's request and by his employment, and is entitled to have and recover of and from the defendant the sum of one thousand four hundred and twenty-five dollars and the costs of this action." To the findings the defendant objected, and excepted that the findin and conclusions of law are not separately stated, that the findings are defective and insufficient in not finding the facts put in issue by the pleadings. Written exceptions were filed, specifying and particularly designating the particular facts in which the findings were defective, as required by section two of the Act of May 20, 1861. (Statutes 1861, p. 589.) The facts thus omitted in the findings were put in issue by the pleadings, and evidence was introduced respecting them; but the court failed to remedy the defect thus pointed out and directed to. The exceptions were filed within two days after the findings were filed, but they do not appear to have been acted on by the Judge," as required by the Act in question. The record does not show that they were ever brought to the attention of the Judge until the hearing of the motion for a new trial, which was nearly six weeks afterward. It is not shown that the defendant asked the Court, before the findings were drawn or filed, to find certain specified facts, which the court refused to do; but that proceeding is not within the scope of the Act referred to. To make these exceptions available, they have been brought to the attention of the Court, that the court might remedy the alleged error; and upon failure to do so, the exceptions should have been settled by the Judge, as required by the statute.

The next point is that the findings and judgment are against the evidence. We think there is sufficient evidence to sustain the judgment, and the parties seem to have had a fair

The respondent objects that the notice of appeal was not properly filed and served, and therefore moves to dismiss the appeal. The notice of appeal was filed February 23, 1863. It was dated February 19th, and the affidavit of service states that it was served February 20th, which was three days after it was filed. In Hastings v. Halleck, 10 Cal. 31, it was held that the service of the notice of appeal should be made on or at the time of the filing of the notice. This motion is therefore, be sustained.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

The People v. Francis C. Coffman.

On petition for rehearing. By the Court, SHAFTER, J.

The petition for a rehearing in this cause upon the merits must be denied; but, inasmuch as we have serious doubts as to the correctness of the judgment dismissing the appeal on the ground of alleged defects in the notice, that judgment is vacated, and instead thereof, a judgment affirming the judgment of the District Court is directed.

Petition denied and judgment affirmed.

[The above case was decided at the October term, 1863, by the late Supreme Court, but a rehearing was asked, which was denied by the present Court.—REPORTER.]

THE PEOPLE v. FRANCIS C. COFFMAN.

WAIVER OF ERRORS IN CRIMINAL CASES.—If the defendant, in a criminal action, omits to interpose his objection to any irregularity that occurs in the drawing and impanelling of a trial jury at the time the same occurs, he is deemed to have waived the same, and objections cannot for the first time be raised on a motion for a new trial.

PROOF OF INSANITY IN CRIMINAL CASES.—To establish a defense in a criminal action, on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that at the time of committing the act the accused was laboring under such a defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as not to know the nature or quality of the particular act with which he stands charged, or if he did know its nature and quality, that he did not know it was wrong.
